START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

DECEMBER 1993

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-001

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 1

Volume 1

BSO
1889-1890

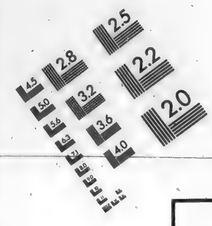
2.0 mm

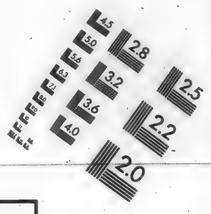
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

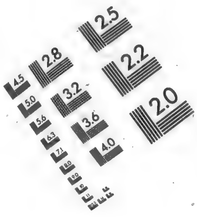
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

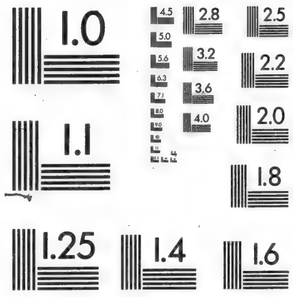






150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

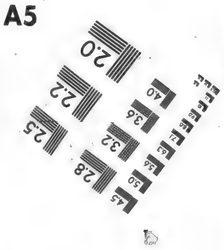
1.5 mm

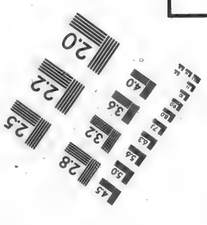
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 1

BSO

1889 - 1890

SHIPMAN'S PATENT Invoice & Scrap BOOK
PATENTED JUNE 13, 1871.

2 91 Seattle

Paid Audited

E. S. O

4 12

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with assistance of

EMINENT SOLOISTS,

will give a series of

FIVE CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 31st, December 12th, 1889, January 9th, February 6th, March 13th, 1890.

Season Tickets, with Reserved Seats for the Series, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Wednesday, October 23d. Sale opens at 8 A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET,

FRANZ KNEIZEL, 1ST VIOLIN,
OTTO ROTH, 2D VIOLIN,
L. SVEČENSKI, VIOLA,
ANTON HEKKING, VIOLONCELLO,

with assistance of

MRS. CORINNE MOORE LAWSON,
MISS ROSE STEWART,
MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. ARTHUR FOOTE,

and others, will give a series of

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS,

in

CHICKERING HALL,

on

MONDAY EVENINGS,

October 28th, December 2d, and 30th, 1889, January 27th, February 24th, and March 31st, 1890.

Season Tickets with Reserved Seats for the Series, Six Dollars, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 21st, at 9 A. M. Subscription List now open at Music Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FADED TEXT

[2]

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

After five years of earnest and unremitting artistic labor—which has been crowned with great and well deserved success—Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has decided to return to his own country, and no better proof could be desired of the debt of gratitude which the public feels towards him than the presence of the enormous and enthusiastic audience which assembled last night to bid him godspeed.

During Mr. Gericke's stay here he has met with some opposition in minor details; some considering his programmes badly chosen, others finding a lack of warmth and feeling in his interpretations, while still others may have thought that breadth and strength were often sacrificed to finish and detail. But these are all very trifling matters after all. What Mr. Gericke has done is to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the four or five greatest orchestras of the world, and the difficulties in his way have been very great. It is true that the princely liberality of the founder of these concerts has relieved the conductor from all financial anxiety, but there are, in the course of such an institution, other obstacles quite as great and as difficult to overcome. For example, the celebrated orchestras in Europe have all existed for at least several generations; they have received their traditions of Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann (with many others) from those great masters themselves, and a young musician joining the orchestra receives these traditions from its older members. He becomes completely imbued with them, and in his turn passes them on again, and thus the warm artistic ideals of such an institution are almost as fresh as when they were first received, and it is impossible to exaggerate the help this is to a conductor. How different is this here. Until the foundation of the Symphony Orchestra eight years ago there was practically no standing orchestra worthy the name in the city. Up to that time the instrumental music furnished was of a very indifferent nature, and even in the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association the orchestra was always badly balanced and insufficiently rehearsed, while it seldom consisted of the same players twice in succession. The Symphony Orchestra was founded, and during Mr. Henschel's administration of three years the first attempts at genuine organization were made, and the institution felt itself to be a lasting one—a career, in fact, for its members—a permanent situation, dependent only on themselves to keep and hold. Coming at this stage of affairs, Mr. Gericke has strengthened this position and greatly increased what might be called the self-confidence of the organization itself. Still, he had a body of men without traditions, and these he has himself supplied to them in an almost incredible degree, and so bound the institution still closer together. But beyond all this he has infused them with a spirit of genuine musicianly feeling; delicacy of detail and finish: just balance of tone and dynamic force; suppression of any individuality for the benefit of the general effect; in fact, he has taught them all the best and truest ideals for the orchestra player, and they not only will never forget them, but in their turn will teach these traditions to the newcomers just as is the case in the European orchestras. There is no doubt that Mr. Gericke has raised this orchestra to an equal position with the orchestras in Vienna and Munich, or Lamonieux's famous band in Paris—in fact, as aforesaid, it stands today most unquestionably as one of the four or five finest orchestras in the world, and this is all owing to Mr. Gericke's unflagging zeal and ambition, his incessant labor, and his unchangeable fidelity to the best and noblest artistic ideals. In going back to Vienna he carries with him the gratitude and best wishes of all musical Boston, and he may be sure that we shall never forget how much we owe to him of our artistic development and growth, and for a parting word let us say only—"Auf wiedersehen!"

Mr. Gericke's appearance last night was greeted with prolonged applause, and a number of people rose from their seats. Several wreaths and other floral offerings were grouped about his stand, among which the most noticeable was a large laurel wreath tied with a large knot of black and yellow ribbons, the Austrian colors. The programme was as follows:

Vorspiel und Verwandlungsmusik from "Parsifal" ..... R. Wagner
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... L. v. Beethoven

The choruses in the "Parsifal" music were sung by the Cecilia (Mr. Lang conducting the portions sung outside the hall), and the slight solos were sustained by Messrs. Winch and Morawski. On the whole, the selection was a very great artistic success. It doubtless loses almost all of that peculiar mysticism with which the whole "Parsifal" is imbued, but this is only apparent to those who have been so fortunate as to hear it in Bayreuth. The arrangement played last night is very effective and gives a comprehensive idea of the general thematic construction of this marvellous work. Still, it seems doubtful whether it is best to produce even this "authorized selection" on the concert stage.

The orchestra played magnificently. Every man seemed determined to do his best to make last night's concert a notable one in the musical history of Boston, and such it certainly was: they have, perhaps, never played so well before. Life, fire, beauty of tone, delicate finish—all that the most hypercritical listener could desire was easily obtained, and the ensemble was about perfect. The chorus also sang very well, with enthusiasm and accuracy and unusual rhythmic precision. The bells were not as effective as might be asked, but the choruses sung outside the hall quite filled the intention of a far-off, ethereal effect. Messrs. Winch and Morawski had very little to sing, but they both rendered their short passages in a completely satisfactory manner. The symphony was very well played, but would doubtless have been more effective if it had preceded the "Parsifal" music; as it was, the audience seemed to feel a strong sense of anti-climax.

At the close of the concert the applause was tremendous and the whole audience rose. Mr. Gericke—who was visibly much moved—spoke feelingly and appropriately. He thanked the audience for their kindness and their fidelity to him; he thanked Mr. Higginson for his confidence, and he thanked the orchestra for their patience and good-will, saying that he feared he had often been hard on them. He expressed great regret at the necessity of his departure, and, assuring the audience that he should always remember with pride and pleasure the days when he was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he bade them all a regretful farewell, and

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

Magnificent Playing, Immense Audience, Extreme Enthusiasm and a Hearty Good-Speed.

Last evening was one to be remembered long by all who were present at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert, both because of the pleasant personal relationship upon which it set the last seal, and because of its splendid accomplishment in musical art. Whatever a packed audience of the very finest and most distinguished quality, the closest attention, the wisest and warmest applause, and the tribute of laurel wreaths, ribbons and beautiful flowers could do to attest the "love and friending" of the musical public for the departing conductor, was done spontaneously, generally and liberally. The atmosphere of the evening was peculiarly and notably sympathetic, and this was evidently felt by the musicians, as well by their leader and by the audience.

The programme may have appeared a strange one at first, because it was made up of only two numbers—the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and the scene of the Holy Grail and the Holy Supper from the first act of that work, and Beethoven's fifth symphony. But the choice was after all a discreet and satisfactory one, because it gave for the best performance of the eminent conductor perhaps the greatest—certainly for most people the most impressive and beautiful—of Beethoven's symphonies, and an exquisitely dignified, tender and pure representation of the last, most refined, deep and serene dramatic work of the great but unequal genius of Wagner.

There is no need to comment upon the characteristics of the symphony or even to recall them, for whoever knows anything of orchestral music knows its majestic and yet enchanting progress from the bold, commanding and yet lingering phrases with which it begins, through the inexpressibly gracious andante, and the genial gayety of the allegro, to the cheering and ennobling life of the finale. The Wagner selection is necessarily far less known than much of its author's music, and some parts came entirely strange to the listeners of last evening. The prelude has been performed (a couple of times, I think,) by the Symphony orchestra, and much of the choral portion was sung by the Cecilia, but without orchestra, a year or so ago. The extracts gave a bit of the scene in which Gurnemanz leads Parsifal to the meeting of the Knights of the Grail, the music which accompanies the panoramic change of place—a change not unlike in scheme to that belonging with the "Rhine Journey" of Siegfried—the solemn entrance of the Knights into their hall of assembly, and the choruses which accompany the revelation of the Grail and the partaking of the Holy Supper. It is all truly beautiful, noble and sacred music, at times approaching as near as any human composition well could to what might be fancied to be an ideal of the celestial strains. While remitting nothing of his peculiar powers of development of a great edifice of commingling sounds and harmonies from some simply stated theme, and rising at times to his greatest heights of power, Wagner has herein shown something of his earlier self in the frequency and attractiveness of his melodies and in his kindly consideration for the human voice. Not only are the short dialogues of Parsifal and Gurnemanz fluent and natural, being difficult chiefly in their independence of the orchestral score and in the irregularity of their entrances, but the choruses are distinctly and gracefully melodious, and so distributed among different classes of choirs that the dramatic as well as the musical effect must be intensely interesting when the work can be given, as at Bayreuth, according to the author's intention. The long prelude, growing from its few grave and sustained themes, puts even those who hear it in a brilliantly lighted concert hall into a calm and serious mood, and the strains with which the impressive and unquestionably devotional scene of the Grail and ends the act leave a sweet, reposeful religious mood upon the mind. It seems scarcely possible that the same man who wrote the ugly, awkward, heavy, mechanical and wearisome stages which so often occur in the Nibelungen operas can have composed these others of such unbroken peace and elevation.

The performance of this selection was a delightful and consistent interpretation. The orchestra was augmented as much as necessary to give the score its balance, and was ready at all points in fullness or in delicacy. The soloists, Messrs. Morawski and W. J. Winch, who were called in at short notice, read their lines excellently, and the Cecilia sang the choruses to perfection, the small choir which represented the invisible singers and were withdrawn, therefore, to an ante-room, did especially well and were exact in time, tune and shading with the orchestral figures which they had to meet.

But it was in the playing of the symphony that the orchestra accomplished its most splendid achievement, and gave a reading which I believe no orchestra in the world could surpass and few equal. At the last regular concert the men played as if they had suddenly found the one degree of fire and spirit which had been lacking to raise their elegance and grace and accuracy up the plane of high spirituality, and now they surpassed even that memorable work. Such perfection of detail, even in passages as difficult and dangerous as the double-bass figures in the third movement, the many odd entrances for single instruments all through the symphony, and the sudden changes in the rhythm of the under parts from time to time—I have never heard, while at the same time there were all the warmth, the spring, the freedom and the fulness which the greatest admirer of a bold and urgent style could ask. Every movement was applauded, and at the close the whole audience rose to its feet with cheers and bravos.

Everybody recognized that this was a unique occasion in the history of orchestral music in Boston, and nobody was ready to leave the hall until some unusual proof of this had been added to the performance. Mr. Gericke was called forward repeatedly, and bowed deeply and widely. But this was not enough, and at last, pale with feeling and speaking nervously and tremulously, he made his adieu in a few well-chosen and clearly-spoken sentences, in which he expressed his regret at leaving his position, his thanks to public, critics and orchestra, as well as to Mr. Higginson, and his appreciation of what has been done here for him and for the cause of music. Even then the audience dispersed reluctantly, but in most harmonious and comfortable mood. And so passes away from Boston a man to whom the city, the country and the cause of his art owe a great obligation which will be long and gratefully remembered.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with assistance of

EMINENT SOLOISTS,

will give a series of

FIVE CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 31st, December 12th, 1889, January 9th, February 6th, March 13th, 1890.

Season Tickets, with Reserved Seats for the Series, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Wednesday, October 23d. Sale opens at 8 A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET,

FRANZ KNEIZEL, 1ST VIOLIN,
OTTO ROTH, 2D VIOLIN,
L. SVEČENSKI, VIOLA,
ANTON HEKKING, VIOLONCELLO,

with assistance of

MRS. CORINNE MOORE LAWSON,
MISS ROSE STEWART,
MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,
MR. ERNST PERABO,
MR. ARTHUR FOOTE,

and others, will give a series of

SIX SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS,

in

CHICKERING HALL,

on

MONDAY EVENINGS,

October 28th, December 2d, and 30th, 1889, January 27th, February 24th, and March 31st, 1890.

Season Tickets with Reserved Seats for the Series, Six Dollars, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday, October 21st, at 9 A. M. Subscription List now open at Music Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FADED TEXT

[2]

POST.

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

After five years of earnest and unremitting artistic labor—which has been crowned with great and well deserved success—Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has decided to return to his own country, and no better proof could be desired of the debt of gratitude which the public feels towards him than the presence of the enormous and enthusiastic audience which assembled last night to bid him godspeed.

During Mr. Gericke's stay here he has met with some opposition in minor details; some considering his programmes badly chosen, others finding a lack of warmth and feeling in his interpretations, while still others may have thought that breadth and strength were often sacrificed to finish and detail. But these are all very trifling matters after all. What Mr. Gericke has done is to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the four or five greatest orchestras of the world, and the difficulties in his way have been very great. It is true that the princely liberality of the founder of these concerts has relieved the conductor from all financial anxiety, but there are, in the course of such an institution, other obstacles quite as great and as difficult to overcome. For example, the celebrated orchestras in Europe have all existed for at least several generations; they have received their traditions of Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann (with many others) from those great masters themselves, and a young musician joining the orchestra receives these traditions from its older members. He becomes completely imbued with them, and in his turn passes them on again, and thus the warm artistic ideals of such an institution are almost as fresh as when they were first received, and it is impossible to exaggerate the help this is to a conductor. How different is this here. Until the foundation of the Symphony Orchestra eight years ago there was practically no standing orchestra worthy the name in the city. Up to that time the instrumental music furnished was of a very indifferent nature, and even in the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association the orchestra was always badly balanced and insufficiently rehearsed, while it seldom consisted of the same players twice in succession. The Symphony Orchestra was founded, and during Mr. Henschel's administration of three years the first attempts at genuine organization were made, and the institution felt itself to be a lasting one—a career, in fact, for its members—a permanent situation, dependent only on themselves to keep and hold. Coming at this stage of affairs, Mr. Gericke has strengthened this position and greatly increased what might be called the self-confidence of the organization itself. Still, he had a body of men without traditions, and these he has himself supplied to them in an almost incredible degree, and so bound the institution still closer together. But beyond all this he has infused them with a spirit of genuine musicianly feeling; delicacy of detail and finish: just balance of tone and dynamic force; suppression of any individuality for the benefit of the general effect; in fact, he has taught them all the best and truest ideals for the orchestra player, and they not only will never forget them, but in their turn will teach these traditions to the newcomers just as is the case in the European orchestras. There is no doubt that Mr. Gericke has raised this orchestra to an equal position with the orchestras in Vienna and Munich, or Lamonieux's famous band in Paris—in fact, as aforesaid, it stands today most unquestionably as one of the four or five finest orchestras in the world, and this is all owing to Mr. Gericke's unflagging zeal and ambition, his incessant labor, and his unchangeable fidelity to the best and noblest artistic ideals. In going back to Vienna he carries with him the gratitude and best wishes of all musical Boston, and he may be sure that we shall never forget how much we owe to him of our artistic development and growth, and for a parting word let us say only—"Auf wiedersehen!"

Mr. Gericke's appearance last night was greeted with prolonged applause, and a number of people rose from their seats. Several wreaths and other floral offerings were grouped about his stand, among which the most noticeable was a large laurel wreath tied with a large knot of black and yellow ribbons, the Austrian colors. The programme was as follows:

Vorspiel und Verwandlungsmusik from "Parsifal" ..... R. Wagner
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 .. L. v. Beethoven

The choruses in the "Parsifal" music were sung by the Cecilia (Mr. Lang conducting the portions sung outside the hall), and the slight solos were sustained by Messrs. Winch and Morawski. On the whole, the selection was a very great artistic success. It doubtless loses almost all of that peculiar mysticism with which the whole "Parsifal" is imbued, but this is only apparent to those who have been so fortunate as to hear it in Bayreuth. The arrangement played last night is very effective and gives a comprehensive idea of the general thematic construction of this marvellous work. Still, it seems doubtful whether it is best to produce even this "authorized selection" on the concert stage.

The orchestra played magnificently. Every man seemed determined to do his best to make last night's concert a notable one in the musical history of Boston, and such it certainly was: they have, perhaps, never played so well before. Life, fire, beauty of tone, delicate finish—all that the most hypercritical listener could desire was easily obtained, and the ensemble was about perfect. The chorus also sang very well, with enthusiasm and accuracy and unusual rhythmic precision. The bells were not as effective as might be asked, but the choruses sung outside the hall quite filled the intention of a far-off, ethereal effect. Messrs. Winch and Morawski had very little to sing, but they both rendered their short passages in a completely satisfactory manner. The symphony was very well played, but would doubtless have been more effective if it had preceded the "Parsifal" musik; as it was, the audience seemed to feel a strong sense of anti-climax.

At the close of the concert the applause was tremendous and the whole audience rose. Mr. Gericke—who was visibly much moved—spoke feelingly and appropriately. He thanked the audience for their kindness and their fidelity to him; he thanked Mr. Higginson for his confidence, and he thanked the orchestra for their patience and good-will, saying that he feared he had often been hard on them. He expressed great regret at the necessity of his departure, and, assuring the audience that he should always remember with pride and pleasure the days when he was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he bade them all a regretful farewell. And, indeed, we will not forget him personally; and as for his work here, that will surely never be forgotten, for it was monumental.

GLOBE.

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

Magnificent Playing, Immense Audience, Extreme Enthusiasm and a Hearty Good-Speed.

Last evening was one to be remembered long by all who were present at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert, both because of the pleasant personal relationship upon which it set the last seal, and because of its splendid accomplishment in musical art. Whatever a packed audience of the very finest and most distinguished quality, the closest attention, the wisest and warmest applause, and the tribute of laurel wreaths, ribbons and beautiful flowers could do to attest the "love and friending" of the musical public for the departing conductor, was done spontaneously, generally and liberally. The atmosphere of the evening was peculiarly and notably sympathetic, and this was evidently felt by the musicians, as well by their leader and by the audience.

The programme may have appeared a strange one at first, because it was made up of only two numbers—the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and the scene of the Holy Grail and the Holy Supper from the first act of that work, and Beethoven's fifth symphony. But the choice was after all a discreet and satisfactory one, because it gave for the best performance of the eminent conductor perhaps the greatest—certainly for most people the most impressive and beautiful—of Beethoven's symphonies, and an exquisitely dignified, tender and pure representation of the last, most refined, deep and serene dramatic work of the great but unequal genius of Wagner.

There is no need to comment upon the characteristics of the symphony or even to recall them, for whoever knows anything of orchestral music knows its majestic and yet enchanting progress from the bold, commanding and yet lingering phrases with which it begins, through the inexpressibly gracious andante, and the genial gayety of the allegro, to the cheering and ennobling life of the finale. The Wagner selection is necessarily far less known than much of its author's music, and some parts came entirely strange to the listeners of last evening. The prelude has been performed (a couple of times, I think,) by the Symphony orchestra, and much of the choral portion was sung by the Cecilia, but without orchestra, a year or so ago. The extracts gave a bit of the scene in which Gurnemanz leads Parsifal to the meeting of the Knights of the Grail, the music which accompanies the panoramic change of place—a change not unlike in scheme to that belonging with the "Rhine Journey" of Siegfried—the solemn entrance of the Knights into their hall of assembly, and the choruses which accompany the revelation of the Grail and the partaking of the Holy Supper. It is all truly beautiful, noble and sacred music, at times approaching as near as any human composition well could to what might be fancied to be an ideal of the celestial strains. While remitting nothing of his peculiar powers of development of a great edifice of commingling sounds and harmonies from some simply stated theme, and rising at times to his greatest heights of power, Wagner has herein shown something of his earlier self in the frequency and attractiveness of his melodies and in his kindly consideration for the human voice. Not only are the short dialogues of Parsifal and Gurnemanz fluent and natural, being difficult chiefly in their independence of the orchestral score and in the irregularity of their entrances, but the choruses are distinctly and gracefully melodious and so distributed among different classes of choirs that the dramatic as well as the musical effect must be intensely interesting when the work can be given, as at Bayreuth, according to the author's intention. The long prelude, growing from its few grave and sustained themes, puts even those who hear it in a brilliantly lighted concert hall into a calm and serious mood, and the strains with which the impressive and unquestionably devotional scene of the Grail and ends the act leave a sweet, reposeful religious mood upon the mind. It seems scarcely possible that the same man who wrote the ugly, awkward, heavy, mechanical and wearisome stages which so often occur in the Nibelungen operas can have composed these others of such unbroken peace and elevation.

The performance of this selection was a delightful and consistent interpretation. The orchestra was augmented as much as necessary to give the score its balance, and was ready at all points in fullness or in delicacy. The soloists, Messrs. Morawski and W. J. Winch, who were called in at short notice, read their lines excellently, and the Cecilia sang the choruses to perfection, the small choir which represented the invisible singers and were withdrawn, therefore, to an ante-room, did especially well and were exact in time, tune and shading with the orchestral figures which they had to meet.

But it was in the playing of the symphony that the orchestra accomplished its most splendid achievement, and gave a reading which I believe no orchestra in the world could surpass and few equal. At the last regular concert the men played as if they had suddenly found the one degree of fire and spirit which had been lacking to raise their elegance and grace and accuracy up the plane of high spirituality, and now they surpassed even that memorable work. Such perfection of detail, even in passages as difficult and dangerous as the double-bass figures in the third movement, the many odd entrances for single instruments all through the symphony, and the sudden changes in the rhythm of the under parts from time to time—I have never heard, while at the same time there were all the warmth, the spring, the freedom and the fulness which the greatest admirer of a bold and urgent style could ask. Every movement was applauded, and at the close the whole audience rose to its feet with cheers and bravos.

Everybody recognized that this was a unique occasion in the history of orchestral music in Boston, and nobody was ready to leave the hall until some unusual proof of this had been added to the performance. Mr. Gericke was called forward repeatedly, and bowed deeply and widely. But this was not enough, and at last, pale with feeling and speaking nervously and tremulously, he made his adieu in a few well-chosen and clearly-spoken sentences, in which he expressed his regret at leaving his position, his thanks to public, critics and orchestra, as well as to Mr. Higginson, and his appreciation of what has been done here for him and for the cause of music. Even then the audience dispersed reluctantly, but in most harmonious and comfortable mood. And so passes away from Boston a man to whom the city, the country and the cause of his art owe a great obligation which will be long and gratefully remembered.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[3]

July 14 89

HERALD

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

An Interview with the Coming Boston Conductor.

Glimpses of His Life in Leipsic—He Chats About His New Duties with the Symphony Orchestra—A Recent Photograph Reproduced—To Arrive in September.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

LEIPSIC, June 20, 1889. After the turmoil of Paris it is a welcome change to turn one's steps toward Germany. The exposition is an undeniable success, but Paris cannot be thoroughly enjoyed in an exposition year. The success of the exposition is at the expense of the visitors to the city, who, whether they enter the gates of the great display or not, suffer from the increased bustle and crowd, and must pay their full proportion of its great cost. The latter feature is very marked. Arriving at the same hotel at which a stay of some weeks was made a year or two before, one is met by a greatly enhanced scale of prices for the same rooms and a new tariff for meals, which, it is explained, exist during the exposition season only. Expostulation only brings out the reply that the advance is rendered necessary by the increased cost of service and food incident to the exposition. Even the bootblacks at the street corners have met in solemn conclave, and have agreed that no boots shall be polished save at a charge of 20 centimes (4 cents), just double the time honored rate.

All this, as has been already hinted, makes the traveller long for more restful scenes, and here in Leipsic the quiet city is even stiller than usual, since there is everywhere, even from Germany, which is supposed to cherish no great affection for France and its works, a positive exodus toward the gay city.

Naturally, on arrival, a true Bostonian directs his first steps toward the handsome Stadt Theatre, where presides, as the head of allthings musical, Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is soon to wield the baton over the orchestra which Boston, with pardonable pride, claims to be the orchestra par excellence of all America. And certainly, to digress a moment, a hearing of the famous orchestra of M. Colonne at a concert given in the spacious and beautiful music hall of the Trocadero in Paris, does not indicate that in that quarter at least Boston has anything to learn. Escaping the pitfalls that beset a stranger in Germany by the slightest possible inkling of the language, and a fortunate exercise of a Yankee's proverbial talent for guessing, the bureau or business department of the theatre is shortly reached. In response to a card there soon appeared a short, lithe man, with dark and rather sallow complexion, thoughtful face and expressive eyes. Greetings were exchanged and the writer thus obtained his first view of Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is to become a familiar figure to musical Boston. Not much more than two months ago his native tongue was the only one of which he could boast. But so nimble has been his intelligence, and so keen his desire to acquire the English language, that scarcely any difficulty is experienced in giving and receiving congratulations. The pictures published in the Boston papers soon after the engagement of Herr Nikisch was made public appear to have been taken from an old photograph that fails to give an accurate idea of his personal appearance now. In order that HERALD readers may become familiar with the coming director of the Symphony concerts, I send herewith a photograph of recent date that presents Herr Nikisch as he looked when I in the interest of the Boston musical public.

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Chatted with Him

After a few moments of conversation, Mr. Nikisch excused himself to attend a rehearsal of the opera of the "Huguenots," which was to be given the same evening. Later, in the pleasant rooms of the Hotel de Prusse, finely situated on the Ross Platz, and in front of the new promenade, the interview was continued, with the occasional kind assistance of Mr. Meery, the stage manager of the Stadt Theatre, who will be pleasantly remembered by Bostonians as not long since a member of the Boston Museum company. Mr. Nikisch is evidently full of anticipation of the pleasure of entering upon a work so congenial in a field so much broader than that which he now occupies. From American visitors and residents he has already received flattering impressions of the orchestra and the public with which he is to cast his lot. The watchful care of the management has already made him acquainted with the few places where change may be necessary or desirable, and he is on the alert to secure the few artists now needed. The names of those he will bring with him we will soon be able to announce. In response to an inquiry as to what, if any, new works he would take over with him, he said that, having been furnished with the catalogue of the library of the orchestra, he found it to contain everything that could be desired, and to be as complete as those of the European orchestras. After a pleasant talk of an hour and a half the interview terminated, to be resumed by appointment at the close of the opera. The interval was employed in strolling about the city. And here, wherever one went, there was a universal expression of regret at the impending loss in a musical way which the city is to sustain. This expression was equally fervid from artists with whom Mr. Nikisch has been associated and with non-professional music lovers in Leipsic, to whom he has greatly endeared himself. All were at a loss to see how his place was to be made good. He seems regarded here as the embodiment of [illegible] in Society closure far below the stage and parquet, so that only the head of the conductor was visible. Boston concert goers who have for five years watched with interest the slight spot of white on the crown of the former leader of the Symphony orchestra will be interested to know that no such mark of distinction is as yet apparent on that of Herr Nikish. He has a bushy head of black hair, which is apt to assume a slightly unkempt appearance as the evening wears on. He controls his orchestra and guides choruses and soloists with the easy, graceful motion of one who is thoroughly familiar with his score and has his forces well under control. The tremendous passages in Meyerbeer's opera offer a constant temptation toward overpowering orchestral force; yet not once was the due proportion of vocal and instrumental work lost. It would seem that in this feature, which was one of Mr. Gericke's especial excellencies, nothing is to be lost by the change.

Opera in Germany usually begins at 6:30. At 10, therefore, the performance was over and there was time for a few minutes' conversation with Herr Nikish at the cafe connected with the theatre. He showed but few traces of his exhausting work of the past three hours, and after a pleasant interchange of farewell greetings the interview terminated, to be resumed, if all goes well, in Boston, Herr Nikish having engaged passage from Bremen in the steamer of Sept. 7.

A summing up of one's impressions of this visit to Leipsic derived from the expressions of personal affection for and artistic pride in the man as repeated among all classes of the people, and from a favorable opportunity to judge personally of him and his work, leaves no room to doubt that the musical life of Boston is to receive through Herr Arthur Nikish an impetus not less marked than has characterized the two previous administrations which have become treasured epochs in its history.

[illegible] given. The [illegible] in this ovation, and Mr. Nikisch stepped with rare grace and dignity upon the flower-bedecked stand and bowed his acknowledgment of the welcoming applause. His personal appearance has been often described in these columns, but it needed a sight of the man as he stood before his orchestra, with baton raised high in air, before beginning the "Meistersinger" vorspiel to realize all the personal characteristics of the new conductor. Although of such short stature that he is compelled to use an additional eight inch platform to bring him to a convenient level before his men, he has a commanding presence that fixes and holds the attention of the audience without apparent effort, and it is easy to see that he has the most absolute control of his men. He raps his men to attention upon the nearest music stand before ascending his throne-like stand, and calmly awaits the attention of his men in an easy and graceful pose. The programme of the evening consisted of four numbers, as follows:

Vorspiel (Die Meistersinger)	Wagner
Overture (Coriolanus)	Beethoven
Entr'acte (Rosamunde)	Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4	Schumann

Nothing in the selections or their arrangement gave evidence of a change in the conductor from last season, as it was just such a list of numbers as would have been expected from Mr. Nikisch's predecessor. The all too prevailing use of slang, and quotations from the topical songs of the day, can but be regretted, upon general principles, yet it must be admitted that the young man who hummed softly in his companion's ear, as he glanced down the programme, "We've both been there before, many a time," was most successful in making his opinion upon the evening's selections understood. The delight of the audience knew no bounds at the conclusion of the vorspiel, and the hall fairly rung with the enthusiastic applause its performance called out. Each new effort was similarly rewarded, and, as the short programme was ended, the new conductor was fairly wearied with the demonstrations in his honor. In order that the fairest possible estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities should be had, an invitation was extended to five representative musicians to state their opinions of the new conductor as formed after a first hearing of his work. Each of these gentlemen kindly accepted the invitation, and gave the following opinions immediately after the concert before comparing their opinions or in any way committing themselves as to their estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities:

CARL ZERRAHN'S OPINIONS.

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, who knows something about the duties of a conductor from experience and realizes the trials and difficulties with which the director of any large orchestra has to contend, was seen after the close of the concert last evening. He was asked to criticise the work of the orchestra and that of its conductor, but he had evidently been so carried away with what he considered the excellence of the performance that he could not pick out any one thing more than another to condemn or praise. In fact, all that could be obtained from him were expressions of the fullest praise and most hearty indorsements of Mr. Nikisch as a leader and as a man. His answers to the questions of the interviewer appear below. He said, after a cordial greeting, and in answer to the question of what he thought of the new conductor:

"I can only say to you what I felt sure must be true when I heard that Mr. Nikisch was coming to Boston. I knew that a conductor who had been successful there must be so in Boston. There could be no question about it. I also knew before I asked Mr. Nikisch 'How do you like the orchestra?' what must be his answer. He said: 'I am delighted with it. It is a magnificent orchestra. One can do with that orchestra as he pleases. It is one of the most intelligent orchestras I ever found. The greatest intelligence pervades the orchestra.' That I also knew beforehand."

When asked as to whether Mr. Nikisch came up to his ideas of the qualifications of a conductor, Mr. Zerrahn replied: "Perfectly. I have nothing but praise."

"Then, he is not simply a drillmaster, as Mr. Gericke has sometimes been termed?" said the reporter. At this question Mr. Zerrahn smiled in a manner which indicated that he had not the least idea that Mr. Nikisch could be called a "drillmaster" by any one who knew him—a sort of incredulous smile. In answer by words he said: "No, Mr. Nikisch is not a drillmaster. He is a conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

In reply to a question as to whether he wished to make to make any criticism of the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said: "I have nothing to criticise; nothing but praise." On being asked if there was not some part which he would praise more than another, he replied: "It was all splendid. I do not care to pick out any one one portion more than another. I admire his conception of the 'Coriolanus' overture."

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., one [illegible] Both in this and [illegible] programme, the symph[illegible] at the end, whether that is [illegible] settled conviction or from a consideration of special conditions, remains to be seen. It is natural enough that Mr. Nikisch should step slowly in regard to novelties in the very outset, as he certainly is doing. But he will soon find out where the wishes and the expectations of Boston lie, and his European record bespeaks for him a wide and catholic taste in the composition of his programmes.

R. A.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

early in the programme. It depends on the make-up of the programme. I think it is a mistake to put the symphony always at the last. But tonight I like the arrangement of the programme. I am perfectly delighted with the performance. Mr. Nikisch is a new inspiration to the orchestra, and they cannot fail to produce splendid results under his sympathetic guidance. All the orchestra like him, which is a great point in his favor, and which could not be said of the previous conductor."

GEORGE L. OSGOOD'S VIEWS.

You ask at the outset if I like the symphony at the end of the programme? Yes, I do. It is the climax of the programme. After I have listened to the symphony and analyzed it thoroughly en passant, I am satisfied then to go. I consider this and the following concert most charmingly and effectively arranged. The programme had a beautiful musical color. Before we had gone many bars into the Vorspiel of the "Meistersinger" I felt assured that we had found great talent in Mr. Nikisch. I care little or nothing for the hair-splitting comparisons of the conductor's tempi, provided we get a musician with heart and head. Nikisch has both. My decided impression of Nikisch is that the heart speaks first and the strong brain controls the expression. For want of better words to explain my meaning, I will use the German words auffassung, empfindung und gefuehl. Without analyzing the various impressions which I received, I would say at the outset that Nikisch has the rare power of managing his orchestra with absolute musical freedom. An immense point is his power in using the tempo rubato, rarely heard to perfection in orchestral playing—indeed, to my mind one of the sure signs of a musician by nature. I was struck with this from the very first measures of the first piece through the entire programme. This characteristic went on increasing without pause to the very end. This freedom with which Nikisch manages his orchestra is not a mechanical one; it comes from pure musical inspiration.

Passing over the first three pieces of the programme, I will go at once to the symphony. It seems to me characteristic of the man that he chose this particular symphony for his first programme, and it, more than anything else on the programme, gave me an insight into the musical character of the man. The music of Schumann belongs to the school of pure romance. How often have we heard this symphony when its performance seemed to be directed by a schoolmaster rather than by a musician. Tonight it was romantic from beginning to end. The tempi rubati were delicious. The musical, heart felt rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument.

This rare talent in Nikisch will be even more apparent as the season progresses, and the orchestra become better acquainted with the temperament of their new conductor. I look forward to a rare treat in the Saturday night Symphony concerts.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

BERNHARD LISTEMAN'S VIEWS.

Mr. Nikisch seems to me superior in all essential points to his two predecessors, Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. He makes orchestras speak as an individual would speak. To make this plain, we have to recall the work that Henschel and Gericke did here. Mr. Henschel, who started and possibly orignated the idea of a symphony orchestra, brought as a practical orchestra conductor, little experience with him. He was a warm-feeling and enthusiastic musician of great general knowledge, and he succeeded in giving in the course of time some highly poetical performances of works for which he felt a filing their certificates of nomination as early special interest. Still, he was not able to give an individuality or pronounced character to the performances of the orchestra.

His successor, Mr. Gericke, possessed a great deal more orchestral experience, though he was not too well fitted for the specific work in Boston when he assumed the duties of his office. His nature was of a refined, calculating kind, and he brought the technical abilities of the orchestra to a really high pith of excellence. His defect was the lack of soul and heart, which prevented him, possibly, from looking into the greater depths of the work.

Mr. Nikisch seems to combine all the principal qualities of his two predecessors. His interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a follower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many, and probably opposed by some others. The selections at the first concert seem to me to be characteristically slow. I may say, on the other hand, it was delightful to notice how well he worked up his crescendos, and notice with what an energy certain departments of the orchestra followed his intentions, noticeably the brass instruments, that used to be, under Mr. Gericke's direction, so subdued that the performances of the same department of the German opera orchestra, under Mr. Seidl's direction, seemed to be a real revelation. Surely, orchestra and public will thank the new conductor for his efforts in this direction. As Mr. Nikisch's mission will be to teach and educate his audiences, so I might suggest that he on his part should learn to appreciate the digestive capacities of the patrons of these concerts, who may be far ahead of his Leipsic audiences in this respect. Another thing he has to perfect himself in is in the arrangement of the programme. Two overtures, one following the other, is a venture before a Boston audience that will not be greatly appreciated, and it is still more questionable that he has selected for the opening piece of his second concert one which, by its peculiar character, is anything but an opening piece. In connection with this matter, I might say that, thankful as the few connoisseurs may be to hear for them the principal work of the evening as a grand finale, the great majority of the audience would prefer by far to listen to it when they are in a state to do so without effort.

Mr. Nikisch is certainly a conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Appearance.

An Estimate of His Abilities Made by Messrs. Carl Zerrahn, B. J. Lang, John K. Paine, George L. Osgood and Bernhard Listemann—Enthusiastic Praise of the New Conductor.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening proved an event of unusual interest, by reason of its being the occasion of the first formal appearance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor chosen by Mr. Higginson to succeed Mr. Gericke at the head of the organization. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, every seat having been sold for the entire season, and the limit of admission tickets being reached before the concert began. It was such an audience as has been seen half of each of the past eight years each Saturday evening, a large proportion of those in attendance occupying much the same location as in former years. The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for a demonstration that must have shown the newcomer to Boston's musical circles that nothing but good feeling was felt toward him by those for whose enjoyment his labors of the season will be given. The orchestra men joined heartily in this ovation, and Mr. Nikisch stepped with rare grace and dignity upon the flower-bedecked stand and bowed his acknowledgment of the welcoming applause. His personal appearance has been often described in these columns, but it needed a sight of the man as he stood before his orchestra, with baton raised high in air, before beginning the "Meistersinger" vorspiel to realize all the personal characteristics of the new conductor. Although of such short stature that he is compelled to use an additional eight inch platform to bring him to a convenient level before his men, he has a commanding presence that fixes and holds the attention of the audience without apparent effort, and it is easy to see that he has the most absolute control of his men. He raps his men to attention upon the nearest music stand before ascending his throne-like stand, and calmly awaits the attention of his men in an easy and graceful pose. The programme of the evening consisted of four numbers, as follows:

Vorspiel (Die Meistersinger)	Wagner
Overture (Coriolanus)	Beethoven
Entr'acte (Rosamunde)	Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4	Schumann

Nothing in the selections or their arrangement gave evidence of a change in the conductor from last season, as it was just such a list of numbers as would have been expected from Mr. Nikisch's predecessor. The all too prevailing use of slang, and quotations from the topical songs of the day, can but be regretted, upon general principles, yet it must be admitted that the young man who hummed softly in his companion's ear, as he glanced down the programme, "We've both been there before, many a time," was most successful in making his opinion upon the evening's selections understood. The delight of the audience knew no bounds at the conclusion of the vorspiel, and the hall fairly rung with the enthusiastic applause its performance called out. Each new effort was similarly rewarded, and, as the short programme was ended, the new conductor was fairly wearied with the demonstrations in his honor. In order that the fairest possible estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities should be had, an invitation was extended to five representative musicians to state their opinions of the new conductor as formed after a first hearing of his work. Each of these gentlemen kindly accepted the invitation, and gave the following opinions immediately after the concert before comparing their opinions or in any way committing themselves as to their estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities:

CARL ZERRAHN'S OPINIONS.

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, who knows something about the duties of a conductor from experience and realizes the trials and difficulties with which the director of any large orchestra has to contend, was seen after the close of the concert last evening. He was asked to criticise the work of the orchestra and that of its conductor, but he had evidently been so carried away with what he considered the excellence of the performance that he could not pick out any one thing more than another to condemn or praise. In fact, all that could be obtained from him were expressions of the fullest praise and most hearty indorsements of Mr. Nikisch as a leader and as a man. His answers to the questions of the interviewer appear below. He said, after a cordial greeting, and in answer to the question of what he thought of the new conductor:

"I can only say to you what I felt sure must be true when I heard that Mr. Nikisch was coming to Boston. I knew that a conductor who had been successful there must be so in Boston. There could be no question about it. I also knew before I asked Mr. Nikisch 'How do you like the orchestra?' what must be his answer. He said: 'I am delighted with it. It is a magnificent orchestra. One can do with that orchestra as he pleases. It is one of the most intelligent orchestras I ever found. The greatest intelligence pervades the orchestra.' That I also knew beforehand."

When asked as to whether Mr. Nikisch came up to his ideas of the qualifications of a conductor, Mr. Zerrahn replied: "Perfectly. I have nothing but praise."

"Then, he is not simply a drillmaster, as Mr. Gericke has sometimes been termed?" said the reporter. At this question Mr. Zerrahn smiled in a manner which indicated that he had not the least idea that Mr. Nikisch could be called a "drillmaster" by any one who knew him—a sort of incredulous smile. In answer by words he said: "No, Mr. Nikisch is not a drillmaster. He is a conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

In reply to a question as to whether he wished to make to make any criticism of the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said: "I have nothing to criticise; nothing but praise." On being asked if there was not some part which he would praise more than another, he replied: "It was all splendid. I do not care to pick out any one one portion more than another. I admire his conception of the 'Coriolanus' overture."

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., one early in the programme. It depends on the make-up of the programme. I think it is a mistake to put the symphony always at the last. But tonight I like the arrangement of the programme. I am perfectly delighted with the performance. Mr. Nikisch is a new inspiration to the orchestra, and they cannot fail to produce splendid results under his sympathetic guidance. All the orchestra like him, which is a great point in his favor, and which could not be said of the previous conductor."

THE SUNDAY HERALD

GEORGE L. OSGOOD'S VIEWS.

You ask at the outset if I like the symphony at the end of the programme? Yes, I do. It is the climax of the programme. After I have listened to the symphony and analyzed it thoroughly en passant, I am satisfied then to go. I consider this and the following concert most charmingly and effectively arranged. The programme had a beautiful musical color. Before we had gone many bars into the Vorspiel of the "Meistersinger" I felt assured that we had found great talent in Mr. Nikisch. I care little or nothing for the hair-splitting comparisons of the conductor's tempi, provided we get a musician with heart and head. Nikisch has both. My decided impression of Nikisch is that the heart speaks first and the strong brain controls the expression. For want of better words to explain my meaning, I will use the German words auffassung, empfindung und gefuehl. Without analyzing the various impressions which I received, I would say at the outset that Nikisch has the rare power of managing his orchestra with absolute musical freedom. An immense point is his power in using the tempo rubato, rarely heard to perfection in orchestral playing—indeed, to my mind one of the sure signs of a musician by nature. I was struck with this from the very first measures of the first piece through the entire programme. This characteristic went on increasing without pause to the very end. This freedom with which Nikisch manages his orchestra is not a mechanical one; it comes from pure musical inspiration.

Passing over the first three pieces of the programme, I will go at once to the symphony. It seems to me characteristic of the man that he chose this particular symphony for his first programme, and it, more than anything else on the programme, gave me an insight into the musical character of the man. The music of Schumann belongs to the school of pure romance. How often have we heard this symphony when its performance seemed to be directed by a schoolmaster rather than by a musician. Tonight it was romantic from beginning to end. The tempi rubati were delicious. The musical, heart felt rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument.

This rare talent in Nikisch will be even more apparent as the season progresses, and the orchestra become better acquainted with the temperament of their new conductor. I look forward to a rare treat in the Saturday night Symphony concerts.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

BERNHARD LISTEMAN'S VIEWS.

Mr. Nikisch seems to me superior in all essential points to his two predecessors, Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. He makes orchestras speak as an individual would speak. To make this plain, we have to recall the work that Henschel and Gericke did here. Mr. Henschel, who started and possibly orignated the idea of a symphony orchestra, brought as a practical orchestra conductor, little experience with him. He was a warm-feeling and enthusiastic musician of great general knowledge, and he succeeded in giving in the course of time some highly poetical performances of works for which he felt a filing their certificates of nomination as early special interest. Still, he was not able to give an individuality or pronounced character to the performances of the orchestra.

His successor, Mr. Gericke, possessed a great deal more orchestral experience, though he was not too well fitted for the specific work in Boston when he assumed the duties of his office. His nature was of a refined, calculating kind, and he brought the technical abilities of the orchestra to a really high pith of excellence. His defect was the lack of soul and heart, which prevented him, possibly, from looking into the greater depths of the work.

Mr. Nikisch seems to combine all the principal qualities of his two predecessors. His interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a follower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many, and probably opposed by some others. The selections at the first concert seem to me to be characteristically slow. I may say, on the other hand, it was delightful to notice how well he worked up his crescendos, and notice with what an energy certain departments of the orchestra followed his intentions, noticeably the brass instruments, that used to be, under Mr. Gericke's direction, so subdued that the performances of the same department of the German opera orchestra, under Mr. Seidl's direction, seemed to be a real revelation. Surely, orchestra and public will thank the new conductor for his efforts in this direction. As Mr. Nikisch's mission will be to teach and educate his audiences, so I might suggest that he on his part should learn to appreciate the digestive capacities of the patrons of these concerts, who may be far ahead of his Leipsic audiences in this respect. Another thing he has to perfect himself in is in the arrangement of the programme. Two overtures, one following the other, is a venture before a Boston audience that will not be greatly appreciated, and it is still more questionable that he has selected for the opening piece of his second concert one which, by its peculiar character, is anything but an opening piece. In connection with this matter, I might say that, thankful as the few connoisseurs may be to hear for them the principal work of the evening as a grand finale, the great majority of the audience would prefer by far to listen to it when they are in a state to do so without effort.

Mr. Nikisch is certainly a conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., one [illegible] more is this danger, however, in such freedom, that only in the hands of a master is it safe. Should the lesser leaders of orchestral forces fall too in imitation, there will be much sad work done.

It is needless to say that the orchestra itself as magnificent in tonal beauty and in technical finish as ever; its pliability in its new conductor's hands was remarkable, and will, of course, increase as acquaintance with his methods and wishes grows. There is scarcely a change in the composition of the orchestra, the most important being the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Giese, and of three minor players in the ranks.

The next programme includes Brahms's variation on a theme by Haydn, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," and Beethoven's seventh symphony, while Mr. Hekking will play a concerto for 'cello by Goltermann and some short pieces.

[3]

July 14 89

HERALD.

...HS A SILVER LINING.

Future of the Democracy of the Bay State.

The Hands Into Which It Will Be Intrusted.

Old Campaigners Must Soon Give up the Reins.

Ultimate Democratic Success Said to Be Assured.

...only. ...orning of Victory ...ply that the ...

...by the increased cost of service and food incident to the exposition. Even the bootblacks at the street corners have met in solemn conclave, and have agreed that no boots shall be polished save at a charge of 20 centimes (4 cents), just double the time honored rate.

All this, as has been already hinted, makes the traveller long for more restful scenes, and here in Leipsic the quiet city is even stiller than usual, since there is everywhere, even from Germany, which is supposed to cherish no great affection for France and its works, a positive exodus toward the gay city.

Naturally, on arrival, a true Bostonian directs his first steps toward the handsome Stadt Theatre, where presides, as the head of allthings musical, Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is soon to wield the baton over the orchestra which Boston, with pardonable pride, claims to be the orchestra par excellence of all America. And certainly, to digress a moment, a hearing of the famous orchestra of M. Colonne at a concert given in the spacious and beautiful music hall of the Trocadero in Paris, does not indicate that in that quarter at least Boston has anything to learn. Escaping the pitfalls that beset a stranger in Germany by the slightest possible inkling of the language, and a fortunate exercise of a Yankee's proverbial talent for guessing, the bureau or business department of the theatre is shortly reached. In response to a card there soon appeared a short, lithe man, with dark and rather sallow complexion, thoughtful face and expressive eyes. Greetings were exchanged and the writer thus obtained his first view of Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is to become a familiar figure to musical Boston. Not much more than two months ago his native tongue was the only one of which he could boast. But so nimble has been his intelligence, and so keen his desire to acquire the English language, that scarcely any difficulty is experienced in giving and receiving congratulations. The pictures published in the Boston papers soon after the engagement of Herr Nikisch was made public appear to have been taken from an old photograph that fails to give an accurate idea of his personal appearance now. In order that HERALD readers may become familiar with the coming director of the Symphony concerts, I send herewith a photograph of recent date that presents Herr Nikisch as he looked when I

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Chatted with Him

in the interest of the Boston musical public.

After a few moments of conversation, Mr. Nikisch excused himself to attend a rehearsal of the opera of the "Huguenots," which was to be given the same evening. Later, in the pleasant rooms of the Hotel de Prusse, finely situated on the Ross Platz, and in front of the new promenade, the interview was continued, with the occasional kind assistance of Mr. Meery, the stage manager of the Stadt Theatre, who will be pleasantly remembered by Bostonians as not long since a member of the Boston Museum company. Mr. Nikisch is evidently full of anticipation of the pleasure of entering upon a work so congenial in a field so much broader than that which he now occupies. From American visitors and residents he has already received flattering impressions of the orchestra and the public with which he is to cast his lot. The watchful care of the management has already made him acquainted with the few places where change may be necessary or desirable, and he is on the alert to secure the few artists now needed. The names of those he will bring with him he will soon be able to announce. In response to an inquiry as to what, if any, new works he would take over with him, he said that, having been furnished with the catalogue of the library of the orchestra, he found it to contain everything that could be desired, and to be as complete as those of the European orchestras. After a pleasant talk of an hour and a half the interview terminated, to be resumed by appointment at the close of the opera. The interval was employed in strolling about the city. And here, wherever one went, there was a universal expression of regret at the impending loss in a musical way which the city is to sustain. This expression was equally ferved from artists with whom Mr. Nikisch has been associated and with non-professional music lovers in Leipsic, to whom he has greatly endeared himself. All were at a loss to see how his ... was to be made good. He seems ... regarded here as the embodiment of ... assive in ... Society

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Appearance.

An Estimate of His Abilities Made by Messrs. Carl Zerrahn, B. J. Lang, John K. Paine, George L. Osgood and Bernhard Listemann—Enthusiastic Praise of the New Conductor.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening proved an event of unusual interest, by reason of its being the occasion of the first formal appearance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor chosen by Mr. Higginson to succeed Mr. Gericke at the head of the organization. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, every seat having been sold for the entire season, and the limit of admission tickets being reached before the concert began. It was such an audience as has been seen half of each of the past eight years each Saturday evening, a large proportion of those in attendance occupying much the same location as in former years. The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for a demonstration that must have shown the newcomer to Boston's musical circles that nothing but good feeling was felt toward him by those for whose enjoyment his labors of the season will be given. The orchestra men joined heartily in this ovation, and Mr. Nikisch stepped with rare grace and dignity upon the flower-bedecked stand and bowed his acknowledgment of the welcoming applause. His personal appearance has been often described in these columns, but it needed a sight of the man as he stood before his orchestra, with baton raised high in air, before beginning the "Meistersinger" vorspiel to realize all the personal characteristics of the new conductor. Although of such short stature that he is compelled to use an additional eight inch platform to bring him to a convenient level before his men, he has a commanding presence that fixes and holds the attention of the audience without apparent effort, and it is easy to see that he has the most absolute control of his men. He raps his men to attention upon the nearest music stand before ascending his throne-like stand, and calmly awaits the attention of his men in an easy and graceful pose. The programme of the evening consisted of four numbers, as follows:

Vorspiel (Die Meistersinger)	Wagner
Overture (Coriolanus)	Beethoven
Entr'acte (Rosamunde)	Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4	Schumann

Nothing in the selections or their arrangement gave evidence of a change in the conductor from last season, as it was just such a list of numbers as would have been expected from Mr. Nikisch's predecessor. The all too prevailing use of slang, and quotations from the topical songs of the day, can but be regretted, upon general principles, yet it must be admitted that the young man who hummed softly in his companion's ear, as he glanced down the programme, "We've both been there before, many a time," was most successful in making his opinion upon the evening's selections understood. The delight of the audience knew no bounds at the conclusion of the vorspiel, and the hall fairly rung with the enthusiastic applause its performance called out. Each new effort was similarly rewarded, and, as the short programme was ended, the new conductor was fairly wearied with the demonstrations in his honor. In order that the fairest possible estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities should be had, an invitation was extended to five representative musicians to state their opinions of the new conductor as formed after a first hearing of his work. Each of these gentlemen kindly accepted the invitation, and gave the following opinions immediately after the concert before comparing their opinions or in any way committing themselves as to their estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities:

CARL ZERRAHN'S OPINIONS.

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, who knows something about the duties of a conductor from experience and realizes the trials and difficulties with which the director of any large orchestra has to contend, was seen after the close of the concert last evening. He was asked to criticise the work of the orchestra and that of its conductor, but he had evidently been so carried away with what he considered the excellence of the performance that he could not pick out any one thing more than another to condemn or praise. In fact, all that could be obtained from him were expressions of the fullest praise and most hearty indorsements of Mr. Nikisch as a leader and as a man. His answers to the questions of the interviewer appear below. He said, after a cordial greeting, and in answer to the question of what he thought of the new conductor:

"I can only say to you what I felt sure must be true when I heard that Mr. Nikisch was coming to Boston. I knew that a conductor who had been successful there must be so in Boston. There could be no question about it. I also knew before I asked Mr. Nikisch 'How do you like the orchestra?' what must be his answer. He said: 'I am delighted with it. It is a magnificent orchestra. One can do with that orchestra as he pleases. It is one of the most intelligent orchestras I ever found. The greatest intelligence pervades the orchestra.' That I also knew beforehand."

When asked as to whether Mr. Nikisch came up to his ideas of the qualifications of a conductor, Mr. Zerrahn replied: "Perfectly. I have nothing but praise."

"Then, he is not simply a drillmaster, as Mr. Gericke has sometimes been termed?" said the reporter. At this question Mr. Zerrahn smiled in a manner which indicated that he had not the least idea that Mr. Nikisch could be called a "drillmaster" by any one who knew him—a sort of incredulous smile. In answer by words he said: "No, Mr. Nikisch is not a drillmaster. He is a conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

In reply to a question as to whether he wished to make to make any criticism of the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said: "I have nothing to criticise; nothing but praise." On being asked if there was not some part which he would praise more than another, he replied: "It was all splendid. I do not care to pick out any one one portion more than another. I admire his conception of the 'Coriolanus' overture."

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., the programme, the symphony was placed at the end, whether that is a settled conviction or from a consideration of special conditions, remains to be seen. It is natural enough that Mr. Nikisch should step slowly in regard to novelties in the very outset, as he certainly is doing, but he will soon find out where the wishes and the expectations of Boston lie, and his European record bespeaks for him a wide and catholic taste in the composition of his programmes.

R. A.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Appearance.

An Estimate of His Abilities Made by Messrs. Carl Zerrahn, B. J. Lang, John K. Paine, George L. Osgood and Bernhard Listemann—Enthusiastic Praise of the New Conductor.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening proved an event of unusual interest, by reason of its being the occasion of the first formal appearance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor chosen by Mr. Higginson to succeed Mr. Gericke at the head of the organization. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, every seat having been sold for the entire season, and the limit of admission tickets being reached before the concert began. It was such an audience as has been seen half of each of the past eight years each Saturday evening, a large proportion of those in attendance occupying much the same location as in former years. The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for a demonstration that must have shown the newcomer to Boston's musical circles that nothing but good feeling was felt toward him by those for whose enjoyment his labors of the season will be given. The orchestra men joined heartily in this ovation, and Mr. Nikisch stepped with rare grace and dignity upon the flower-bedecked stand and bowed his acknowledgment of the welcoming applause. His personal appearance has been often described in these columns, but it needed a sight of the man as he stood before his orchestra, with baton raised high in air, before beginning the "Meistersinger" vorspiel to realize all the personal characteristics of the new conductor. Although of such short stature that he is compelled to use an additional eight inch platform to bring him to a convenient level before his men, he has a commanding presence that fixes and holds the attention of the audience without apparent effort, and it is easy to see that he has the most absolute control of his men. He raps his men to attention upon the nearest music stand before ascending his throne-like stand, and calmly awaits the attention of his men in an easy and graceful pose. The programme of the evening consisted of four numbers, as follows:

Vorspiel (Die Meistersinger)	Wagner
Overture (Coriolanus)	Beethoven
Entr'acte (Rosamunde)	Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4	Schumann

Nothing in the selections or their arrangement gave evidence of a change in the conductor from last season, as it was just such a list of numbers as would have been expected from Mr. Nikisch's predecessor. The all too prevailing use of slang, and quotations from the topical songs of the day, can but be regretted, upon general principles, yet it must be admitted that the young man who hummed softly in his companion's ear, as he glanced down the programme, "We've both been there before, many a time," was most successful in making his opinion upon the evening's selections understood. The delight of the audience knew no bounds at the conclusion of the vorspiel, and the hall fairly rung with the enthusiastic applause its performance called out. Each new effort was similarly rewarded, and, as the short programme was ended, the new conductor was fairly wearied with the demonstrations in his honor. In order that the fairest possible estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities should be had, an invitation was extended to five representative musicians to state their opinions of the new conductor as formed after a first hearing of his work. Each of these gentlemen kindly accepted the invitation, and gave the following opinions immediately after the concert before comparing their opinions or in any way committing themselves as to their estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities:

CARL ZERRAHN'S OPINIONS.

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, who knows something about the duties of a conductor from experience and realizes the trials and difficulties with which the director of any large orchestra has to contend, was seen after the close of the concert last evening. He was asked to criticise the work of the orchestra and that of its conductor, but he had evidently been so carried away with what he considered the excellence of the performance that he could not pick out any one thing more than another to condemn or praise. In fact, all that could be obtained from him were expressions of the fullest praise and most hearty indorsements of Mr. Nikisch as a leader and as a man. His answers to the questions of the interviewer appear below. He said, after a cordial greeting, and in answer to the question of what he thought of the new conductor:

"I can only say to you what I felt sure must be true when I heard that Mr. Nikisch was coming to Boston. I knew that a conductor who had been successful there must be so in Boston. There could be no question about it. I also knew before I asked Mr. Nikisch 'How do you like the orchestra?' what must be his answer. He said: 'I am delighted with it. It is a magnificent orchestra. One can do with that orchestra as he pleases. It is one of the most intelligent orchestras I ever found. The greatest intelligence pervades the orchestra.' That I also knew beforehand."

When asked as to whether Mr. Nikisch came up to his ideas of the qualifications of a conductor, Mr. Zerrahn replied: "Perfectly. I have nothing but praise."

"Then, he is not simply a drillmaster, as Mr. Gericke has sometimes been termed?" said the reporter. At this question Mr. Zerrahn smiled in a manner which indicated that he had not the least idea that Mr. Nikisch could be called a "drillmaster" by any one who knew him—a sort of incredulous smile. In answer by words he said: "No, Mr. Nikisch is not a drillmaster. He is a conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

In reply to a question as to whether he wished to make to make any criticism of the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said: "I have nothing to criticise; nothing but praise." On being asked if there was not some part which he would praise more than another, he replied: "It was all splendid. I do not care to pick out any one one portion more than another. I admire his conception of the 'Coriolanus' overture."

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., the programme, the symphony was placed at the end, whether that is a settled conviction or from a consideration of special conditions, remains to be seen. It is natural enough that Mr. Nikisch should step slowly in regard to novelties in the very outset, as he certainly is doing, but he will soon find out where the wishes and the expectations of Boston lie, and his European record bespeaks for him a wide and catholic taste in the composition of his programmes.

R. A.

early in the programme. It depends on the make-up of the programme. I think it is a mistake to put the symphony always at the last. But tonight I like the arrangement of the programme. I am perfectly delighted with the performance. Mr. Nikisch is a new inspiration to the orchestra, and they cannot fail to produce splendid results under his sympathetic guidance. All the orchestra like him, which is a great point in his favor, and which could not be said of the previous conductor."

GEORGE L. OSGOOD'S VIEWS.

You ask at the outset if I like the symphony at the end of the programme? Yes, I do. It is the climax of the programme. After I have listened to the symphony and analyzed it thoroughly en passant, I am satisfied then to go. I consider this and the following concert most charmingly and effectively arranged. The programme had a beautiful musical color. Before we had gone many bars into the Vorspiel of the "Meistersinger" I felt assured that we had found great talent in Mr. Nikisch. I care little or nothing for the hair-splitting comparisons of the conductor's tempi, provided we get a musician with heart and head. Nikisch has both. My decided impression of Nikisch is that the heart speaks first and the strong brain controls the expression. For want of better words to explain my meaning, I will use the German words auffassung, empfindung und gefuehl. Without analyzing the various impressions which I received, I would say at the outset that Nikisch has the rare power of managing his orchestra with absolute musical freedom. An immense point is his power in using the tempo rubato, rarely heard to perfection in orchestral playing—indeed, to my mind one of the sure signs of a musician by nature. I was struck with this from the very first measures of the first piece through the entire programme. This characteristic went on increasing without pause to the very end. This freedom with which Nikisch manages his orchestra is not a mechanical one; it comes from pure musical inspiration.

Passing over the first three pieces of the programme, I will go at once to the symphony. It seems to me characteristic of the man that he chose this particular symphony for his first programme, and it, more than anything else on the programme, gave me an insight into the musical character of the man. The music of Schumann belongs to the school of pure romance. How often have we heard this symphony when its performance seemed to be directed by a schoolmaster rather than by a musician. Tonight it was romantic from beginning to end. The tempi rubati were delicious. The musical, heart felt rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument.

This rare talent in Nikisch will be even more apparent as the season progresses, and the orchestra become better acquainted with the temperament of their new conductor. I look forward to a rare treat in the Saturday night Symphony concerts.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

BERNHARD LISTEMAN'S VIEWS.

Mr. Nikisch seems to me superior in all essential points to his two predecessors, Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. He makes orchestras speak as an individual would speak. To make this plain, we have to recall the work that Henschel and Gericke did here.

Mr. Henschel, who started and possibly originated the idea of a symphony orchestra, brought as a practical orchestra conductor, little experience with him. He was a warm-feeling and enthusiastic musician of great general knowledge, and he succeeded in giving in the course of time some highly poetical performances of works for which he felt a filling their certificates of nomination as early special interest. Still, he was not able to give an individuality or pronounced character to the performances of the orchestra.

His successor, Mr. Gericke, possessed a great deal more orchestral experience, though he was not too well fitted for the specific work in Boston when he assumed the duties of his office. His nature was of a refined, calculating kind, and he brought the technical abilities of the orchestra to a really high pith of excellence. His defect was the lack of soul and heart, which prevented him, possibly, from looking into the greater depths of the work.

Mr. Nikisch seems to combine all the principal qualities of his two predecessors. His interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a follower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many, and probably opposed by some others. The selections at the first concert seem to me to be characteristically slow. I may say, on the other hand, it was delightful to notice how well he worked up his crescendos, and notice with what an energy certain departments of the orchestra followed his intentions, noticeably the brass instruments, that used to be, under Mr. Gericke's direction, so subdued that the performances of the same department of the German opera orchestra, under Mr. Seidl's direction, seemed to be a real revelation. Surely, orchestra and public will thank the new conductor for his efforts in this direction. As Mr. Nikisch's mission will be to teach and educate his audiences, so I might suggest that he on his part should learn to appreciate the digestive capacities of the patrons of these concerts, who may be far ahead of his Leipsic audiences in this respect. Another thing he has to perfect himself in is in the arrangement of the programme. Two overtures, one following the other, is a venture before a Boston audience that will not be greatly appreciated, and it is still more questionable that he has selected for the opening piece of his second concert one which, by its peculiar character, is anything but an opening piece. In connection with this matter, I might say that, thankful as the few connoisseurs may be to hear for them the principal work of the evening as a grand finale, the great majority of the audience would prefer by far to listen to it when they are in a state to do so without effort.

Mr. Nikisch is certainly a conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

early in the programme. It depends on the make-up of the programme. I think it is a mistake to put the symphony always at the last. But tonight I like the arrangement of the programme. I am perfectly delighted with the performance. Mr. Nikisch is a new inspiration to the orchestra, and they cannot fail to produce splendid results under his sympathetic guidance. All the orchestra like him, which is a great point in his favor, and which could not be said of the previous conductor."

GEORGE L. OSGOOD'S VIEWS.

You ask at the outset if I like the symphony at the end of the programme? Yes, I do. It is the climax of the programme. After I have listened to the symphony and analyzed it thoroughly en passant, I am satisfied then to go. I consider this and the following concert most charmingly and effectively arranged. The programme had a beautiful musical color. Before we had gone many bars into the Vorspiel of the "Meistersinger" I felt assured that we had found great talent in Mr. Nikisch. I care little or nothing for the hair-splitting comparisons of the conductor's tempi, provided we get a musician with heart and head. Nikisch has both. My decided impression of Nikisch is that the heart speaks first and the strong brain controls the expression. For want of better words to explain my meaning, I will use the German words auffassung, empfindung und gefuehl. Without analyzing the various impressions which I received, I would say at the outset that Nikisch has the rare power of managing his orchestra with absolute musical freedom. An immense point is his power in using the tempo rubato, rarely heard to perfection in orchestral playing—indeed, to my mind one of the sure signs of a musician by nature. I was struck with this from the very first measures of the first piece through the entire programme. This characteristic went on increasing without pause to the very end. This freedom with which Nikisch manages his orchestra is not a mechanical one; it comes from pure musical inspiration.

Passing over the first three pieces of the programme, I will go at once to the symphony. It seems to me characteristic of the man that he chose this particular symphony for his first programme, and it, more than anything else on the programme, gave me an insight into the musical character of the man. The music of Schumann belongs to the school of pure romance. How often have we heard this symphony when its performance seemed to be directed by a schoolmaster rather than by a musician. Tonight it was romantic from beginning to end. The tempi rubati were delicious. The musical, heart felt rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument.

This rare talent in Nikisch will be even more apparent as the season progresses, and the orchestra become better acquainted with the temperament of their new conductor. I look forward to a rare treat in the Saturday night Symphony concerts.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

BERNHARD LISTEMAN'S VIEWS.

Mr. Nikisch seems to me superior in all essential points to his two predecessors, Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. He makes orchestras speak as an individual would speak. To make this plain, we have to recall the work that Henschel and Gericke did here.

Mr. Henschel, who started and possibly originated the idea of a symphony orchestra, brought as a practical orchestra conductor, little experience with him. He was a warm-feeling and enthusiastic musician of great general knowledge, and he succeeded in giving in the course of time some highly poetical performances of works for which he felt a filling their certificates of nomination as early special interest. Still, he was not able to give an individuality or pronounced character to the performances of the orchestra.

His successor, Mr. Gericke, possessed a great deal more orchestral experience, though he was not too well fitted for the specific work in Boston when he assumed the duties of his office. His nature was of a refined, calculating kind, and he brought the technical abilities of the orchestra to a really high pith of excellence. His defect was the lack of soul and heart, which prevented him, possibly, from looking into the greater depths of the work.

Mr. Nikisch seems to combine all the principal qualities of his two predecessors. His interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a follower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many, and probably opposed by some others. The selections at the first concert seem to me to be characteristically slow. I may say, on the other hand, it was delightful to notice how well he worked up his crescendos, and notice with what an energy certain departments of the orchestra followed his intentions, noticeably the brass instruments, that used to be, under Mr. Gericke's direction, so subdued that the performances of the same department of the German opera orchestra, under Mr. Seidl's direction, seemed to be a real revelation. Surely, orchestra and public will thank the new conductor for his efforts in this direction. As Mr. Nikisch's mission will be to teach and educate his audiences, so I might suggest that he on his part should learn to appreciate the digestive capacities of the patrons of these concerts, who may be far ahead of his Leipsic audiences in this respect. Another thing he has to perfect himself in is in the arrangement of the programme. Two overtures, one following the other, is a venture before a Boston audience that will not be greatly appreciated, and it is still more questionable that he has selected for the opening piece of his second concert one which, by its peculiar character, is anything but an opening piece. In connection with this matter, I might say that, thankful as the few connoisseurs may be to hear for them the principal work of the evening as a grand finale, the great majority of the audience would prefer by far to listen to it when they are in a state to do so without effort.

Mr. Nikisch is certainly a conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years.

There is this danger, however, in such freedom, that only in the hands of a master is it safe. Should the lesser leaders of orchestral forces fall too in imitation, there will be much sad work done.

It is needless to say that the orchestra itself as magnificent in tonal beauty and in technical finish as ever; its pliability in its new conductor's hands was remarkable, and will, of course, increase as acquaintance with his methods and wishes grows. There is scarcely a change in the composition of the orchestra, the most important being the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Giese, and of three minor players in the ranks.

The next programme includes Brahms's variation on a theme by Haydn, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," and Beethoven's seventh symphony, while Mr. Hekking will play a concerto for 'cello by Goltermann and some short pieces.

[3] July 14 89

HERALD

...S A SILVER LINING.

Future of the Democracy of the Bay State.

The Hands Into Which It Will Be Intrusted.

Old Campaigners Must Soon Give up the Reins.

Ultimate Democratic Success Said to Be Assured.

...only. ...rning of Victory ...ply that the ... by the increased cost of service and food incident to the exposition. Even the bootblacks at the street corners have met in solemn conclave, and have agreed that no boots shall be polished save at a charge of 20 centimes (4 cents), just double the time honored rate.

All this, as has been already hinted, makes the traveller long for more restful scenes, and here in Leipsic the quiet city is even stiller than usual, since there is everywhere, even from Germany, which is supposed to cherish no great affection for France and its works, a positive exodus toward the gay city.

Naturally, on arrival, a true Bostonian directs his first steps toward the handsome Stadt Theatre, where presides, as the head of allthings musical, Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is soon to wield the baton over the orchestra which Boston, with pardonable pride, claims to be the orchestra par excellence of all America. And certainly, to digress a moment, a hearing of the famous orchestra of M. Colonne at a concert given in the spacious and beautiful music hall of the Trocadero in Paris, does not indicate that in that quarter at least Boston has anything to learn. Escaping the pitfalls that beset a stranger in Germany by the slightest possible inkling of the language, and a fortunate exercise of a Yankee's proverbial talent for guessing, the bureau or business department of the theatre is shortly reached. In response to a card there soon appeared a short lithe man, with dark and rather sallow complexion, thoughtful face and expressive eyes. Greetings were exchanged and the writer thus obtained his first view of Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is to become a familiar figure to musical Boston. Not much more than two months ago his native tongue was the only one of which he could boast. But so nimble has been his intelligence, and so keen his desire to acquire the English language, that scarcely any difficulty is experienced in giving and receiving congratulations. The pictures published in the Boston papers soon after the engagement of Herr Nikisch was made public appear to have been taken from an old photograph that fails to give an accurate idea of his personal appearance now. In order that HERALD readers may become familiar with the coming director of the Symphony concerts, I send herewith a photograph of recent date that presents Herr Nikisch as he looked when I

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Chatted with Him

in the interest of the Boston musical public.

After a few moments of conversation, Mr. Nikisch excused himself to attend a rehearsal of the opera of the "Huguenots," which was to be given the same evening. Later, in the pleasant rooms of the Hotel de Prusse, finely situated on the Ross Platz, and in front of the new promenade, the interview was continued, with the occasional kind assistance of Mr. Meery, the stage manager of the Stadt Theatre, who will be pleasantly remembered by Bostonians as not long since a member of the Boston Museum company. Mr. Nikisch is evidently full of anticipation of the pleasure of entering upon a work so congenial in a field so much broader than that which he now occupies. From American visitors and residents he has already received flattering impressions of the orchestra and the public ...h which he is to cast his lot. The watchful ...e of the management has already made him acquainted with the few places where change may be necessary or desirable, and he is ... the alert to secure the few artists now ...ed. The names of those he will bring with ...e will soon be able to announce. In re...se to an inquiry as to what, if any, new ...rks he would take over with him, he said ...at, having been furnished with the catalogue of the library of the orchestra, he found it to contain everything that could be desired, and to be as complete as those of the European orchestras. After a pleasant talk of an hour and a half the interview terminated, to ...e resumed by appointment at the close of ...e opera. The interval was employed in ...trolling about the city. And here, wherever ...e went, there was a universal expression ...f regret at the impending loss in ... musical way which the city is to ...stain. This expression was equally fer...d from artists with whom Mr. Nikisch has ...en associated and with non-professional ...usic lovers in Leipsic, to whom ...e has greatly endeared himself. All ...re at a loss to see how his ... was to be made good. He seems ...ended here as the embodiment of ...ssive in ...Society

...NTY-FOUR PAGE

Jordan, Marsh & Co.

Three Conspicuous Bargains In Choice

House-Dress Fabrics.

...AVARIAN REPS, regular width, 10c. per yard

...ICILIAN REPS, 25 inches wide, 10c. per yard

...RAP DE PERSIA, 24 inches wide, the BEST manufacture . . . . . 12½c. per yard

These are all selected and handsome styles, of a superior printing.

Primrose Cloth,

—OR—

FINE SHIRTING CAMBRIC.

Primrose Cloth, or fine Shirting Cambric, full 36 inches wide, a wash fabric, colors absolutely fast, for 12½c. Per Yard.

In white grounds, small and medium figures, extensively used for Indoor Dresses, Children's Wear, Fancy Shirts, &c.

Infants' Wear.

150 Heavy Plush Garments

FOR CHILDREN.

Sizes 1 to 4 years, colors Cardinal, Brown, Blue and Terra Cotta. This is our regular $5.00 Garment for this sale.

$3.50.

Colored Skirts.

A small lot of fine quality Gray Melton Cloth Skirts, a regular $1.00 quality, for . . . . . 75c.

Black Lasting Skirts, deep quilting Velvet, bound, large sizes, at only $1.00

Millinery.

SPECIAL BARGAIN.

250 dozen Trimmed Felt Walking Hats, all colors, for Ladies and Misses, 69c. Worth $1.25.

MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

Overcoats, Cape Coats and Ulsters.

We shall open on Monday morning in this department a full line of Men's Overcoats and Ulsters. This is a new departure with us, and our customers will find upon inspection the most complete line of this class of goods to be found in Boston, and the prices named, for the quality, are very reasonable, and we cordially invite the public to inspect this line of Overcoats, whether purchase is made or not.

At the same time, don't forget our special sale of Mackintosh Coats.

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., one

GLOBE—

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Brilliant Opening of the Symphony Season.

Nikisch's Poetic Reading of a Classical Programme Much Applauded.

Concert Hints and Happenings—Preludes and Echoes.

If one did not know that Mr. Gericke had brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to a state nearly approaching perfection, one would think such a performance as that of yesterday at Music Hall quite incredible. It was a most brilliant and auspicious opening of the ninth Symphony season. The attendance was very large and fashionable; a very cordial reception was accorded the new director, and when the brief concert was over there was no room to doubt that the leader from Leipzig had gained at once great favor.

Herr Nikisch, slight in figure, quiet and confident in manner, gave evidence of his skill as a conductor before the opening selection of the concert was over. He is a man of astonishing memory for one thing, for he directed the programme without looking at a note from beginning to end. And this fact unquestionably was a great aid to him in gaining the remarkable sway which he held over the orchestra, a sway which none but a truly "magnetic" leader could have so secured and so retained. Indeed, as he led his orchestra with no music before him, he gave one the impression of a man, perfectly capable and perfectly self-possessed, who has a vast mechanism under his entire control. When he takes up a work the whole seems photographed in his mind.

It was no doubt largely due to this fact that Herr Nikisch's readings yesterday were characteristic, poetic and singularly effective. As his method of conducting differs essentially from the method of either of his predecessors, so we may look for different and decidedly interesting results. He seems to graduate his own movements with the baton by the music he has in hand. In quiet passages, so to speak, there is scarcely any movement at all—the slightest indication of the time. And on the other hand, at any sharp, decisive period, there is corresponding action.

The programme for the first concert of the new season presented Wagner and Beethoven, the two foremost masters of orchestral writing; Schumann, whose practical knowledge of the orchestra was wonderfully slight in proportion to the effects he produced, and who claims attention by the sheer force of his genius; and the melodious Schubert, who always has a sweet song to sing. The "Coriolanus" overture was magnificently given—better than ever before, we think. The Schubert entr'acte, familiar as it is, was performed with such an exquisite rendering that it seemed as if it had never been really heard before. Nikisch's reading of the Schumann symphony, too, was thoroughly individual; new effects were gained even in this often-heard classic, and the introduction to "The Meistersingers" found most delicate and appreciative interpretation. The concert was very brief, requiring only an hour and a quarter for its performance, so that, though the symphony came last, it did not find the audience wearied, but rather just in the mood for the great classic.

For the second rehearsal and concert the following attractive programme has been arranged, and no doubt the hall on each occasion will be filled to overflowing:

Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, Op. 56...Brahms
Concerto for 'Cello, in A minor.....Goltermann
(First time at these concerts).
Overture, "Fingal's Cave.....Mendelssohn
Soli for Violoncello.
Air.....Bach
Traumerei.....Schumann
Papillon.....Popper
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphony No. 7, in A.....Beethoven

Preludes and Echoes.

Richard Carl, humorist, is booked this week in Boston, Sacarappa, Me., Charlestown and Natick.

Jerome Hopkins has been giving his piano lecture concerts to interested audiences in many English towns.

Miss Lilian Carll Smith sings in Fall River, Oct. 15; in Belmont, 16; in Boston, 17; in Andover, 28; and Woonsocket, 31.

The Kneisel quartet, headed by Franz Kneisel and including Otto Roth, Louis Svecenski and Anton Hekking, is to give six concerts this season.

The Irish National concert company will appear at the Boston Theatre Sunday evening Oct. 27, in concert programme, for the benefit of the Home for Destitute Catholic Children.

Von Bulow is coming in the spring, to present new programmes from the works of Beethoven, Liszt, Schumann, and other masters. The first concerts will be given in the latter part of March.

Three concerts are announced at Steinert Hall by the Adamowski quartet. Nov. 18, Dec. 9 and Jan. 6. The membership includes T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; D. Kuntz, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello.

The second entertainment in the Star course on Monday evening will bring forward another collection of eminent artists. Miss Emma Juch will sing several classical and popular selections, making then her first and only appearance in Boston this season previous to her operatic engagement. The Listemanns—Bernard, Fritz and Paul—are to assist, together with Fritz Giese, John W. Flockton and G. E. Ronconi.

On the evening of Sept. 25, one of Edison's phonographs was placed in the prompter's box at the Folies-Dramatiques in Paris, and registered the principal music of "The Chimes of Normandy," which was given its eleven hundredth performance on that occasion. The cylinders upon which the music is recorded, after having been exhibited in Paris, are to be sent to New York when the exposition closes, and Americans will be enabled to hear, by means of them, the

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His First Appearance.

An Estimate of His Abilities Made by Messrs. Carl Zerrahn, B. J. Lang, John K. Paine, George L. Osgood and Bernhard Listemann—Enthusiastic Praise of the New Conductor.

The first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening proved an event of unusual interest, by reason of its being the occasion of the first formal appearance of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the conductor chosen by Mr. Higginson to succeed Mr. Gericke at the head of the organization. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, every seat having been sold for the entire season, and the limit of admission tickets being reached before the concert began. It was such an audience as has been seen half of each of the past eight years each Saturday evening, a large proportion of those in attendance occupying much the same location as in former years. The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was the signal for a demonstration that must have shown the newcomer to Boston's musical circles that nothing but good feeling was felt toward him by those for whose enjoyment his labors of the season will be given. The orchestra men joined heartily in this ovation, and Mr. Nikisch stepped with rare grace and dignity upon the flower-bedecked stand and bowed his acknowledgment of the welcoming applause. His personal appearance has been often described in these columns, but it needed a sight of the man as he stood before his orchestra, with baton raised high in air, before beginning the "Meistersinger" vorspiel to realize all the personal characteristics of the new conductor. Although of such short stature that he is compelled to use an additional eight inch platform to bring him to a convenient level before his men, he has a commanding presence that fixes and holds the attention of the audience without apparent effort, and it is easy to see that he has the most absolute control of his men. He raps his men to attention upon the nearest music stand before ascending his throne-like stand, and calmly awaits the attention of his men in an easy and graceful pose. The programme of the evening consisted of four numbers, as follows:

Vorspiel (Die Meistersinger).....Wagner
Overture (Coriolanus).....Beethoven
Entr'acte (Rosamunde).....Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

Nothing in the selections or their arrangement gave evidence of a change in the conductor from last season, as it was just such a list of numbers as would have been expected from Mr. Nikisch's predecessor. The all too prevailing use of songs, and quotations from the topical songs of the day, can but be regretted, upon general principles, yet it must be admitted that the young man who hummed softly in his companion's ear, as he glanced down the programme, "We've both been there before, many a time," was most successful in making his opinion upon the evening's selections understood. The delight of the audience knew no bounds at the conclusion of the vorspiel, and the hall fairly rang with the enthusiastic applause its performance called up. Each new effort was similarly rewarded, and, as the short programme was ended, the new conductor was fairly regaled with the demonstrations in his honor. In order that the fairest possible estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities should be had, an invitation was extended to five representative musicians to state their opinions of the new conductor as formed after a first hearing of his work. Each of these gentlemen kindly accepted the invitation, and gave the following opinions immediately after the concert before comparing their opinions or in any way committing themselves as to their estimate of Mr. Nikisch's abilities:

CARL ZERRAHN'S OPINIONS.

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, who knows something about the duties of a conductor from experience and realizes the trials and difficulties with which the director of any large orchestra has to contend, was seen after the close of the concert last evening. He was asked to criticise the work of the orchestra and that of its conductor, but he had evidently been so carried away with what he considered the excellence of the performance that he could not pick out any one thing more than another to condemn or praise. In fact, all that could be obtained from him were expressions of the fullest praise and most hearty indorsements of Mr. Nikisch as a leader and as a man. His answers to the questions of the interviewer appear below. He said, after a cordial greeting, and in answer to the question of what he thought of the new conductor:

"I can only say to you what I felt sure must be true when I heard that Mr. Nikisch was coming to Boston. I knew that a conductor who had been successful there must be so in Boston. There could be no question about it. I also knew before I asked Mr. Nikisch 'How do you like the orchestra?' what must be his answer. He said 'I am delighted with it. It is a magnificent orchestra. One can do with that orchestra as he pleases. It is one of the most intelligent orchestras I ever found. The greatest intelligence pervades the orchestra.' That is so knew beforehand."

When asked as to whether Mr. Nikisch came up to his ideas of the qualifications of a conductor, Mr. Zerrahn replied: "Perfectly. I have nothing but praise."

"Then, he is not simply a drillmaster, as Mr. Gericke has sometimes been termed?" said the reporter. At this question Mr. Zerrahn smiled in a manner which indicated that he had not the least idea that Mr. Nikisch could be called a "drillmaster" by any one who knew him—a sort of incredulous smile. In answer by words he said: "No, Mr. Nikisch is not a drillmaster. He is a conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

In reply to a question as to whether he wished to make to make any criticism of the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said: "I have nothing to criticise; nothing but praise." On being asked if there was not some part which he would praise more than another, he replied: "It was all splendid. I do not care to pick out any one one portion more than another. I admire his conception of the 'Coriolanus' overture."

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., one early in the programme. It depends on the make-up of the programme. I think it is a mistake to put the symphony always at the last. But tonight I like the arrangement of the programme. I am perfectly delighted with the performance. Mr. Nikisch is a new inspiration to the orchestra, and they cannot fail to produce splendid results under his sympathetic guidance. All the orchestra like him, which is a great point in his favor, and which could not be said of the previous conductor."

THE SUNDAY HERALD

GEORGE L. OSGOOD'S VIEWS.

You ask at the outset if I like the symphony at the end of the programme? Yes, I do. It is the climax of the programme. After I have listened to the symphony and analyzed it thoroughly en passant, I am satisfied then to go. I consider this and the following concert most charmingly and effectively arranged. The programme had a beautiful musical color. Before we had gone many bars into the Vorspiel of the "Meistersinger" I felt assured that we had found great talent in Mr. Nikisch. I care little or nothing for the hair-splitting comparisons of the conductor's tempi, provided we get a musician with heart and head. Nikisch has both. My decided impression of Nikisch is that the heart speaks first and the strong brain controls the expression. For want of better words to explain my meaning, I will use the German words auffassung, empfindung und gefuehl. Without analyzing the various impressions which I received, I would say at the outset that Nikisch has the rare power of managing his orchestra with absolute musical freedom. An immense point is his power in using the tempo rubato, rarely heard to perfection in orchestral playing—indeed, to my mind one of the sure signs of a musician by nature. I was struck with this from the very first measures of the first piece through the entire programme. This characteristic went on increasing without pause to the very end. This freedom with which Nikisch manages his orchestra is not a mechanical one; it comes from pure musical inspiration.

Passing over the first three pieces of the programme, I will go at once to the symphony. It seems to me characteristic of the man that he chose this particular symphony for his first programme, and it, more than anything else on the programme, gave me an insight into the musical character of the man. The music of Schumann belongs to the school of pure romance. How often have we heard this symphony when its performance seemed to be directed by a schoolmaster rather than by a musician. Tonight it was romantic from beginning to end. The tempi rubati were delicious. The musical heart-beat rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument.

This rare talent in Nikisch will be even more apparent as the season progresses, and the orchestra become better acquainted with the temperament of their new conductor. I look forward to a rare treat in the Saturday night Symphony concerts.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

BERNHARD LISTEMAN'S VIEWS.

Mr. Nikisch seems to me superior in all essential points to his two predecessors, Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. He makes orchestras speak as an individual would speak. To make this plain, we have to recall the work that Henschel and Gericke did here. Mr. Henschel, who started and possibly originated the idea of a symphony orchestra, brought as a practical orchestra conductor, little experience with him. He was a warm-feeling and enthusiastic musician of great general knowledge, and he succeeded in giving in the course of time some highly poetical performances of works for which he felt a filing their certificates of nomination as early special interest. Still, he was not able to give an individuality or pronounced character to the performances of the orchestra.

His successor, Mr. Gericke, possessed a great deal more orchestral experience, though he was not too well fitted for the specific work in Boston when he assumed the duties of his office. His nature was of a refined, calculating kind, and he brought the technical abilities of the orchestra to a really high pith of excellence. His defect was the lack of soul and heart, which prevented him, possibly, from looking into the greater depths of the work.

Mr. Nikisch seems to combine all the principal qualities of his two predecessors. His interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a flower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many, and probably opposed by some others. The selections at the first concert seem to me to be characteristically slow. I may say, on the other hand, it was delightful to notice how well he worked up his crescendos, and notice with what an energy certain departments of the orchestra followed his intentions, noticeably the brass instruments, that used to be, under Mr. Gericke's direction, so subdued that the performances of the same department of the German opera orchestra, under Mr. Seidl's direction, seemed to be a real revelation. Surely, orchestra and public will thank the new conductor for his efforts in this direction. As Mr. Nikisch's mission will be to teach and educate his audiences, so I might suggest that he on his part should learn to appreciate the digestive capacities of the patrons of these concerts, who may be far ahead of his Leipsic audiences in this respect. Another thing he has to perfect himself in is in the arrangement of the programme. Two overtures, one following the other, is a venture before a Boston audience that will not be greatly appreciated, and it is still more questionable that he has selected for the opening piece of his second concert one which, by its peculiar character, is anything but an opening piece. In connection with this matter, I might say that, thankful as the few connoisseurs may be to hear for them the principal work of the evening as a grand finale, the great majority of the audience would prefer by far to listen to it when they are in a state to do so without effort.

Mr. Nikisch is certainly a conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years.

...and sensibilities. There is this danger, however, in such freedom, that only in the hands of a master is it safe. Should the lesser leaders of orchestral forces fall too in imitation, there will be much sad work done.

It is needless to say that the orchestra itself as magnificent in tonal beauty and in technical finish as ever; its pliability in its new conductor's hands was remarkable, and will, of course, increase as acquaintance with his methods and wishes grows. There is scarcely a change in the composition of the orchestra, the most important being the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Giese, and of three minor players in the ranks.

The next programme includes Brahms's variation on a theme by Haydn, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," and Beethoven's seventh symphony, while Mr. Hekking will play a concerto for 'cello by Goltermann and some short pieces.

[3] July 14 89

HERALD

...S A SILVER LINING.

Future of the Democracy of the Bay State.

The Hands Into Which It Will Be Intrusted.

Old Campaigners Must Soon Give up the Reins.

Ultimate Democratic Success Said to Be Assured.

only. ...orning of Victory ply that the ... by the increased cost of service and food incident to the exposition. Even the bootblacks at the street corners have met in solemn conclave, and have agreed that no boots shall be polished save at a charge of 20 centimes (4 cents), just double the time honored rate.

All this, as has been already hinted, makes the traveller long for more restful scenes, and here in Leipsic the quiet city is even stiller than usual, since there is everywhere, even from Germany, which is supposed to cherish no great affection for France and its works, a positive exodus toward the gay city.

Naturally, on arrival, a true Bostonian directs his first steps toward the handsome Stadt Theatre, where presides, as the head of allthings musical, Herr Arthur Nikisdh, who is soon to wield the baton over the orchestra which Boston, with pardonable pride, claims to be the orchestra par excellence of all America. And certainly, to digress a moment, a hearing of the famous orchestra of M. Colonne at a concert given in the spacious and beautiful music hall of the Trocadero in Paris, does not indicate that in that quarter at least Boston has anything to learn. Escaping the pitfalls that beset a stranger in Germany by the slightest possible inkling of the language, and a fortunate exercise of a Yankee's proverbial talent for guessing, the bureau or business department of the theatre is shortly reached. In response to a card there soon appeared a short, lithe man, with dark and rather sallow complexion, thoughtful face and expressive eyes. Greetings were exchanged and the writer thus obtained his first view of Herr Arthur Nikisch, who is to become a familiar figure to musical Boston. Not much more than two months ago his native tongue was the only one of which he could boast. But so nimble has been his intelligence, and so keen his desire to acquire the English language, that scarcely any difficulty is experienced in giving and receiving congratulations. The pictures published in the Boston papers soon after the engagement of Herr Nikisch was made public appear to have been taken from an old photograph that fails to give an accurate idea of his personal appearance now. In order that HERALD readers may become familiar with the coming director of the Symphony concerts, I send herewith a photograph of recent date that presents Herr Nikisch as he looked when I

HERR ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Chatted with Him

in the interest of the Boston musical public.

After a few moments of conversation, Mr. Nikisch excused himself to attend a rehearsal of the opera of the "Huguenots," which was to be given the same evening. Later, in the pleasant rooms of the Hotel de Prusse, finely situated on the Ross Platz, and in front of the new promenade, the interview was continued, with the occasional kind assistance of Mr. Meery, the stage manager of the Stadt Theatre, who will be pleasantly remembered by Bostonians as not long since a member of the Boston Museum company. Mr. Nikisch is evidently full of anticipation of the pleasure of entering upon a work so congenial in a field so much broader than that which he now occupies. From American visitors and residents he has already received flattering impressions of the orchestra and the public with which he is to cast his lot. The watchful care of the management has already made him acquainted with the few places where change may be necessary or desirable, and he is on the alert to secure the few artists now needed. The names of those he will bring with him he will soon be able to announce. In response to an inquiry as to what, if any, new works he would take over with him, he said that, having been furnished with the catalogue of the library of the orchestra, he found it to contain everything that could be desired, and to be as complete as those of the European orchestras. After a pleasant talk of an hour and a half the interview terminated, to be resumed by appointment at the close of the opera. The interval was employed in strolling about the city. And here, wherever he went, there was a universal expression of regret at the impending loss in musical way which the city is to sustain. This expression was equally ferved from artists with whom Mr. Nikisch has been associated and with non-professional music lovers in Leipsic, to whom he has greatly endeared himself. All are at a loss to see how his place is to be made good. He seems regarded here as the embodiment of ...ssive in ...Socie...

...NTY-FOUR PAGE

Jordan, Marsh & Co.

Three Conspicuous Bargains In Choice

House-Dress Fabrics.

...AVARIAN REPS, regular width, 10c. per yard

...ICILIAN REPS, 25 inches wide, 10c. per yard

...RAP DE PERSIA, 24 inches wide, the BEST manufacture . . . . . 12½c. per yard

These are all selected and handsome ...tyles, of a superior printing.

Primrose Cloth, —OR— FINE SHIRTING CAMBRIC.

Primrose Cloth, or fine Shirting Cambric, full 36 inches wide, a wash fabric, colors absolutely fast, for 12½c. Per Yard.

In white grounds, small and medium ...gures, extensively used for Indoor ...Dresses, Children's Wear, Fancy ...Shirts, &c.

Infants' Wear.

150 Heavy Plush Garments FOR CHILDREN.

Sizes 1 to 4 years, colors Cardinal, Brown, Blue and Terra Cotta. This is our regular $5.00 Garment for this sale.

$3.50.

Colored Skirts.

A small lot of fine quality Gray Melton Cloth Skirts, a regular $1.00 quality, for . . . . . 75c.

Black Lasting Skirts, deep quilting Velvet, bound, large sizes, at only $1.00

Millinery.

SPECIAL BARGAIN.

250 dozen Trimmed Felt Walking Hats, all colors, for Ladies and Misses, 69c. Worth $1.25.

MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

Overcoats, Cape Coats and Ulsters.

We shall open on Monday morning in this department a full line of Men's Overcoats and Ulsters. This is a new departure with us, and our customers will find upon inspection the most complete line of this class of goods to be found in Boston, and the prices named, for the quality, are very reasonable, and we cordially invite the public to inspect this line of Overcoats, whether purchase is made or not.

At the same time, don't forget our special sale of Mackintosh Coats.

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly con...

GLOBE—

Oct 13 89

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Brilliant Opening of the Symphony Season.

Nikisch's Poetic Reading of a Classical Programme Much Applauded.

Concert Hints and Happenings—Preludes and Echoes.

If one did not know that Mr. Gericke had brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to a state nearly approaching perfection, one would think such a performance as that of yesterday at Music Hall quite incredible. It was a most brilliant and auspicious opening of the ninth Symphony season. The attendance was very large and fashionable; a very cordial reception was accorded the new director, and when the brief concert was over there was no room to doubt that the leader from Leipzig had gained at once great favor.

Herr Nikisch, slight in figure, quiet and confident in manner, gave evidence of his skill as a conductor before the opening selection of the concert was over. He is a man of astonishing memory for one thing, for he directed the programme without looking at a note from beginning to end. And this fact unquestionably was a great aid to him in gaining the remarkable sway which he held over the orchestra, a sway which none but a truly "magnetic" leader could have so secured and so retained. Indeed, as he led his orchestra with no music before him, he gave one the impression of a man, perfectly capable and perfectly self-possessed, who has a vast mechanism under his entire control. When he takes up a work the whole seems photographed in his mind.

It was no doubt largely due to this fact that Herr Nikisch's readings yesterday were characteristic, poetic and singularly effective. As his method of conducting differs essentially from the method of either of his predecessors, so we may look for different and decidedly interesting results. He seems to graduate his own movements with the baton by the music he has in hand. In quiet passages, so to speak, there is scarcely any movement at all—the slightest indication of the time. And on the other hand, at any sharp, decisive period, there is corresponding action.

The programme for the first concert of the new season presented Wagner and Beethoven, the two foremost masters of orchestral writing; Schumann, whose practical knowledge of the orchestra was wonderfully slight in proportion to the effects he produced, and who claims attention by the sheer force of his genius; and the melodious Schubert, who always has a sweet song to sing. The "Coriolanus" overture was magnificently given—better than ever before, we think. The Schubert entr'acte, familiar as it is, was performed with such an exquisite rendering that it seemed as if it had never been really heard before. Nikisch's reading of the Schumann symphony, too, was thoroughly individual; new effects were gained even in this often-heard classic, and the introduction to "The Meistersingers" found most delicate and appreciative interpretation. The concert was very brief, requiring only an hour and a quarter for its performance, so that, though the symphony came last, it did not find the audience wearied, but rather just in the mood for the great classic.

For the second rehearsal and concert the following attractive programme has been arranged, and no doubt the hall on each occasion will be filled to overflowing:

Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, Op. 56...Brahms
Concerto for 'Cello, in A minor.....Goltermann
(First time at these concerts).
Overture, "Fingal's Cave.....Mendelssohn
Soli for Violoncello.
Air.....Bach
Traumerei.....Schumann
Papillon.....Popper
Mr. Anton Hekking.
Symphony No. 7, in A.....Beethoven

Preludes and Echoes.

Richard Carl, humorist, is booked this week in Boston, Sacarappa, Me., Charlestown and Natick.

Jerome Hopkins has been giving his piano lecture concerts to interested audiences in many English towns.

Miss Lilian Carll Smith sings in Fall River, Oct. 15; in Belmont, 16; in Boston, 17; in Andover, 28; and Woonsocket, 31.

The Kneisel quartet, headed by Franz Kneisel and including Otto Roth, Louis Svecenski and Anton Hekking, is to give six concerts this season.

The Irish National concert company will appear at the Boston Theatre Sunday evening Oct. 27, in concert programme, for the benefit of the Home for Destitute Catholic Children.

Von Bulow is coming in the spring, to present new programmes from the works of Beethoven, Liszt, Schumann, and other masters. The first concerts will be given in the latter part of March.

Three concerts are announced at Steinert Hall by the Adamowski quartet, Nov. 18, Dec. 9 and Jan. 6. The membership includes T. Adamowski, first violin; A. Moldauer, second violin; D. Kuntz, viola, and J. Adamowski, 'cello.

The second entertainment in the Star course on Monday evening will bring forward another collection of eminent artists. Miss Emma Juch will sing several classical and popular selections, making then her first and only appearance in Boston this season previous to her operatic engagement. The Listemanns—Bernard, Fritz and Paul—are to assist, together with Fritz Giese, John W. Flockton and G. B. Ronconi.

On the evening of Sept. 25, one of Edison's phonographs was placed in the prompter's box at the Folies-Dramatiques in Paris, and registered the principal music of "The Chimes of Normandy," which was given its eleven hundredth performance on that occasion. The cylinders upon which the music is recorded, after having been exhibited in Paris, are to be sent to New York when the exposition closes, and Americans will be enabled to hear, by means of them, the

...ENTY-FOUR PAGE

Jordan, Marsh & Co.

Three Conspicuous Bargains In Choice

House-Dress Fabrics.

...AVARIAN REPS, regular width, 10c. per yard

...ICILIAN REPS, 25 inches wide, 10c. per yard

...RAP DE PERSIA, 24 inches wide, the BEST manufacture . . . . . 12½c. per yard

These are all selected and handsome ...tyles, of a superior printing.

Primrose Cloth, —OR— FINE SHIRTING CAMBRIC.

Primrose Cloth, or fine Shirting Cambric, full 36 inches wide, a wash fabric, colors absolutely fast, for 12½c. Per Yard.

In white grounds, small and medium ...gures, extensively used for Indoor ...Dresses, Children's Wear, Fancy ...Shirts, &c.

Infants' Wear.

150 Heavy Plush Garments FOR CHILDREN.

Sizes 1 to 4 years, colors Cardinal, Brown, Blue and Terra Cotta. This is our regular $5.00 Garment for this sale.

$3.50.

Colored Skirts.

A small lot of fine quality Gray Melton Cloth Skirts, a regular $1.00 quality, for . . . . . 75c.

Black Lasting Skirts, deep quilting Velvet, bound, large sizes, at only $1.00

Millinery.

SPECIAL BARGAIN.

250 dozen Trimmed Felt Walking Hats, all colors, for Ladies and Misses, 69c. Worth $1.25.

MEN'S FURNISHINGS.

Overcoats, Cape Coats and Ulsters.

We shall open on Monday morning in this department a full line of Men's Overcoats and Ulsters. This is a new departure with us, and our customers will find upon inspection the most complete line of this class of goods to be found in Boston, and the prices named, for the quality, are very reasonable, and we cordially invite the public to inspect this line of Overcoats, whether purchase is made or not.

At the same time, don't forget our special sale of Mackintosh Coats.

Being asked to give his opinion of the selections for the programme, Mr. Zerrahn said that he considered the selection excellent, and that if the taste in this first one was continued, he felt sure they would suit the Boston public, although one single programme, and that the first, was hardly a fair test.

Mr. Zerrahn, having concluded all that he had to say about the concert, hastened away to find Mr. Nikisch.

MR. B. J. LANG'S VIEWS.

It was easy this evening to understand why the Leipsigers have been raving about Mr. Nikisch for the past few years. But one must not forget that the remarkable things accomplished would have been impossible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. As a conductor of his programme of strongly contrasted music as to schools, keys, etc., and

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

MR. NIKISCH IN BOSTON.

He Opens the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Ninth Season.

Boston, Oct. 13.

The ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was opened last evening in Music Hall, when Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor, first appeared before the Boston public. Neither eight years ago, when Mr. Henschel stood upon Music Hall platform to start the newly formed organization upon its career, nor five years ago, when Mr. Gericke took the charge delivered over to him, was there so much interest as centred in Mr. Nikisch and his work last evening. Mr. Gericke had brought the orchestra up to such an entirely unique standard of technical perfection that it was really a very difficult task to select his successor; the public felt possessed of a sort of vested interest in having the standard maintained—and in incompetent hands nothing would be easier to lose than all the laborious achievements of eight years. Of course Mr. Nikisch's standing abroad was enough to satisfy those who knew of it and of the qualities upon which it was based; therefore, undoubtedly, expectant attention, rather than anxiety was the frame of mind that prevailed among the vast audience that filled every seat in Music Hall and every inch of standing room; but interest there certainly was and that in the most abundant measure.

Mr. Nikisch, who took his stand before the orchestra with the utmost of self-possession, showed himself as a man much below the normal figure, with a jet black shock of hair, a black, pointed beard, delicate and refined features, that seem extremely pale, perhaps by contrast, and a very low bow to his public. He conducts everything without notes, and has not even a music stand before him to rap on. His hand is raised high in the air for the opening note, and brought down with a very short, sharp motion, almost a jerk; but his manner of conducting is extremely quiet, his beat short but instinct with decision, his left hand rarely raised to emphasize or to restrain.

His opening programme was a generous union of the classical and the modern, as follows:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Overture, "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Symphony No. 4, (D minor).....Schumann

There was nothing here that Boston audiences had not heard many times; yet undoubtedly the performance had for the thinking portion of those present, more of novelty and of surprise in store than if it had been crammed full of the latest products from the Sclavonic or Gallic schools. The novelty was in the entire attitude of Mr. Nikisch towards the works he is conducting, in the independence he exercises in gaining an expression of the composer's meaning in the various resources and devices he has, with which to penetrate to the inner beauties of a composition and bring them out—in short, in all that may be implied or included in the "reading" of a work.

Comparisons are, perhaps, inevitable in thtis case, though there is no reason why they should be odious; and surely, there is room to point out some differences in the methods of Mr. Gericke and of Mr. Nikisch, without in the least casting a slight upon the extraordinary services of the former, and the remarkable results he achieved with the orchestra during his leadership of it. Mr. Gericke's constant aim was to secure a balance, a carefully adjusted relationship between the different qualities of orchestral color, which has always to be preserved as closely as possible. Consequently he worked to repress the sonorous brass, to subdue the piercing woodwind, and to fuse their characteristics as near completely as possible into the general volume of the tone. Mr. Nikisch, on the other hand, seeks to bring out the import of each strongly marked phrase given to a special instrument, to emphasize each touch of characteristic tone-quality that imparts a passing color effort. So no instrument is excused from expressing in its own most significant fashion, whatever the composer has given it of special significance, the ponderous trombone no more than the rest. But even more noteworthy is Mr. Nikisch's use of freedom in the tempo as a means of repression. It is a characteristic of the conductors of Mr. Gericke's school to effect as smooth and fluent performance as possible by the most perfect exactitude in the matter of time—what Wagner, in speaking of Mendelssohn's style of conducting, compared to the water flowing from a town pump. "Classical tradition," as handed down through Mendelssohn, demands this sort of interpretation, and it is widely removed from the methods adopted by Mr. Nikisch and other great conductors who have fallen under Wagner's influence. It cannot be denied that there is a wonderous charm in such a performance from the hands of a great master. The lingering upon a phrase here, the dwelling and emphasis upon a measure there, the acceleration of whole passages sometimes marked, sometimes almost imperceptible, the retarding of others in greater or less degree, the claiming of an instinctive pause, where the noted music speak of none, and all in utter indifference to what the metronome would say—these are things that gave to Mr. Nikisch's readings new life and vitality and expressiveness. His rarely subtle use of dynamic effects, too, his carefully wrought shading, the enlarged limits he sets between his fortissimo and his pianissimo, insomuch widen the scope within which he can work. These elaborations are the product as much of poetical fancy as of intellectual vigor and insight; and their combined power is to give to the performances under Mr. Nikisch's baton all there is in poetry more beautiful than prose. Mr. Nikisch's readings last evening were a constant revelation of new beauties, of hitherto veiled or unsuspected shades of meaning. There is much in them that will doubtless arouse the disapproval of the conservative, as there is much that is marked in deviating from the prescriptions of tradition. But few can fail to realize the powerful claims that such conducting has upon the intelligence as well as upon the sensibilities. There is this danger, however, in such freedom, that only in the hands of a master is it safe. Should the lesser leaders of orchestral forces fall too in imitation, there will be much sad work done.

It is needless to say that the orchestra itself as magnificent in tonal beauty and in technical finish as ever; its pliability in its new conductor's hands was remarkable, and will, of course, increase as acquaintance with his methods and wishes grows. There is scarcely a change in the composition of the orchestra, the most important being the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Giese, and of three minor players in the ranks.

The next programme includes Brahms's variation on a theme by Haydn, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," and Beethoven's seventh symphony, while Mr. Hekking will play a concerto for 'cello by Goltermann and some short pieces.

Oct 14 89

New York Times

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

Success is an abused word. To too many of us it is measured by cold dollars. We are prone to forget that many things of great artistic worth do not draw money, and therefore to gauge a man's achievements by their potency in opening the public pocket. This human failing may lead to some obscurement of the real nature of the success of Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, who made his first appearance before Americans at the public rehearsal and concert in the Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Nikisch was greeted by an audience of large size, representing a substantial sum of money. His work evoked enthusiasm, and there need be no fear that he will fail to establish himself as a firm favorite with the Boston public. He will be seen and heard in New-York in the course of the season, and will undoubtedly secure a strong hold on the affection of metropolitan music-lovers.

We see a musical conductor before we hear his work. Therefore let us first consider the impression which Mr. Nikisch makes on the eye. He is a man of short stature and slight figure, with a waist effeminate in its tapering lines. His head is rounded well and covered with wavy dark hair, which lies in "admired disorder." His face is pale, and is adorned by a rich brown beard. His eyes are deep set, thoughtful, and expressive. His hands are marvelously white and graceful.

His manner on the platform is self-contained and concentrated. He wastes no demonstrations on his audience. His whole force is molded into a keen and fixed glance at that part of the orchestra on which he is making some special call. His use of the baton is unique in its simplicity and pictorial in its significance to the eye. The spectator knows what he wishes the orchestra to do and is gratified by the ready acquiescence of his men. Short, sharp, angular beats are given for the precise stroke of exacting chords. Graceful undulatory movements lure forth the singing voices of the strings. Uplifted arms and piercing gaze wake the pealing blast of the brasses. And yet all is done quietly and with no perceptible effort at picturesqueness. The man is full of magnetism. The eye sees the evidences of it while the mind feels its influence.

Arthur Nikisch combines qualities which fit him to be a leader in music as well as a leader of musicians. No one need fear that the magnificent precision, the military accuracy of attack, the polished elocution of the Boston orchestra will deteriorate under his baton. As a drillmaster he is manifestly admirable. As an interpreter he commands the highest praise. Every work performed under his direction on Saturday night had been subjected to a keen and searching analysis. The man had no doubts in his conceptions of the works in hand. He had translated every bar to his own satisfaction after a careful study based on a high musical scholarship and a thoughtful sympathy.

But his analysis was not directed merely toward a thorough exposition of the structure of the work to be played. It concerned itself adequately with that, but still more deeply with the intellectual purpose and the poetic significance of the music. Mr. Nikisch unquestionably possesses, in addition to his command as a disciplinarian, a rich and generous warmth of temperament. He has a sympathetic appreciation of the composer's feeling that reaches backward across the years and becomes instinct with a vitality that seems contemporaneous with the birth of the work in the composer's mind.

This is the highest tribute that can be paid to a conductor. It is a quality which he shares with a master actor who reveals to us the soul of a dramatic poem. This is what Mr. Nikisch does for a composition. He finds its soul. He is not a servant of the metronome, nor a slave of tradition. His individuality is too strong to permit this. He meets the requirement of Wagner, who in his treatise on conducting says that the true director finds the law of the tempo in the character of the melody. It is a rare and influential gift; but no one could fail to recognize its presence in this man who heard his reading of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel. In addition, its splendid exposition of every theme, its masterly revelation of the contrapuntal structure of the work, its just estimate of the relative importance of the various themes, its unfailingly dramatic use of modifications of tempo and dynamic effects, it was surcharged with a broad, dignified, and overwhelming poetic power. It made one realize how von Bülow must have been carried off his mental balance to hurry certain portions of the composition as he did last Spring, and it carried with it an irresistible conviction that this was the true statement of Wagner's intent and feeling. Never has that immortal prelude been so well played in America.

The same qualities were displayed in his interpretation of the other three works on the programme—Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Schubert's entr'acte music from "Rosamunde," and Schumann's D minor symphony. Taken all in all, the concert made an evening of convictions. The compositions spoke not only for Mr. Nikisch but for themselves and for their composers. It is a happy thing not only for Boston, but for America, that there is a Col. Higginson to keep such an orchestra together, to retain it for the continual production of thoroughly-rehearsed performances, and for the complete and satisfactory exposition of its conductor's conceptions. It is another happy thing that so strong a leader has been found for this musical battalion. Mr. Nikisch is undeniably ready to take up the work which Mr. Gericke has laid down and to carry it forward to new and grander heights.

Oct 14 89

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,

It is now eight years since the munificence and public spirit of a wealthy Boston gentleman brought to its realization the idea of establishing a popular series of orchestral concerts, on the model of the London popular concerts and others in Germany as well known. In the years that have elapsed money and pains have been bestowed upon it with an almost unexampled liberality to bring it to the highest point of excellence attainable, which it is by no means a mere local pride that recognizes as a fulfilled purpose. What is more, the institution has furnished such a stimulus to musical culture in Boston and has so grown into the life of the city as to give it the popular support of an enthusiasm altogether unique in this country. Its importance is far more than local; it is well nigh national. The self-assertive phases of Boston culture have become something of a byword; but there is no more striking proof that that culture is far from being a name without a fact behind it than the brief history of this great musical organization and all that it represents. Its ninth season was opened last Saturday evening in Boston, and was notable for more reasons than one. Never have its material prospects been so substantial, nor, what is more important, its artistic outlook more brilliant. The first appearance of its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, gave evidence that there is a period at hand for the orchestra of even higher achievement than it has yet reached, in a sphere to which only the leadership of a musician of the very first rank can penetrate.

Oct 14 89

THE EVENING POST: NEW YORK.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

BOSTON, October 13.—Boston has no regular opera season like New York, and the interest of amateurs, therefore, centres in the symphony concerts, as used to be the case in New York before the advent of German opera. Thanks to the continued liberality of Mr. Higginson, the Bostonians are provided with better and more concerts than the music-lovers of cities of twice the size of Boston and more, such as Chicago or Philadelphia. The Boston Symphony Society gives twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals every winter, and the prices of admission, especially to the rehearsals, are so reasonable that no one can plead poverty as a cause of musical ignorance or indifference. Once in a while the Hub is swept by a tornado of critical discussion, and this always happens when a new conductor appears on the scene to take charge of the beloved Symphony Orchestra. When Mr. Henschel first began to wield his bâton, great was the commotion in Music Hall and all the avenues that radiate from it. And when Mr. Gericke replaced Mr. Henschel, the musical atmosphere was so violently disturbed that the Signal Service officers in the New York Equitable tower must have felt tempted to announce a storm brewing in the northeast. Mr. Gericke, too, has returned to his home in Vienna, taking with him laurels and shekels enough to last him a lifetime; and last evening, once more, a Music-Hall audience had the pleasant and exciting experience of estimating the capacity of a new conductor, Mr. Nikisch of Leipsic.

The newspapers, with true American enterprise and love of personalities, had long ago taken care that every man, woman, and child should know more about Arthur Nikisch's life and labors than perhaps half-a-dozen persons ever did in Leipsic, where he conducted the opera a number of years. He began his career as an infant prodigy by appearing in public as a solo violinist, at the age of eight, in 1863. Three years later he entered the Vienna Conservatory, where he remained eight years, and on leaving that succeeded in getting a place among the first violins in the Royal Opera orchestra. Here, for four years, he had the advantage of playing under the bâtons of Richter and Jahn, and subsequently at Leipsic he became assistant to the most inspired of all Wagnerian conductors, Anton Seidl. In 1879 Manager Neumann intrusted to him the company at the New Opera-house, where he soon won fame, especially by his fine performances of Wagner's operas. Finally, he frequently had the honor of taking the place of Reinecke in conducting the Gewandhaus orchestra. In 1883 he conducted the concerts of the Tonkünstler-Versammlung, and more recently those of the Liszt Society. These facts are of interest not only because they attest his wide experience, but because they throw some light on his personal tastes and preferences.

Saturday's audience, being, as I have said, fully posted in regard to all these matters, was on the tiptoe of expectation to greet the new conductor, who is to interpret the classical and modern masters for them for at least three years. There was no question that the orchestra would play well. It had been so thoroughly and sternly trained during the last five years by Mr. Gericke, and the poor players gradually weeded out, that it was a foregone conclusion that it would prove satisfactory. The problem was therefore purely a personal one: how would Mr. Nikisch play on this instrument, constructed and perfected by Messrs. Henschel and Gericke? The orchestra was in place shortly after eight, and every eye was turned towards the stage entrance to the left when Mr. Nikisch quietly and slowly came forward. Loud and prolonged applause greeted him, of which he had to bow his acknowledgment again and again; a man below medium stature, with dark hair and complexion, and the supple movements of a Hungarian. One of the players hands him the bâton, but before he raises it he waits until the flutter of excitement has subsided into absolute silence. That this début, as personal as that of a great singer, did affect his nerves was shown by his ... his back hair unconsciously three ... while all eyes were on him. The hair ... no stroking, for it is not over long. But there was some cause for nervousness, for a conductor in such a situation must not only, like a singer, retain his self-control, but also control an orchestra of seventy-five men. Besides, he had no desk, no score to guide him, and the first number, moreover, was the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger," one of the most difficult pieces to conduct, full of subtle changes of tempo, and every bar requiring its own dynamic shading. Here was courage and confidence truly; and not only this opening piece, but everything on the programme, including Schumann's fourth symphony, was thus conducted from memory.

It cannot be said that the playing of the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel was a revelation to those who had heard it under Thomas or Seidl or Bülow. It was full of energy and contrasts and dynamic pomp and grandeur, but it seemed as if not all of the polyphonic humor which crops out here and there in this marvellous work had been brought out. The performance was loudly applauded, and after a brief interval was followed by another overture. Two overtures in succession might seem a flaw in programme-making, but Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture is so utterly different from every point of view from Wagner's Vorspiel that such a criticism could be easily met and answered by the question, "What's in a name?" The sombre majesty of the Beethoven overture was clearly revealed, but it was not till the third number, the well-known "Rosamunde" entr'acte of Schubert, that Mr. Nikisch began to interest connoisseurs by the striking originality and poetic individualism of his conception and interpretation—possibly because not till then did he begin to feel perfectly at ease in his new situation. It was an exquisitely refined and eloquent reading, with clear phrasing and fine contrasting of the different themes, the harmonies being daintily interwoven with the melodies like the finest lace work. It was a reading which proved anew that no composer gains more by a careful attention to microscopic details than Schubert.

But the gem of the concert was Schumann's fourth symphony, the interpretation of which indubitably attested Mr. Nikisch's claims to be placed in the front rank of orchestral conductors. This symphony, which is one of the highest volcanic summits of the revolutionary movement which created the modern romantic school, has, perhaps, never been played here before in such a thoroughly romantic spirit, so obviously in accordance with Schumann's intentions. In this symphony Schumann attempted to create a real organic unity between the different movements by means of reminiscences, or repetitions of themes previously used—a device of which subsequent writers have not, unfortunately, seen the epoch-creating importance. Still more significant are the frequent changes of tempo, not only as regards the different divisions of the symphony, but in matters of detail, to bring out the true emotional significance of which the use of the tempo rubato is almost as necessary as in a Chopin mazurka. It was these characteristics of Schumann's fourth symphony, no doubt, which prompted Mr. Nikisch to select it for his début. He wanted to show that he is a conductor of the modern school—not a mere animated metronome wound up to beat through an allegro or andante with the regularity of a pendulum, but a thinking, feeling individual who lets the ever-changing character of the melody sway his bâton. Following Wagner's directions, he searches always for the melos, dwelling on it where it is of a sad or plaintive character (as at the opening and close of the "Coriolanus" overture), and hurrying excitedly through an accelerando, or a series of such, as in the last movement of the Schumann symphony, which Mr. Nikisch brought to a superb climax.

No doubt he is a more poetic and emotional conductor than his predecessor, and the freedom which he allowed to the brass in the finale of the symphony not only greatly enhanced the grandeur of that movement, but showed that he does not suffer from what might be called the chalkophobia which gave a tame, ascetic, colorless character to some of Mr. Gericke's readings. A prominent American composer complained frequently in my hearing that he could never get Mr. Gericke to do justice to a fortissimo in his compositions. He will not be likely to find fault with Mr. Nikisch, who, in this respect as well as in his use of the rubato, follows in the footsteps of his former colleague, Mr. Seidl.

It is not a mere accident that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Seidl and Mr. Gericke, is a Hungarian by birth, though a German by education. The tendency of modern music is away from the metronome to the tempo rubato, and this poetic freedom of movement is the very essence of Hungarian music; hence the popularity of Hungarian conductors and their natural predilection for Wagner's music.

In one respect Mr. Nikisch appears absolutely unique among modern conductors. Not only, as I have remarked, did he conduct the whole of Saturday's concert without a score, but it is said that he conducts whole operas in the same way. Provided his memory is equal to the enormous feat of retaining the details of a full operatic score, there is no doubt an advantage in this method, as it enables the leader to devote all his attention to the expression and phrasing of the music. Pianists always play better if they have their pieces by heart—why should not the same be true of a conductor? Mr. Nikisch will give New York audiences several opportunities of hearing his superb orchestra this winter, and it is to be hoped he will not forget to include the Schumann symphony in one of his programmes.

H. T. F.

[4]

Oct 14 89

GLOBE

NIKISCH A SUCCESS.

What the Critics Say of the New Symphony Director.

The first appearance of Arthur Nikisch as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra was an unqualified success. He has received the hearty approval of the city's leading critics, and the respect and admiration of all who attended the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert.

The opinions of several representative musicians will be read with interest. Carl Zerrahn says that he has nothing to criticise, but everything to praise. He considered him in no sense a drillmaster, but a genuine conductor after his own heart.

B. J. Lang does not doubt that a man of eminent ability and talent has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's orchestra, and prophecies a winter of great musical excitement. He does not want it forgotten, however, that the remarkable results attained by the new director could not have been possible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. He rather objects to Mr. Nikisch directing without notes.

Prof. John K. Paine says:

"I find that Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fire and great expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. Above all, he gives the orchestral instruments full freedom, especially the brass. They are not restrained, as with the previous conductor, but the orchestra can appear in its full glory. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

George L. Osgood thinks that the rare talent of the new conductor will be more apparent as the season progresses and the orchestra becomes better acquainted with its leader. Of the playing of the Schumann Symphony he says:

"The musical, heartfelt rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument."

Bernhard Listeman considers Mr. Nikisch superior in all essential points to his two predecessors. He says that his interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a follower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many and probably opposed by some others.

Oct 6 89

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL,

Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held his first rehearsal last week, and is reported to have been very much pleased with the organization. "Technically," he told a Boston Post reporter, "they are magnificent, and what struck me especially was the great intelligence with whic they the great intelligence with which they played and the rapidity with which they understood all my intentions." The orchestra is likewise reported to have reciprocated fully the pleasant feeling. The first concert will be given next Saturday evening; and the programme is this: Overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven; ballet music to Rosamunde, Schubert; symphony in D minor, Schumann, and Meistersinger Vorspiel, Wagner. This is conservative as well as chronological; but Mr. Nikisch undoubtedly does well to include in his first programme works with which orchestra and public are all quite familiar.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The series of four concerts announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 23, Nov. 20, Jan. 29, and Feb. 26, at 8 o'clock. It is as yet too early to announce programmes or soloists, but something of exceptional interest in the way of both may be expected. The new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, begins his work in Boston under the very best auspices, and his skill in programme-making is as great as his distinction as an orchestral conductor. As for soloists, the public has found that only first-class performers are engaged for the Symphony orchestra, whose work may be on a level with the unsurpassed playing of that organization. The subscription list for the season will be opened at Steinert's immediately, and subscribers will have the choice of seats before the sale for single concerts is opened.

Oct 15

ADVERTISER.

THE SYMPHONY.

Programme for this Afternoon and Tomorrow Evening.

The programme of this afternoon and tomorrow night, although very interesting, is not new to Boston, and requires no analysis. The Brahms Variations are splendid specimens of contrapuntal and orchestral skill. The theme by Haydn—Chorale St. Antoni—is lofty and well suited to treatment. Brahms uses the contrabassoon at the very beginning, in excellent style, with a pizzicato of contrabasses. The woodwind will have some excellent opportunities to display itself, particularly the bassoons and oboes. The eighth variation gives some charming passages on the muted strings, and in the latter portions of the work piccolo and triangle are added to the score. The Fingal's Cave overture by Mendelssohn is the most spontaneous of all his works; in fact, when he went to the Isle of Staffa he was so inspired by the surroundings that he at once turned them into music, and sent 20 measures of orchestral score, written on the spot, to his sister Fanny. These contain that flashing, characteristic wave figure which is the charm of the whole overture, and is ever present in it.

Mr. Hekking displays himself in all schools of 'cello playing, the short pieces giving him an opportunity to sentimentalize in Schumann's Traümerei, and to display pyrotechnics in Popper's "Papillons." The Beethoven 7th symphony is the most romantic of the entire nine, and will afford the new conductor a chance to give full vent to his poetic instincts. The second movement (the allegretto) is the gem of the work, and in fact, one of the finest movements ever composed by Beethoven.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

Success is an abused word. To too many of us it is measured by cold dollars. We are prone to forget that many things of great artistic worth do not draw money, and therefore to gauge a man's achievements by their potency in opening the public pocket. This human failing may lead to some obscurement of the real nature of the success of Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, who made his first appearance before Americans at the public rehearsal and concert in the Boston Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Nikisch was greeted by an audience of large size, representing a substantial sum of money. His work evoked enthusiasm, and there need be no fear that he will fail to establish himself as a firm favorite with the Boston public. He will be seen and heard in New-York in the course of the season, and will undoubtedly secure a strong hold on the affection of metropolitan music-lovers.

We see a musical conductor before we hear his work. Therefore let us first consider the impression which Mr. Nikisch makes on the eye. He is a man of short stature and slight figure, with a waist effeminate in its tapering lines. His head is rounded well and covered with wavy dark hair, which lies in "admired disorder." His face is pale, and is adorned by a rich brown beard. His eyes are deep set, thoughtful, and expressive. His hands are marvelously white and graceful.

His manner on the platform is self-contained and concentrated. He wastes no demonstrations on his audience. His whole force is molded into a keen and fixed glance at that part of the orchestra on which he is making some special call. His use of the baton is unique in its simplicity and pictorial in its significance to the eye. The spectator knows what he wishes the orchestra to do and is gratified by the ready acquiescence of his men. Short, sharp, angular beats are given for the precise stroke of exacting chords. Graceful undulatory movements lure forth the singing voices of the strings. Uplifted arms and piercing gaze wake the pealing blast of the brasses. And yet all is done quietly and with no perceptible effort at picturesqueness. The man is full of magnetism. The eye sees the evidences of it while the mind feels its influence.

Arthur Nikisch combines qualities which fit him to be a leader in music as well as a leader of musicians. No one need fear that the magnificent precision, the military accuracy of attack, the polished elocution of the Boston orchestra will deteriorate under his baton. As a drillmaster he is manifestly admirable. As an interpreter he commands the highest praise. Every work performed under his direction on Saturday night had been subjected to a keen and searching analysis. The man had no doubts in his conceptions of the works in hand. He had translated every bar to his own satisfaction after a careful study based on a high musical scholarship and a thoughtful sympathy.

But his analysis was not directed merely toward a thorough exposition of the structure of the work to be played. It concerned itself adequately with that, but still more deeply with the intellectual purpose and the poetic significance of the music. Mr. Nikisch unquestionably possesses, in addition to his command as a disciplinarian, a rich and generous warmth of temperament. He has a sympathetic appreciation of the composer's feeling that reaches backward across the years and becomes instinct with a vitality that seems contemporaneous with the birth of the work in the composer's mind.

This is the highest tribute that can be paid to a conductor. It is a quality which he shares with a master actor who reveals to us the soul of a dramatic poem. This is what Mr. Nikisch does for a composition. He finds its soul. He is not a servant of the metronome, nor a slave of tradition. His individuality is too strong to permit this. He meets the requirement of Wagner, who in his treatise on conducting says that the true director finds the law of the tempo in the character of the melody. It is a rare and influential gift; but no one could fail to recognize its presence in this man who heard his reading of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel. In addition, its splendid exposition of every theme, its masterly revelation of the contrapuntal structure of the work, its just estimate of the relative importance of the various themes, its unfailingly dramatic use of modifications of tempo and dynamic effects, it was surcharged with a broad, dignified, and overwhelming poetic power. It made one realize how von Bülow must have been carried off his mental balance to hurry certain portions of the composition as he did last Spring, and it carried with it an irresistible conviction that this was the true statement of Wagner's intent and feeling. Never has that immortal prelude been so well played in America.

The same qualities were displayed in his interpretation of the other three works on the programme—Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Schubert's entr'acte music from "Rosamunde," and Schumann's D minor symphony. Taken all in all, the concert made an evening of convictions. The compositions spoke not only for Mr. Nikisch but for themselves and for their composers. It is a happy thing not only for Boston, but for America, that there is a Col. Higginson to keep such an orchestra together, to retain it for the continual production of thoroughly-rehearsed performances, and for the complete and satisfactory exposition of its conductor's conceptions. It is another happy thing that so strong a leader has been found for this musical battalion. Mr. Nikisch [illegible] has laid down and to carry it forward to new and grander heights.

Oct 14 89

PROVIDENCE J[illegible] MO[illegible]

It is now eight years since the [illegible]ence and public spirit of a [illegible] Boston gentleman brought to its realization the idea of establishing a popular series of orchestral concerts, on the model of the London popular concerts and others in Germany as well known. In the years that have elapsed money and pains have been bestowed upon it with an almost unexampled liberality to bring it to the highest point of excellence attainable, which it is by no means a mere local pride that recognizes as a fulfilled purpose. What is more, the institution has furnished such a stimulus to musical culture in Boston and has so grown into the life of the city as to give it the popular support of an enthusiasm altogether unique in this country. Its importance is far more than local; it is well nigh national. The self-assertive phases of Boston culture have become something of a byword; but there is no more striking proof that that culture is far from being a name without a fact behind it than the brief history of this great musical organization and all that it represents. Its ninth season was opened last Saturday evening in Boston, and [illegible] notable for more reasons than one. [illegible] have its material prospects been [illegible] what is more [illegible] [illegible] its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, gave evidence that there is a period at hand for the orchestra of even higher achievement than it has yet reached, in a sphere to which only the leadership of a musician of the very first rank can

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

BOSTON, October 13.—Boston has no regular opera season like New York, and the interest of amateurs, therefore, centres in the symphony concerts, as used to be the case in New York before the advent of German opera. Thanks to the continued liberality of Mr. Higginson, the Bostonians are provided with better and more concerts than the music-lovers of cities of twice the size of Boston and more, such as Chicago or Philadelphia. The Boston Symphony Society gives twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals every winter, and the prices of admission, especially to the rehearsals, are so reasonable that no one can plead poverty as a cause of musical ignorance or indifference. Once in a while the Hub is swept by a tornado of critical discussion, and this always happens when a new conductor appears on the scene to take charge of the beloved Symphony Orchestra. When Mr. Henschel first began to wield his baton, great was the commotion in Music Hall and all the avenues that radiate from it. And when Mr. Gericke replaced Mr. Henschel, the musical atmosphere was so violently disturbed that the Signal Service officers in the New York Equitable tower must have felt tempted to announce a storm brewing in the northeast. Mr. Gericke, too, has returned to his home in Vienna, taking with him laurels and shekels enough to last him a lifetime; and last evening, once more, a Music-Hall audience had the pleasant and exciting experience of estimating the capacity of a new conductor, Mr. Nikisch of Leipsic.

The newspapers, with true American enterprise and love of personalities, had long ago taken care that every man, woman, and child should know more about Arthur Nikisch's life and labors than perhaps half-a-dozen persons ever did in Leipsic, where he conducted the opera a number of years. He began his career as an infant prodigy by appearing in public as a solo violinist, at the age of eight, in 1868. Three years later he entered the Vienna Conservatory, where he remained eight years, and on leaving that succeeded in getting a place among the first violins in the Royal Opera orchestra. Here, for four years, he had the advantage of playing under the batons of Richter and Jahn, and subsequently at Leipsic he became assistant to the most inspired of all Wagnerian conductors, Anton Seidl. In 1879 Manager Neumann intrusted to him the company at the New Opera-house, where he soon won fame, especially by his fine performances of Wagner's operas. Finally, he frequently had the honor of taking the place of Reinecke in conducting the Gewandhaus orchestra. In 1883 he conducted the concerts of the Tonkünstler-Versammlung, and more recently those of the Liszt Society. These facts are of interest not only because they attest his wide experience, but because they throw some light on his personal tastes and preferences.

Saturday's audience, being, as I have said, fully posted in regard to all these matters, was on the tiptoe of expectation to greet the new conductor, who is to interpret the classical and modern masters for them for at least three years. There was no question that the orchestra would play well. It had been so thoroughly and sternly trained during the last five years by Mr. Gericke, and the poor players gradually weeded out, that it was a foregone conclusion that it would prove satisfactory. The problem was therefore purely a personal one: how would Mr. Nikisch play on this instrument, constructed and perfected by Messrs. Henschel and Gericke? The orchestra was in place shortly after eight, and every eye was turned towards the stage entrance to the left when Mr. Nikisch quietly and slowly came forward. Loud and prolonged applause greeted him, of which he had to bow his acknowledgment again and again; a man below medium stature, with dark hair and complexion, and the supple movements of a Hungarian. One of the players hands him the bâton, but before he raises it he waits until the flutter of excitement has subsided into absolute silence. That this début, as personal almost as that of a great singer, did somewhat affect his nerves was shown by his stroking his back hair unconsciously three times, while all eyes were on him. The hair needed no stroking, for it is not over long. But there was some cause for nervousness, for a conductor in such a situation must not only, like a singer, retain his self-control, but also control an orchestra of seventy-five men. Besides, he had no desk, no score to guide him, and the first number, moreover, was the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger," one of the most difficult pieces to conduct, full of subtle changes of tempo, and every bar requiring its own dynamic shading. Here was courage and confidence truly; and not only this opening piece, but everything on the programme, including Schumann's fourth symphony, was thus conducted from memory.

It cannot be said that the playing of the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel was a revelation to those who had heard it under Thomas or Seidl or Bülow. It was full of energy and contrasts and dynamic pomp and grandeur, but it seemed as if not all of the polyphonic humor which crops out here and there in this marvellous work had been brought out. The performance was loudly applauded, and after a brief interval was followed by another overture. Two overtures in succession might seem a flaw in programme-making, but Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture is so utterly different from every point of view from Wagner's Vorspiel that such a criticism could be easily met and answered by the question, "What's in a name?" The sombre majesty of the Beethoven overture was clearly revealed, but it was not till the third number, the well-known "Rosamunde" entr'acte of Schubert, that Mr. Nikisch began to interest connoisseurs by the striking originality and poetic individualism of his conception and interpretation—possibly because not till then did he begin to feel perfectly at ease in his new situation. It was an exquisitely refined and eloquent reading, with clear phrasing and fine contrasting of the different themes, the harmonies being daintily interwoven with the melodies like the finest lace work. It was a reading which proved anew that no composer gains more by a careful attention to microscopic details than Schubert.

But the gem of the concert was Schumann's fourth symphony, the interpretation of which indubitably attested Mr. Nikisch's claims to be placed in the front rank of orchestral conductors. This symphony, which is one of the highest volcanic summits of the revolutionary movement which created the modern romantic school, has, perhaps, never been played here before in such a thoroughly romantic spirit, so obviously in accordance with Schumann's intentions. In this symphony Schumann attempted to create a real organic unity between the different movements by means of reminiscences, or repetitions of themes previously used—a device of which subsequent writers have not, unfortunately, seen the epoch-creating importance. Still more significant are the frequent changes of tempo, not only as regards the different divisions of the symphony, but in matters of detail, to bring out the true emotional significance of which the use of the tempo rubato is almost as necessary as in a Chopin mazurka. It was these characteristics of Schumann's fourth symphony, no doubt, which prompted Mr. Nikisch to select it for his début. He wanted to show that he is a conductor of the modern school—not a mere animated metronome wound up to beat through an allegro or andante with the regularity of a pendulum, but a thinking, feeling individual who lets the ever-changing character of the melody sway his bâton. Following Wagner's directions, he searches always for the melos, dwelling on it where it is of a sad or plaintive character (as at the opening and close of the "Coriolanus" overture), and hurrying excitedly through an accelerando, or a series of such, as in the last movement of the Schumann symphony, which Mr. Nikisch brought to a superb climax.

No doubt he is a more poetic and emotional conductor than his predecessor, and the freedom which he allowed to the brass in the finale of the symphony not only greatly enhanced the grandeur of that movement, but showed that he does not suffer from what might be called the chalkophobia which gave a tame, ascetic, colorless character to some of Mr. Gericke's readings. A prominent American composer complained frequently in my hearing that he could never get Mr. Gericke to do justice to a fortissimo in his compositions. He will not be likely to find fault with Mr. Nikisch, who, in this respect as well as in his use of the rubato, follows in the footsteps of his former colleague, Mr. Seidl.

It is not a mere accident that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Seidl and Mr. Gericke, is a Hungarian by birth, though a German by education. The tendency of modern music is away from the metronome to the tempo rubato, and this poetic freedom of movement is the very essence of Hungarian music; hence the popularity of Hungarian conductors and their natural predilection for Wagner's music.

In one respect Mr. Nikisch appears absolutely unique among modern conductors. Not only, as I have remarked, did he conduct the whole of Saturday's concert without a score, but it is said that he conducts whole operas in the same way. Provided his memory is equal to the enormous feat of retaining the details of a full operatic score, there is no doubt an advantage in this method, as it enables the leader to devote all his attention to the expression and phrasing of the music. Pianists always play better if they have their pieces by heart—why should not the same be true of a conductor? Mr. Nikisch will give New York audiences several opportunities of hearing his superb orchestra this winter, and it is to be hoped he will not forget to include the Schumann symphony in one of his programmes.

H. T. F.

NIKISCH A SUCCESS.

What the Critics Say of the New Symphony Director.

The first appearance of Arthur Nikisch as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra was an unqualified success. He has received the hearty approval of the city's leading critics, and the respect and admiration of all who attended the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the Saturday evening concert.

The opinions of several representative musicians will be read with interest. Carl Zerrahn says that he has nothing to criticise, but everything to praise. He considered him in no sense a drillmaster, but a genuine conductor after his own heart.

B. J. Lang does not doubt that a man of eminent ability and talent has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's orchestra, and prophecies a winter of great musical excitement. He does not want it forgotten, however, that the remarkable results attained by the new director could not have been possible without the superb work of Mr. Gericke. He rather objects to Mr. Nikisch directing without notes.

Prof. John K. Paine says:

"I find that Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fire and great expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. Above all, he gives the orchestral instruments full freedom, especially the brass. They are not restrained, as with the previous conductor, but the orchestra can appear in its full glory. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

George L. Osgood thinks that the rare talent of the new conductor will be more apparent as the season progresses and the orchestra becomes better acquainted with its leader. Of the playing of the Schumann Symphony he says:

"The musical, heartfelt rounding out of each phrase, giving its own peculiar expression, coming from the phrase before and blending with the phrase that followed, with the freedom and finish which, in rendering the compositions of Schumann, are their very life blood, was a rare and unexpected delight. It was as if the orchestra was drinking deep draughts of fresh air into its lungs, and pouring out its soul with the inspired freedom of a great singer. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as a genius would play upon his chosen instrument."

Bernhard Listeman considers Mr. Nikisch superior in all essential points to his two predecessors. He says that his interpretation of the work, so far as heard, is poetical and refined, though his special gift seems to be to bring out to the utmost the melodious expressions of the different works. In his methods he seems to be somewhat a follower of Wagner. His tempi are of a highly flexible nature, a thing that will be admired by many and probably opposed by some others.

Oct 16 89

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL.

Mr. Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held his first rehearsal last week, and is reported to have been very much pleased with the organization. "Technically," he told a Boston Post reporter, "they are magnificent, and what struck me especially was the great intelligence with which they played and the rapidity with which they understood all my intentions." The orchestra is likewise reported to have reciprocated fully the pleasant feeling. The first concert will be given next Saturday evening; and the programme is this: Overture to Coriolanus, Beethoven; ballet music to Rosamunde, Schubert; symphony in D minor, Schumann, and Meistersinger Vorspiel, Wagner. This is conservative as well as chronological; but Mr. Nikisch undoubtedly does well to include in his first programme works with which orchestra and public are all quite familiar.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The series of four concerts announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Wednesday evenings, Oct. 23, Nov. 20, Jan. 29, and Feb. 26, at 8 o'clock. It is as yet too early to announce programmes or soloists, but something of exceptional interest in the way of both may be expected. The new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, begins his work in Boston under the very best auspices, and his skill in programme-making is as great as his distinction as an orchestral conductor. As for soloists, the public has found that only first-class performers are engaged for the Symphony orchestra, whose work may be on a level with the unsurpassed playing of that organization. The subscription list for the season will be opened at Steinert's immediately, and subscribers will have the choice of seats before the sale for single concerts is opened.

Oct 18

ADVERTISER.

THE SYMPHONY.

Programme for this Afternoon and Tomorrow Evening.

The programme of this afternoon and tomorrow night, although very interesting, is not new to Boston, and requires no analysis. The Brahms Variations are splendid specimens of contrapuntal and orchestral skill. The theme by Haydn—Chorale St. Antoni—is lofty and well suited to treatment. Brahms uses the contrabassoon at the very beginning, in excellent style, with a pizzicato of contrabasses. The woodwind will have some excellent opportunities to display itself, particularly the bassoons and oboes. The eighth variation gives some charming passages on the muted strings, and in the latter portions of the work piccolo and triangle are added to the score. The Fingal's Cave overture by Mendelssohn is the most spontaneous of all his works; in fact, when he went to the Isle of Staffa he was so inspired by the surroundings that he at once turned them into music, and sent 20 measures of orchestral score, written on the spot, to his sister Fanny. These contain that flashing, characteristic wave figure which is the charm of the whole overture, and is ever present in it.

Mr. Hekking displays himself in all schools of 'cello playing, the short pieces giving him an opportunity to sentimentalize in Schumann's Traümerei, and to display pyrotechnics in Popper's "Papillons." The Beethoven 7th symphony is the most romantic of the entire nine, and will afford the new conductor a chance to give full vent to his poetic instincts. The second movement (the allegretto) is the gem of the work, and in fact, one of the finest movements ever composed by Beethoven.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[5]

TRAVELLER,

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The First Symphony Concert of the Ninth Season.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor—An Auspicious Beginning.

Plan of Local Societies for Choral and Chamber Music—Nuggets.

The local musical season which, unless all signs fail, will be the most interesting and varied in years, was auspiciously begun on Saturday evening. The influence of the symphony orchestra grows greater with each year of its existence, dominates, but by no means absorbs all other factors in our musical life. The advent of a new conductor of the orchestra is therefore an epoch-making event. Mr. Arthur Nikisch has been heralded some months. Through the newspapers during this time have filtered bits of personal and professional history of the man, so that when he appeared before the audience in Music Hall he seemed no stranger. In stature Mr. Nikisch is slighter than Mr. Gericke, even a trifle less tall; his manner is earnest and his personality eminently artistic. A hearty greeting from the large audience was his as he came quietly from behind the orchestra to the conductor's stand which was raised two steps above the stage, and contained no desk. The orchestra which Mr. Nikisch faced for the first time in public in Boston consists of sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, eight 'celli, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, one contra bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, two trombones, one tuba, one tymphani, one harp. Its personnel has suffered some changes since last season, the important ones being the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Fritz Giese as principal violoncellist, the engagement of a new first clarinet—whom Mr. Nikisch secured abroad. The string band welcomes two new 'celli players of repute, Mr. Adamowski's brother and Mr. Schmidt.

The first programme of the season was:

Wagner, Intruduction.....“Die Meistersinger”
Beethoven, Overture.....“Coriolanus”
Schubert, Entr'acte.....“Rosamunde”
Schumann.....Symphony, in D minor, No. 4

When Liszt was preparing “Lohengrin” for its initial performance he wrote to Wagner asking him to indicate explicitly the tempi of certain movements; Wagner replied that he considered it quite unnecessary as he could implicitly rely on Liszt's artistic sympathy to find out the right thing everywhere. The impression the writer has of Mr. Nikisch's first concert is that the new conductor is a musician of marked individuality, who leaves a strong personal imprint upon whatever he touches. How far he respects tradition in his reading of the classics it is too early to say. That the man is broad enough mentally for the public to trust in his “artistic sympathies” there is not the shadow of a doubt. That the public will be interested in and benefited by this new prophet is certain. The dramatic spirit which permeates modern music, which, with irresistible force, spread out over the world when Wagner gained a footing in it, is synonymous with the intellect seeking the highest things. Wagner re-created the opera and made it a thing of sense and reason, where before it was, almost without exception, a literary calumny, having a sweet accompaniment of music. By his union of the drama and music, he illumined and strengthened an art. It is no wonder, then, that all the more advanced thinkers in music of the present day treat all that comes under their notice in the Wagner spirit of investigation, of dissection, and then to interpret it with every faculty of mind and will directed to give it meaning. This is Mr. Nikisch's attitude towards the “Coriolanus” overture; he makes theory subservient to convey his idea of what Beethoven meant, consequently we had on Saturday a fresh, new and powerful reading of a time-honored work. It was splendid in its effect. Mr. Nikisch, with his inspiriting touch went to the heart of the story as he knew it. So in the Schumann symphony, the conductor's personality shone at every page his reading was so broad and intelligible, that he made the work glow and at the same time made immediate converts for Schumann. He allowed the brasses liberty after five years of repression he has added 50 per cent to the sonority of the orchestra.

The “Die Meistersinger” overture was read more elastically yet generally a degree faster than Richter takest it. It was a magnificent performance. Mr. Nikisch's command of the tempo rubato, which he uses with discretion, is perfect. The lovely second entr'acte from “Rosamonde” was charmingly played, the new clarionet proving himself an artist.

The evening was full of surprises occasioned by the impassioned readings and splendid playing, the most novel feature of which is Mr. Nikisch's conducting without notes. It was perfect memorizing, and proves the new conductor to be possessed of a resource which few of his contemporaries anywhere have. A conductor thus equipped can devote his whole attention to the interpretation, and, of course, gains immeasurably in freedom, but the ability to continue such a practice through twenty-four concerts is little short of phenominal; does Mr. Nikisch possess it? It sufficeth for the present to indicate the general trend of the new conductor without going into particulars. He is an enthusiast, musical to the finger tips, and above all, behind his rigid beat, which in the height of some swelling climax becomes a sweep of hand and arm, there is a susceptibility to the emotional power of the work in hand, which he unconsciously imparts to his players. The whole band feels it, the playing is vitalized. It is owing to the splendid technique of the orchestra, the legacy of Mr. Gericke's five years of incessant drill, that a conductor like Mr. Nikisch can accomplish really great things. He is not a miniature painter, but one who employs a large canvas with noble results. To find the orchestra so obedient to a new master after less than two weeks' acquaintance, is cause for congratulation; that the playing of the band as a whole should be so intrinsically fine so soon after the long vacation, speaks volumes for its past training. Mr. Nikisch has no reason to be dissatisfied with his treatment by the audience of Saturday evening; expectation and intense interest were visible on every hand, and the great applause which greeted the performance of the “Meistersinger” overture, repeated many times during the concert, attested the pleasure, and, shall we say, relief, which his hearers felt in realizing that the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was worthy the high positon to which he had been called.

In the audience of Saturday night were three visiting critics from New York—Mr. Krehbiel of the Tribune, Mr. Finck of the Evening Post, and Mr. Stevenson of the Times. The next programme, which will introduce the new violoncellist, Mr. Hekking, as soloist, is: Brahms, Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, Op. 56; Goltermann, Andante and Finale, from Concerto for 'Cello, in A minor (first time at these concerts); Mendelssohn, Overture, “Fingal's Cave;” Soli for Violoncello; Bach, Air; Schumann, Traumerei; Popper, Papillon; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, in A.

Oct 14 89

DAILY TRIBUNE.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

HERR NIKISCH AND HIS STYLE.

[FROM A STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE TRIBUNE.]

Boston, Oct. 13.—Herr Arthur Nikisch, whom the public-spirited generosity of Mr. Higginson has transplanted from the conservative and tradition-laden atmosphere of Leipsic to Boston, has had the fact impressed upon him that orchestral conductors have become “stars” performers. Boston's welcome to him socially was of the most cordial kind, its recognition of his ability as an artist last night, at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra under his baton, prompt and marvellously enthusiastic as a preliminary dispatch has already related. If the scenes at the Music Hall can be viewed as a criterion for the estimation of the gentleness of the city's taste in music, the genuineness of her appreciation, the thoroughness of her understanding and earnestness of her devotion, then it must be said of Herr Nikisch that his lines have fallen in pleasant places, and of the city that she is blessed beyond measure in the disposition of her people toward an art which makes for the civic virtues in a degree scarcely equalled by any other agent of civilization.

It was a delight to witness an assemblage that crowded the Music Hall, gathered together to hear a concert of high-class orchestral music, without a single adventitious feature designed to pander to immature or false taste. It was again a delight to observe how in the presence of a Symphony Orchestra's concert there were no signs of the petty divisions into cliques and followings which seem inseparable from great musical activity (as if the art of harmony was more than anything else a breeder of discord and dissension), and to be able to study by a scanning of faces the wealth of the city in musicians of earnestness, devotion and ability, of composers whose promises have put on the tender leaves of hope, and others who already bear their blushing honors thick upon them; to see the venerable Dwight still standing on the watch tower, though he no longer loudly proclaims the good and warns against the evil; to look upon the genial countenance of Paine, the militant figure of Zerrahn, see Lang and Whitney and Listemann and Whiting and Osgood, and a score more of choice and master spirits, and feel that they are one in appreciative support of Mr. Higginson's organization. All these things are lovely and offer encouragement to those who believe that the spirit of utilitarianism has not yet stamped out the love for things of gentle ministration and will not be able to stifle it for a long time to come if ever. They also strengthen a determination not to speculate upon what may be the other side of the picture, the dissonances that may be hidden, the pretence of appreciation and love which is only pretence, the enthusiasm which is counterfeited, the devotion to Dame Fashion, which is cloaked under an apparent devotion to Apollo. Boston doubtless has her share of these things, yet she is to be envied by the lovers of the orchestral classics for the three-fold possession of Higginson, Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch ought to be a useful stimulus to music criticism in Boston. He is the kind of a conductor who gives people who can think something to think about. He troubles the musical waters with his baton and will not have them stagnate. He belongs to the younger set of conductors who are putting an end to the old music-box style of performance. He is an interpreter, expounder, commentator; but he lets the instruments inspired by the men executing his will make the publication. He invites a fortissimo by a wave of his wand, but he does not act the fortissimo for the edification of the audience. He uses no music, but he makes no parade of the fact. His gestures are incisive and full of nervous energy, but not sweeping. He keeps his eyes and features for the musicians and, so far as possible, also his right hand and arm. His left hand is seldom used; he keeps it out of sight by hanging it to the pocket of his waistcoat by its thumb, and when he calls it into action it is only for a moment to hold a wing of his forces in check. He does not obtrude his signs of expression upon the public, though he uses them freely; his men know his intentions before they come before the people. He directs his men, controls and sways them; they are his agents of expression, the vehicles of his emotional proclamation. They follow him boldly in the wildest charge, for he neglects no cue. He is a leader whom it is safe to follow.

He is safe for the musicians because of his command of the mechanics of conducting. He is safe for the public, because, so far as can be judged by last night's music, though he is what we would call a romantic conductor, he neglects none of the canons of good taste, violates no law of beauty. He has no reverence for tradition, or it would perhaps be better to say, makes no bugbear of it, but he does not love lawlessness for its own sake. To get at the heart of the composition, its warm, throbbing, feeling heart, is his first aim, and his next is to let the public feel its pulsations. If conventional methods or traditional notions stand in the way of his purpose, he brushes them aside. He makes use of the utmost freedom in the matter of time changes, yet adheres in a general way to a normal unit of measure which, last night, was in every case entirely sane and in accordance with what must be looked upon as the composer's wishes. In this respect his interpretation of the prelude to “Die Meistersinger” was the most beautiful that I have ever been privileged to hear. The abrupt changes of time, especially between the first and the middle part (when the wood-winds play the principal subject in a humorous staccato), which was heard here last spring, are entirely lacking. Herr Nikisch follows the composer's explicit directions, and departs as little and seldom as possible from the chief time of the composition. He brings out the first melody and the Mastersingers' march in a broad style, solid and four-cornered, as beseems the representative melodies of Nuremberg's burgherdom. Even in the satirical middle part this solidity is not put off, but is used to intensify the effect of the unyielding pedantry of the singers' guild, but singing under and against it with a splendid stress of passionate utterance comes the melody in the strings which tells of the young knight's love and the young poet's protest against the formularies which are relied on to put him down. What is obviously the composer's intention is attained, not by a dislocation of the time, but by eloquence of expression. All of the details of Herr Nikisch's readings cannot be discussed here, but another deserves to be mentioned. Something analogous to the requirements of good composition, as stated by old Galuppi to Dr. Burney, “Beauty, clearness and good modulation,” seem to be the things which are uppermost in Herr Nikisch's mind: but they are so, not for their own sake, but because truthful and potent expression is impossible without them. A means to their attainment, Herr Nikisch seems to think, is deliberation. He never permits himself to fall into undue haste; he never obscures a figure or phrase, be it melodic or rhythmic, in order to reach a preconceived idea as to its proper tempo. The musical idea must impress itself firmly on the mind of the listener. The dramatic development brought to a climax, by augmentation of force or speed, comes soon enough and all the more powerfully because it is not precipitated. Meanwhile, by nice adjustment of parts, the voices of the composition are made to stand out brightly and self-reliantly. The prelude to “Die Meistersinger” with all its recondite convolutions and polyphonal intricacies was presented as a marvel of lucidity, yet so carefully was the intrinsic character of each of its constituent melodies preserved that it glowed with warmth and feeling. Another moment of wonderful eloquence occurred in the overture to “Coriolan,” where in the coda the repetition of the figure which proclaimed the old Roman's proud obstinacy in the early part of the tonal poem was turned by the violoncello into a heartbreaking lamentation over departed puissance and pride.

The temptation to discuss the question of the value of what is called tradition in musical interpretation is strong, but the exigencies of time and space will not permit. New-Yorkers may look forward with high expectancy to the visit of the Boston Orchestra to their city this winter.

H. E. K.

Oct 13

TRIBUNE, SUNDAY,

MR. NIKISCH'S AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR'S TRIUMPH AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston, Oct. 12 (Special).—A far more interesting and promising circumstance in connection with the ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than the much-talked-of popular excitement at the ticket sale a few weeks ago was the artistic success which crowned the first concert in the Music Hall this evening. The new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch won his way to the admiring regards of the public with a single effort. But it was not an effort of the ordinary kind. The concert would under any circumstances have to be set down as an extraordinary event. As the result of a conductor's first studies with a strange band it was nothing short of wonderful and an augury of the brightest kind for the concerts that are to follow. Boston is to be envied the possession of such an orchestra; and doubly the possession of such a conductor. Mr. Nikisch conducts without music or even a music stand. He stands high above the level of his forces and controls them by crisp and nervous gestures, not at all demonstrative, in the face of the audience. His figure is slender, almost boyish, his face delicately chiselled; but neither the play of his features nor of his hands and arms are for the public. His business is wholly with the music in hand and his knowledge of the matter of the score and sympathetic appreciation of its spirit seems absolute. He acknowledges applause with a modest bow, and to-night, though entirely self-possessed, he seemed to be astonished at his personal triumph.

Flowers covered his rostrum when he came upon the stage to conduct his first number, the prelude to “Die Meistersinger.” An immense audience applauded him enthusiastically for several minutes before he began and after he had finished the prelude; but if th first applause was a gracious welcome to the man, that which followed him through the evening was a merited tribute to the artist. It needed not that the musicians should rise to their feet and join in the applause at the close of the concert to prove how hearty is the relationship, how perfect the understanding that has already been established between the new conductor and his men. The programme comprised the prelude to “Die Meistersinger,” Beethoven's overture to “Coriolan,” the entr'acte from Schubert's “Rosamunde” music, and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

Oct 19

BEACON:

It is a good plan for interviewers to know something of the matters which they are sent to inquire about from the interviewed. Here is the Sunday's Herald's reporter representing Mr. Nikich as talking about the overture to Wagner's “Minnesingers!”

~~~ Mr. Nikisch is declared to have a more sympathetic face than Mr. Gericke. “The king is dead. Long live the king!”

Oct 19

BEACON:

THE SYMPHONIES.

The early hour at which we go to press again precludes a full notice of the Symphony rehearsal. This we regret, as we should have been glad to hint to our readers what they have to anticipate in tonight's reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony. Some criticism there was after the first concert because of the liberty Mr. Nikisch allowed himself in the Schumann symphony and in the “Coriolanus” overture, which some thought ought to have been given in a more formal fashion, and the connoisseurs have therefore been on the qui vive to know whether the symphony of tonight would be treated with like independence and novelty. The programme aroused a double interest. Besides the Beethoven symphony, it includes music from other authors than those chosen last week, the selections being the orchestral variations by Brahms on a theme from Haydn, a concerto for 'cello by Goltermann—new in these concerts, although Mr. Wulf Fries played portions of it in a Listemann club concert last season—and Mendelssohn's “Fingal's Cave” overture, followed by an air of Bach, Schumann's “Traumerei” and Popper's “Papillons” (these three for 'cello), the conclusion being the symphony. This bold and odd arrangement was the first attraction, and the other was the début as first 'cellist of Mr. Anton Hekking, who played last winter with the Mendelssohn Quintette and now succeeds Mr. Giese. This player is an artist of great value and is already appreciated as such by the public. His tone is full, smooth and equal, and his method is brilliant, broad or simply sweet, as the occasion requires; in intricate passages he preserves both clear execution and exact intonation; and his feeling as well as his technique indicates that he will prove a master in a very wide range of music, and probably be accepted as the best 'cellist heard here since the visit of Herr Fischer some years ago. Mr. Nikisch quite equalled his last week's work; he gave to the countless colorings of the Brahms variations their individuality, yet preserved beneath them all the touch befitting the thought of Haydn, and rendered to the overture its sentiment, its poetry and its moments of splendor. In the accompaniments to the solo numbers—for which he used the scores—he was considerate and immediate in support, and so set off the leading lines of thought to perfection. The programme for this night week is striking, but promises delight in its selections; it is: Beethoven's “Egmont” overture and fifth piano-forte concerto (Mr. Baermann), Schubert's “unfinished” symphony and Mendelssohn's “Italian” symphony; there is no cut-and-dried formalism about that arrangement!

Traveller

BRISK BIDDING.

Auction Sale of Symphony Rehearsal Seats Today.

Hotel Ticket Agents and Brokers Take Everything.

A Fair Range of Prices—Incidents of the Sale.

The auction sale of the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall during the season of 1889-90 began at 10 o'clock this morning, when Mr. Jackson, the auctioneer, walked to the front of the Music Hall platform and standing before the big numbered diagram, in front of which his assistant was mounted on a step ladder, and, after briefly stating that the bids were to be for premiums paid over the regular price of the $12 seats sold in regular order, and other terms of the sale, began to ask for bids on the seat marked No. 1, in Row A. A fair sized audience, of say about 1000, had assembled in the hall, and perhaps one third were ladies. A few well-known society people were present, but, most were represented by others. Thayer of Parker's, Connolley of the Adams House, Hendrick of State street, Herrick of the Vendome, Charles M. Cashin of Young's Hotel, George W. Stewart, manager of the Germania Band, and George F. Wadworth, clerk with Lee, Higginson & Co., were among the better known of the ticket brokers present, and, as it afterward proved, they secured the most of the best seats.

Among the others noticed were Prof. Royce, Rev. Joshua P. Bodfish of Canton, Mr. Samuel Johnson of C. J. Hovey & Co., Congressman Walker's son of Worcester, and Mr. Benjamin Kimball.

The sale opened with a bid of 50 cents on seat No. 1, in row A, which was soon advanced to $5, at which figure it was knocked down. The next four went to Connolly at $5 premium for each. The next figure was $5.50 and on the other side No. 28 went for $8.50 and others at $7.

The seats in B row started at $10 and ran up to $15. Bids then began to go higher, and in row C two were sold at $32 each. In D, Connolly got some more at $24, $28, $29, $36, and others went at $29 and $37. In E, Thayer started at $30.50 and took some of the last at $39, prices ranging between those two figures. It was about the same with the seats in F, though M. G. E. Stewart made things interesting by running up Nos. 19 and 20 to $69 each, at which price they were knocked down to him.

The ticket brokers had bought almost everything up to this time and continued to get most of those in G and H, at prices ranging from $35 to $60, Herrick and Kendrick coming in several times. When I was reached some rather brisky bidding began, bids starting at $25 and rapidly running up to $40 or thereabouts. Mr. Stewart again occasioned a flutter of “ohs” by bidding in two at $94 each, and G. E. Wadworth took four at $95, seats on either side selling at $39 and $40 to Connolly. Two at $61 and others at $40 followed.

Prices then hardly held up to previous offers, though some high bids were made by those who desired to secure their last year's seats.
~~~

[5] Oct 14 89

TRAVELLER.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The First Symphony Concert of the Ninth Season.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor—An Auspicious Beginning.

Plan of Local Societies for Choral and Chamber Music—Nuggets.

The local musical season which, unless all signs fail, will be the most interesting and varied in years, was auspiciously begun on Saturday evening. The influence of the symphony orchestra grows greater with each year of its existence, dominates, but by no means absorbs all other factors in our musical life. The advent of a new conductor of the orchestra is therefore an epoch-making event. Mr. Arthur Nikisch has been heralded some months. Through the newspapers during this time have filtered bits of personal and professional history of the man, so that when he appeared before the audience in Music Hall he seemed no stranger. In stature Mr. Nikisch is slighter than Mr. Gericke, even a trifle less tall; his manner is earnest and his personality eminently artistic. A hearty greeting from the large audience was his as he came quietly from behind the orchestra to the conductor's stand which was raised two steps above the stage, and contained no desk. The orchestra which Mr. Nikisch faced for the first time in public in Boston consists of sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, eight 'celli, eight basses, two flutes, one piccolo, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets, one bass clarinet, two bassoons, one contra bassoon, four horns, two trumpets, two trombones, one tuba, one tymphani, one harp. Its personnel has suffered some changes since last season, the important ones being the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Fritz Giese as principal violoncellist, the engagement of a new first clarinet—whom Mr. Nikisch secured abroad. The string band welcomes two new 'celli players of repute, Mr. Adamowski's brother and Mr. Schmidt. The first programme of the season was:

Wagner, Intruduction.....“Die Meistersinger”
Beethoven, Overture.....“Coriolanus”
Schubert, Entr'acte.....“Rosamunde”
Schumann.....Symphony, in D minor, No. 4

When Liszt was preparing “Lohengrin” for its initial performance he wrote to Wagner asking him to indicate explicitly the tempi of certain movements; Wagner replied that he considered it quite unnecessary as he could implicitly rely on Liszt's artistic sympathy to find out the right thing everywhere. The impression the writer has of Mr. Nikisch's first concert is that the new conductor is a musician of marked individuality, who leaves a strong personal imprint upon whatever he touches. How far he respects tradition in his reading of the classics it is too early to say. That the man is broad enough mentally for the public to trust in his “artistic sympathies” there is not the shadow of a doubt. That the public will be interested in and benefited by this new prophet is certain. The dramatic spirit which permeates modern music, which, with irresistible force, spread out over the world when Wagner gained a footing in it, is synonymous with the intellect seeking the highest things. Wagner re-created the opera and made it a thing of sense and reason, where before it was, almost without exception, a literary calumny, having a sweet accompaniment of music. By his union of the drama and music, he illumined and strengthened an art. It is no wonder, then, that all the more cultured thinkers in music of the present day seek to treat all that comes under their notice in the Wagner spirit of investigation, of discrimination, and then to interpret it with every faculty of mind and will directed to give it meaning. This is Mr. Nikisch's attitude towards the “Coriolanus” overture: he makes theory subservient to convey his idea of what Beethoven meant, and consequently we had on Saturday evening a new and powerful reading of a time-honored work. It was splendid in its effect. Mr. Nikisch, with his inspiriting touch went to the heart of the story as he knew it. So in the Schumann symphony, the conductor's personality shone at every page his reading was so broad and intelligible, that he made the work glow and at the same time gave immediate converts for Schumann. Without giving the brasses liberty after five years of possession he has added 50 per cent to the sonority of the orchestra.

The “Die Meistersinger” overture was read very elastically yet generally a degree faster than Richter takest it. It was a magnificent performance. Mr. Nikisch's command of the tempo rubato, which he uses with discretion, is perfect. The lovely second entr'acte from “Rosamonde” was charmingly played, the new clarionet proving himself an artist.

The evening was full of surprises occasioned by the impassioned readings and beautiful playing, the most novel feature of which was Mr. Nikisch's conducting without notes. It was perfect memorizing, and proves the new conductor to be possessed of a retentive which few of his contemporaries anywhere have. A conductor thus equipped can devote his whole attention to the interpretation, and, of course, gains immeasurably in freedom, but the ability to continue such a practice through twenty-four concerts is little short of phenominal; does Mr. Nikisch possess it? It sufficeth for the present to indicate the general trend of the new conductor without going into particulars. He is an enthusiast, musical to the finger tips, and above all, behind his rigid beat, which in the height of some swelling climax becomes a sweep of hand and arm, there is a susceptibility to the emotional power of the work in hand, which he unconsciously imparts to his players. The whole band feels it, the playing is vitalized. It is owing to the splendid technique of the orchestra, the legacy of Mr. Gericke's five years of incessant drill, that a conductor like Mr. Nikisch can accomplish really great things. He is not a miniature painter, but one who employs a large canvas with noble results. To find the orchestra so obedient to a new master after less than two weeks' acquaintance, is cause for congratulation; that the playing of the band as a whole should be so intrinsically fine so soon after the long vacation, speaks volumes for its past training. Mr. Nikisch has no reason to be dissatisfied with his treatment by the audience of Saturday evening; expectation and intense interest were visible on every hand, and the great applause which greeted the performance of the “Meistersinger” overture, repeated many times during the concert, attested the pleasure, and, shall we say, relief, which his hearers felt in realizing that the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was worthy the high positon to which he had been called.

In the audience of Saturday night were three visiting critics from New York—Mr. Krehbiil of the Tribune, Mr. Finck of the Evening Post, and Mr. Stevenson of the Times. The next programme, which will introduce the new violoncellist, Mr. Hekking, as soloist, is: Brahms, Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, Op. 56; Goltermann, Andante and Finale, from Concerto for 'Cello, in A minor (first time at these concerts); Mendelssohn, Overture, “Fingal's Cave;” Soli for Violoncello; Bach, Air; Schumann, Traumerei; Popper, Papillon; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, in A.

Oct 14 89

DAILY TRIBUNE.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR.

HERR NIKISCH AND HIS STYLE.

[FROM A STAFF CORRESPONDENT OF THE TRIBUNE.]

Boston, Oct. 13.—Herr Arthur Nikisch, whom the public-spirited generosity of Mr. Higginson has transplanted from the conservative and tradition-laden atmosphere of Leipsic to Boston, has had the fact impressed upon him that orchestral conductors have become “star” performers. Boston's welcome to him socially was of the most cordial kind, its recognition of his ability as an artist last night, at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra under his baton, prompt and marvellously enthusiastic as a preliminary dispatch has already related. If the scenes at the Music Hall can be viewed as a criterion for the estimation of the gentleness of the city's taste in music, the genuineness of her appreciation, the thoroughness of her understanding and earnestness of her devotion, then it must be said of Herr Nikisch that his lines have fallen in pleasant places, and of the city that she is blessed beyond measure in the disposition of her people toward an art which makes for the civic virtues in a degree scarcely equalled by any other agent of civilization.

It was a delight to witness an assemblage that crowded the Music Hall, gathered together to hear a concert of high-class orchestral music, without a single adventitious feature designed to pander to immature or false taste. It was again a delight to observe how in the presence of a Symphony Orchestra's concert there were no signs of the petty divisions into cliques and followings which seem inseparable from great musical activity (as if the art of harmony was more than anything else a breeder of discord and dissension), and to be able to study by a scanning of faces the wealth of the city in musicians of earnestness, devotion and ability, of composers whose promises have put on the tender leaves of hope, and others who already bear their blushing honors thick upon them; to see the venerable Dwight still standing on the watch tower, though he no longer loudly proclaims the good and warns against the evil; to look upon the genial countenance of Paine, the militant figure of Zerrahn, see Lang and Whitney and Listemann and Whiting and Osgood, and a score more of choice and master spirits, and feel that they are one in appreciative support of Mr. Higginson's organization. All these things are lovely and offer encouragement to those who believe that the spirit of utilitarianism has not yet stamped out the love for things of gentle ministration and will not be able to stifle it for a long time to come if ever. They also strengthen a determination not to speculate upon what may be the other side of the picture, the dissonances that may be hidden, the pretence of appreciation and love which is only pretence, the enthusiasm which is counterfeited, the devotion to Dame Fashion, which is cloaked under an apparent devotion to Apollo. Boston doubtless has her share of these things, yet she is to be envied by the lovers of the orchestral classics for the three-fold possession of Higginson, Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch ought to be a useful stimulus to music criticism in Boston. He is the kind of a conductor who gives people who can think something to think about. He troubles the musical waters with his baton and will not have them stagnate. He belongs to the younger set of conductors who are putting an end to the old music-box style of performance. He is an interpreter, expounder, commentator; but he lets the instruments inspired by the men executing his will make the publication. He invites a fortissimo by a wave of his wand, but he does not act the fortissimo for the edification of the audience. He uses no music, but he makes no parade of the fact. His gestures are incisive and full of nervous energy, but not sweeping. He keeps his eyes and features for the musicians and, so far as possible, also his right hand and arm. His left hand is seldom used; he keeps it out of sight by hanging it to the pocket of his waistcoat by its thumb, and when he calls it into action it is only for a moment to hold a wing of his forces in check. He does not obtrude his signs of expression upon the public, though he uses them freely; his men know his intentions before they come before the people. He directs his men, controls and sways them; they are his agents of expression, the vehicles of his emotional proclamation. They follow him boldly in the wildest charge, for he neglects no cue. He is a leader whom it is safe to follow. He is safe for the musicians because of his command of the mechanics of conducting. He is safe for the public, because, so far as can be judged by last night's music, though he is what we would call a romantic conductor, he neglects none of the canons of good taste, violates no law of beauty. He has no reverence for tradition, or it would perhaps be better to say, makes no bugbear of it, but he does not love lawlessness for its own sake. To get at the heart of the composition, its warm, throbbing, feeling heart, is his first aim, and his next is to let the public feel its pulsations. If conventional methods or traditional notions stand in the way of his purpose, he brushes them aside. He makes use of the utmost freedom in the matter of time changes, yet adheres in a general way to a normal unit of measure which, last night, was in every case entirely sane and in accordance with what must be looked upon as the composer's wishes. In this respect his interpretation of the prelude to “Die Meistersinger” was the most beautiful that I have ever been privileged to hear. The abrupt changes of time, especially between the first and the middle part (when the wood-winds play the principal subject in a humorous staccato), which was heard here last spring, are entirely lacking. Herr Nikisch follows the composer's explicit directions, and departs as little and seldom as possible from the chief time of the composition. He brings out the first melody and the Mastersingers' march in a broad style, solid and four-cornered, as becomes the representative melodies of Nuremberg's burgherdom. Even in the satirical middle part this solidity is not put off, but is used to intensify the effect of the unyielding pedantry of the singers' guild, but singing under and against it with a splendid stress of passionate utterance comes the melody in the strings which tells of the young knight's love and the young poet's protest against the formularies which are relied on to put him down. What is obviously the composer's intention is attained, not by a dislocation of the time, but by eloquence of expression. All of the details of Herr Nikisch's readings cannot be discussed here, but another deserves to be mentioned. Something analogous to the requirements of good composition, as stated by old Galuppi to Dr. Burney, “Beauty, clearness and good modulation,” seem to be the things which are uppermost in Herr Nikisch's mind: but they are so, not for their own sake, but because truthful and potent expression is impossible without them. A means to their attainment, Herr Nikisch seems to think, is deliberation. He never permits himself to fall into undue haste; he never obscures a figure or phrase, be it melodic or rhythmic, in order to reach a preconceived idea as to its proper tempo. The musical idea must impress itself firmly on the mind of the listener. The dramatic development brought to a climax, by augmentation of force or speed, comes soon enough and all the more powerfully because it is not precipitated. Meanwhile, by nice adjustment of parts, the voices of the composition are made to stand out brightly and self-reliantly. The prelude to “Die Meistersinger” with all its recondite convolutions and polyphonal intricacies was presented as a marvel of lucidity, yet so carefully was the intrinsic character of each of its constituent melodies preserved that it glowed with warmth and feeling. Another moment of wonderful eloquence occurred in the overture to “Coriolan,” where in the coda the repetition of the figure which proclaimed the old Roman's proud obstinacy in the early part of the tonal poem was turned by the violoncello into a heartbreaking lamentation over departed puissance and pride.

The temptation to discuss the question of the value of what is called tradition in musical interpretation is strong, but the exigencies of time and space will not permit. New-Yorkers may look forward with high expectancy to the visit of the Boston Orchestra to their city this winter.

H. E. K.

Oct 13

TRIBUNE, SUNDAY,

MR. NIKISCH'S AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR'S TRIUMPH AT THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston, Oct. 12 (Special).—A far more interesting and promising circumstance in connection with the ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than the much-talked-of popular excitement at the ticket sale a few weeks ago was the artistic success which crowned the first concert in the Music Hall this evening. The new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch won his way to the admiring regards of the public with a single effort. But it was not an effort of the ordinary kind. The concert would under any circumstances have to be set down as an extraordinary event. As the result of a conductor's first studies with a strange band it was nothing short of wonderful and an augury of the brightest kind for the concerts that are to follow. Boston is to be envied the possession of such an orchestra; and doubly the possession of such a conductor. Mr. Nikisch conducts without music or even a music stand. He stands high above the level of his forces and controls them by crisp and nervous gestures, not at all demonstrative, in the face of the audience. His figure is slender, almost boyish, his face delicately chiselled; but neither the play of his features nor of his hands and arms are for the public. His business is wholly with the music in hand and his knowledge of the matter of the score and sympathetic appreciation of its spirit seems absolute. He acknowledges applause with a modest bow, and to-night, though entirely self-possessed, he seemed to be astonished at his personal triumph.

Flowers covered his rostrum when he came upon the stage to conduct his first number, the prelude to “Die Meistersinger.” An immense audience applauded him enthusiastically for several minutes before he began and after he had finished the prelude; but if th first applause was a gracious welcome to the man, that which followed him through the evening was a merited tribute to the artist. It needed not that the musicians should rise to their feet and join in the applause at the close of the concert to prove how hearty is the relationship, how perfect the understanding that has already been established between the new conductor and his men. The programme comprised the prelude to “Die Meistersinger,” Beethoven's overture to “Coriolan,” the entr'acte from Schubert's “Rosamunde” music, and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

Oct 19

BEACON:

It is a good plan for interviewers to know something of the matters which they are sent to inquire about from the interviewed. Here is the Sunday's Herald's reporter representing Mr. Nikich as talking about the overture to Wagner's “Minnesingers!”

Mr. Nikisch is declared to have a more sympathetic face than Mr. Gericke. “The king is dead. Long live the king!”

Oct 19

BEACON:

THE SYMPHONIES.

The early hour at which we go to press again precludes a full notice of the Symphony rehearsal. This we regret, as we should have been glad to hint to our readers what they have to anticipate in tonight's reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony. Some criticism there was after the first concert because of the liberty Mr. Nikisch allowed himself in the Schumann symphony and in the “Coriolanus” overture, which some thought ought to have been given in a more formal fashion, and the connoisseurs have therefore been on the qui vive to know whether the symphony of tonight would be treated with like independence and novelty. The programme aroused a double interest. Besides the Beethoven symphony, it includes music from other authors than those chosen last week, the selections being the orchestral variations by Brahms on a theme from Haydn, a concerto for 'cello by Goltermann—new in these concerts, although Mr. Wulf Fries played portions of it in a Listemann club concert last season—and Mendelssohn's “Fingal's Cave” overture, followed by an air of Bach, Schumann's “Traumerei” and Popper's “Papillons” (these three for 'cello), the conclusion being the symphony. This bold and odd arrangement was the first attraction, and the other was the début as first 'cellist of Mr. Anton Hekking, who played last winter with the Mendelssohn Quintette and now succeeds Mr. Giese. This player is an artist of great value and is already appreciated as such by the public. His tone is full, smooth and equal, and his method is brilliant, broad or simply sweet, as the occasion requires; in intricate passages he preserves both clear execution and exact intonation; and his feeling as well as his technique indicates that he will prove a master in a very wide range of music, and probably be accepted as the best 'cellist heard here since the visit of Herr Fischer some years ago. Mr. Nikisch quite equalled his last week's work; he gave to the countless colorings of the Brahms variations their individuality, yet preserved beneath them all the touch befitting the thought of Haydn, and rendered to the overture its sentiment, its poetry and its moments of splendor. In the accompaniments to the solo numbers—for which he used the scores—he was considerate and immediate in support, and so set off the leading lines of thought to perfection. The programme for this night week is striking, but promises delight in its selections; it is: Beethoven's “Egmont” overture and fifth piano-forte concerto (Mr. Baermann), Schubert's “unfinished” symphony and Mendelssohn's “Italian” symphony; there is no cut-and-dried formalism about that arrangement!

Traveller

BRISK BIDDING.

Auction Sale of Symphony Rehearsal Seats Today.

Hotel Ticket Agents and Brokers Take Everything.

A Fair Range of Prices—Incidents of the Sale.

The auction sale of the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall during the season of 1889-90 began at 10 o'clock this morning, when Mr. Jackson, the auctioneer, walked to the front of the Music Hall platform and standing before the big numbered diagram, in front of which his assistant was mounted on a step ladder, and, after briefly stating that the bids were to be for premiums paid over the regular price of the $12 seats sold in regular order, and other terms of the sale, began to ask for bids on the seat marked No. 1, in Row A. A fair sized audience, of say about 1000, had assembled in the hall, and perhaps one third were ladies. A few well-known society people were present, but, most were represented by others. Thayer of Parker's, Connolley of the Adams House, Hendrick of State street, Herrick of the Vendome, Charles M. Cashin of Young's Hotel, George W. Stewart, manager of the Germania Band, and George F. Wadworth, clerk with Lee, Higginson & Co., were among the better known of the ticket brokers present, and, as it afterward proved, they secured the most of the best seats.

Among the others noticed were Prof. Royce, Rev. Joshua P. Bodfish of Canton, Mr. Samuel Johnson of C. J. Hovey & Co., Congressman Walker's son of Worcester, and Mr. Benjamin Kimball.

The sale opened with a bid of 50 cents on seat No. 1, in row A, which was soon advanced to $5, at which figure it was knocked down. The next four went to Connolly at $5 premium for each. The next figure was $5.50 and on the other side No. 28 went for $8.50 and others at $7.

The seats in B row started at $10 and ran up to $15. Bids then began to go higher, and in row C two were sold at $32 each. In D, Connolly got some more at $24, $28, $29, $36, and others went at $29 and $37. In E, Thayer started at $30.50 and took some of the last at $39, prices ranging between those two figures. It was about the same with the seats in F, though M. G. E. Stewart made things interesting by running up Nos. 19 and 20 to $69 each, at which price they were knocked down to him.

The ticket brokers had bought almost everything up to this time and continued to get most of those in G and H, at prices ranging from $35 to $60, Herrick and Kendrick coming in several times. When I was reached some rather brisky bidding began, bids starting at $25 and rapidly running up to $40 or thereabouts. Mr. Stewart again occasioned a flutter of “ohs” by bidding in two at $94 each, and G. E. Wadworth took four at $95, seats on either side selling at $39 and $40 to Connolly. Two at $61 and others at $40 followed.

Prices then hardly held up to previous offers, though some high bids were made by those who desired to secure their last year's seats.

Oct 20

GLOBE—SUNDAY.

CONCERT EVENTS.

Nikisch Once More Proves Himself the Artist.

New Beauties Evoked by His Baton from Familiar Orchestral Classics.

Baermann This Week—The Star Programme—Preludes and Echoes.

True musicians are born, not made. If this were not so we should have advanced, today no farther than in Scarlatti's time Arthur Nikisch, who represents the most advanced school of conducting, is assuredly one of these born musicians. A second hearing of the work of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under his direction, only confirms and re emphasizes the impression he first made here in Music Hall. It is already abundantly evident that the public may count upon hearing delightful interpretations. New beauties are discovered in old favorites. There is sure to be nothing cut and dried in his programmes at all, whatever the works he may offer to attention.

Wagner has said that a conductor should find his tempo in the character of the music—a rule not to be safely followed by any one not a musician by nature, but which demonstrates its truth always when a man like Nikisch cuts nobly away from tradition. The new leader, though obviously a man of feeling, and consequently one who must feel the excitement inevitable at the performance of a noble piece of music, has a most remarkable control over himself as well as over his musicians, and is never "carried off his feet," as some distinguished directors have been.

Mr. Nikisch conducted yesterday's concert without a score, excepting, of course, in the 'cello concerto. Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, the opening number of the programme, found an interpretation delicious, exquisitely shaded, thoroughly sympathetic. No more familiar great work could have been chosen than Beethoven's seventh symphony. But under Nikisch's baton new charms were revealed in the score. In the opening movement he took the time much slower than any other conductor has done here so far as can be recalled. He restrains rather than urges on the orchestra; producing his effects by the subordination of secondary parts, and the result is that he is able to produce a wonderful singing quality, so to speak, that makes the melody stand out, and presents most vividly the thought in the composer's mind. Such a performance of the seventh symphony as was given yesterday emphasizes the advance in methods that has been gained in these concerts.

When Mr. Henschel opened the first symphony concert year nine seasons ago, he gave as a good many readers may recall, Haydn's twelfth symphony or at any rate, the work so numbered in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition. The tempo was taken at a rate so rapid as to completely disguise the pretty little legato melody with which the allegro begins, and this struck the keynote to his conception of lively movements generally—to push the orchestra up to its capacity for rapidity of tones. Even with Mr. Henschel's successor, wonderful disciplinarian though he was, this ambitious tendency was manifest. Something was gained, undoubtedly, but that Mr. Nikisch will show us how much was lost is evident from his reading of the two widely different symphonies already presented. Nothing which the composer has written is to be slighted or hurried over. He dwells upon every little effect, as if jealous it should escape our attention. In his view the whole aggregation of musicians is but as a solo instrument. Nikisch plays on the orchestra exactly as he would on a pianoforte; and his interpretation, not only of the symphony but the Mendelssohn number, was thoroughly individualized and strikingly effective. Nothing finer, certainly, than the playing of the "Fingal's Cave" overture has been heard since the Boston Symphony orchestra was established. The performance was a revelation in delicate effect—in results that could not be gained had the leader not so artistically adjusted and subordinated the forces at his command. Nikisch's magnetism is very great. His manner is essentially dramatic, and in very large measure the remarkable influence he has thus early gained over his players is due to this fact. With his orchestra and his audiences enthusiastic, it is safe to say that the only people likely to carp at Nikisch will come from ranks to which he does not belong—the ranks of the conservative 'made' musicians.

The soloist yesterday was Mr. Anton Hekking. No slight addition to the effect of the work of this artist of the 'cello was gained by the orchestral accompaniment. It was dainty, delicate, almost ethereal, sinking almost into insignificance for a moment and again gaining strength, but never anything more than a charming subordination to the soloist's work. Mr. Hekking gave the concerto delightfully, and the air from Bach's "Suite," as well as the "Papillon" were performed in a most finished and artistic manner. But the 'cellist swayed his audience most by his playing of Schumann's "Traumerei." It was exquisitely delicate, so light that the audience held its breath lest the faint thread of melody should be lost. It seemed as if the dropping of a pin or the rustling of a bit of paper must have destroyed the spell. No more dainty, sympathetic, heart-appealing interpretation of the "Traumerei" could be imagined. All in all, it was one of the gems of a concert that on Friday afternoon, as well as yesterday evening, won admiration from audiences crowding the hall to overflowing.

The programme for this week is signally attractive. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and he is assigned Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte, in E flat. The orchestra is to open the concert with the noble "Egmont" overture. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor will follow the pianoforte solo, and the closing work is to be the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony.

Anton Hekking, who so successfully appeared as soloist at the symphony concert last evening, is the new 'cellist of the Kneisel quartet. This organization will give six concerts in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 28, Dec. 2, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, Feb. 24 and March 31. The soloists engaged for these concerts are Mrs. Moore Lawson, Miss Rose Stewart, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Ernst Perabo and Arthur Foote. Season tickets will be sold from tribunes at the box office Music Hall, tomorrow (Monday) morning, at 9.

SUNDAY HERALD MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Anton Hekking, Soloist.

Mr. Nikisch as a Programme Maker—The Bostonians' New England Success—The Public School Music Issue—The Hegner Concerts—News, Notes, Comment and Gossip.

The second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last evening, with Mr. Anton Hekking as soloist, and the following selections as a programme:

Brahms..Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, op. 56.
Goltermann.....Concerto for 'cello, in A minor
Mendelssohn.....Overture "Fingal's Cave"

Solo for violoncello.

Bach.....Air
Schumann.....Traumerei
Popper.....Papillon
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A

It is already apparent that the new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, is not a success as a programme maker, and it is to be trusted that his attention will be quickly given to a study of Mr. Henschel's models in this particular during the first two years' concerts of this orchestra. The programmes of Mr. Gericke's regime were not such as Boston audiences desire, and a continuance of his methods in choosing and arranging the selections for these concerts by the new conductor will seriously jeopardize his present popularity with Symphony patrons. The limited experience that Mr. Nikisch has enjoyed as a concert conductor, may make it desirable for him to acquire a familiarity with the standard overtures and symphonic works by their performance under his baton, but his experience in this line will be gained under protest at these concerts. The library of the orchestra is well stocked with enjoyable compositions of the modern school, which have not had a recent hearing, and during the last five years Boston has heard few of the compositions from French and English sources which have been brought forward in Paris and London. The promises given by Mr. Nikisch, if he has been correctly reported, led to a feeling that his programmes would show a broad, liberal spirit toward all schools; but the three that have been announced do not realize the pleasant anticipations that have been indulged in by the patrons of these concerts in recent years. In choosing the Brahms' variations on Haydn's chorale "St. Anthony," Mr. Nikisch had an excellent opportunity to display the virtuosity of his orchestra, and as the new conductor has a just pride in the technical proficiency of his band, it may be pardonable to use such a composition to afford opportunities in this line. Such compositions are little more than orchestral exercises, however, and a few, a very few, of them will suffice for a season. The excellencies of the wood wind department of the band were given great prominence in this number, and the complicated instrumental adornments of the simple hymn were played with faultless skill by the orchestra. Mr. Anton Hekking, the soloist of the evening, is a 'cello player of great ability, and his selection as leader of his division of the band is a most admirable choice. His style has the largeness and breadth demanded for his position in the orchestra, and also the delicacy and technical skill desired for the best solo work. The portions of the Goltermann concerto proved highly interesting novelties, and the melodious theme of the andante was sung with exquisite expression by the instrument under Mr. Hekking's touch. The air by Bach and the familiar "Traumerei" by Schumann served further to show Mr. Hekking's rare gifts in sentimental compositions, and the brilliant "Papillon" by Popper exhibited the player's technical attainments most admirably. Mr. Hekking became an instant favorite with his audience, and gained a well merited recognition of his abilities as a player. The reading of the seventh symphony was certainly original and full of the conductor's individuality, but a closer following of the conventional interpretations would have given better results in certain portions of the work. The romantic characteristics of the first two movements were not brought out with all desired success, and the interpretation of the lovely allegretto was particularly disappointing. However unsatisfactory the beginning, the ending more than made amends, and in the brilliant reading of the finale all that had gone before was forgiven, the splendid work done in this movement disarming all criticism and winning the conductor an enthusiastic commendation from his audience. The Mendelssohn overture made a particularly pleasing number of the programme, the lights and shades were strengthened with admirable taste, and the beauties of the tone coloring greatly enhanced in this way. The programme for the third concert, with Mr. Carl Baermann as soloist, will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Egmont"; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat; Schubert, symphony in B minor (unfinished); Mendelssohn, symphony in A (Italian).

Oct 21

POST.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening to an audience even larger and more enthusiastic than that of last week:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme by Haydn, op. 56
Goltermann.....Adagio and finale from concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture "Fingal's Cave"
Bach } Air
Schumann } Traumerei
Popper } Papillon

Soli for violoncello.

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A

Although this programme, like its predecessor, seemed unsatisfactory in its arrangement, no such feeling existed upon hearing its actual performance. The new conductor as a programme maker is not only successful, but he is very subtle; it seems to be impossible to judge of the effectiveness of his arrangement until it is heard. One just criticism might be made with regard to Saturday night's programme, but from a practical and not an artistic point of view. The initial number lasted nearly half an hour, which was rather hard upon the people who had come perhaps only half a minute late, and yet were obliged to stand in the draughty corridors for so long a time. It may also be observed in regard to these "Variations" that their chief interest centres in the manner of their instrumentation. It is indeed to be regretted that in his larger and more important works Brahms has been unable to use the orchestra as effectively and beautifully as is the case here. The number was finely played, and the many intricate and dangerous passages were overcome with absolute ease. A very mixed impression was created by the new violoncello soloist, Mr. Anton Hekking, but on the whole he appeared in a decidedly favorable light. The Goltermann concerto is about as bad and uninteresting an exhibition as could well be imagined of the product of a virtuoso-compositeur. There is unfortunately very little good concert music for the violoncello; but there is very little which is quite as undesirable as this concerto. Mr. Hekking is therefore all the more to be complimented upon the success which he scored in a work which could not possibly interest his listeners. He has an admirable tone, wonderful technique, and his whole style of playing is broad and finished; but if the term may be applied to his instrument—he completely lacks a mezzo-voce. He either uses his really very beautiful full and open tone or an infinitely delicate and dainty pianissimo, but in between he seems to have nothing to speak of. The constantly recurring effect of this very marked contrast is a little wearying to the ear. It is presumable, however, that this may have been largely due on Saturday to his evident nervousness. With regard to the three solo selections which followed the overture, a distinct protest must be made. The Bach "Air" from the suite in D—which, for some occult reason, the otherwise careful and erudite critic of the Gazette refers to as an excerpt from the Christmas oratorio—and even more especially the Schumann "Träumerei" are most distinctly and unchangeably polyphonic compositions, and therefore completely unsuited to performance as "solo" pieces. That lovely conception, the "Träumerei," is so disfigured and distorted from the original thought by the manner in which it is presented by this arrangement as to be offensive in the extreme to the musical ear. Nothing could be farther removed from the noble romanticism of Schumann's artistic soul than the cheap sentimentality of last Saturday's arrangement and performance of this little pianoforte masterpiece. Mr. Hekking was loudly applauded after all his selections, and has every reason to feel satisfied with his reception.

And Mr. Nikisch? What a splendid work he did! And the public seems to be completely his own. It has been asserted by many writers on music that each man's position in the history of music should depend chiefly on that which he may have done which had never been done before; that which was original in both conception and execution. This is probably true, and in that case Mendelssohn takes his place among the mighty dead on the strength of the music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and more especially the "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" overture. This work is so daringly original and beautiful that no matter how badly it may be played and presented it never misses its effect. If this is so, how immeasurably does it gain in its power over the listener when read with the marvellous, the positively magic beauty and romantic inspiration which characterized its performance under the sympathetic hands of Mr. Nikisch. The picture was perfect in detail and mass of color; it was the true, breathing soul of the composition discovered and laid bare by another artistic spirit which vibrated with it in complete concord. As was the case the week before, even in this more than familiar work, Mr. Nikisch pointed out new beauties which have before passed unnoticed; and especially worthy of notice is the fact that tender and romantic as the interpretation was, at the same time it was splendidly broad and strong. The reading of the symphony was as new and interesting as that of the "Coriolan" overture at the first concert, and it is possible after a second experience to speak with greater freedom of the new conductor's Beethoven interpretations, and there can be no doubt that the public will soon learn to appreciate and understand—yes, and love the wonderful thoughts of the great master as placed before them by this whole-souled young conductor. It may be said at once that all the tempi were slower than usual, but for this heaven be praised! The "whirlwind" method of reading the scherzos and finales of classical symphonies has been fearfully overdone in this city, and the change is restful to the nerves and undoubtedly a gain artistically. The short introduction was strong and virile in the extreme, and the whole first movement was rendered with infinite variety of detail and color—intensely interesting in every bar. Most beautiful of all the movements, however, was the lovely allegretto. That nondescript and quaint class of musical-æsthetic experts who might be called "amateur interpreters of the human emotions" have written an infinite amount about Beethoven's "meaning" in this number; but one thing seems clear to all, that it means—sorrow. And as played by Mr. Nikisch it is strong, noble, masculine sorrow. There was plenty of sentiment but no trace of sentimentality, and one felt as if face to face with the great grief of a strong man, who bowed his head indeed, but with the determination to be strong, brave and patient. It was indeed a glorious interpretation. The whole symphony, in fact the whole programme, was most finely and conscientiously executed by the orchestra, who seem to thoroughly enjoy playing under their new master. His immense magnetism and his overflowing musical soul seem to touch every one of them, and each man does his very best. The well-grounded hopes for a season of unusual musical interest which were founded upon the first week's experience were more than confirmed on Saturday, and it can only be said—apropos of the extraordinary way in which Mr. Nikisch appears to be missed in his old home—that Leipsic's loss has been indeed our gain.

ARTHUR WELD.

Oct 19

ART JOURNAL.

Mr. Nikisch and His Opinions.

[BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.]

Mr. Arthur Nikisch unbosomed himself last week to a Herald reporter, and in last Sunday's issue of that paper appeared his estimate of Boston musicians.

"On being asked if he was pleased with the Boston Symphony orchestra as he had found it, he replied: 'I am more than pleased; it is magnificent. There are only two orchestras in Europe that can compare with it, and those are the orchestras at Dresden, conducted by Herr Schuch, and of Leipsig, which I myself conducted until I came here.'"

So, according to Mr. Nikisch, Europe is musically synonymous with Saxony. There is no first-class orchestra in Berlin, or in Vienna, or in Cologne, or in Hanover, or in Frankfort, or in Munich. This will be interesting news to the people of these cities.

And how about Paris, Mr. Nikisch? Have you ever heard the orchestra directed by Lamoureux, and would you say as a musician that, in precision, rhythm, fineness in detail and breadth in conception, in orchestral technique, either the orchestra directed by the shrewd Schuch, whose rapid advancement at court was perhaps due as much to the charms of a fair wife as any overmastering ability as a conductor, or the Leipsig orchestra, which now mourns your departure, is superior? Are they not both inferior?

Have you heard of late years the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, which long ago under Habeneck extorted praise from Richard Wagner, which now obeys Garcin? Have you heard any of the Berlioz concerts given by the men under Colonne?

Then there are orchestras in Russia and England, are there not?

But the good people of Saxony believe in Saxony and perhaps view all things musical through an Elbe fog, just as the famous Tartarin and his friends were influenced in their speech by the Meridional mirage. Tarascon is not the only city in the world; nor are the great orchestras to be found in Saxony alone.

When asked about his programme, Mr. Nikisch said: "It will be my effort in arranging my concerts to encourage young American composers. I believe that there is a great deal of musical talent in this country, and I think that it ought to be brought out." And he then speaks in warm terms of Mr. Arthur Bird. He declares himself an admirer of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner et al, and he says nothing of the modern French and Russian schools. Let us by all means have the compositions of Americans brought to a hearing, and it is to be hoped that in this particular Mr. Nikisch will follow the example of Theodore Thomas rather than that or Mr. Gericke. Let us also have an opportunity of hearing the works of the modern French and Russian composers. Possibly the music of Borodine, Cesar Franck, and Augusta Holmes would be more interesting to a Boston audience than the labored symphonic poem of some slavish imitator of Wagner, Herr This or Herr That.

What Mr. Nikisch says about Wagner is eminently sensible, though it may be a disappointment to the true, hysterical disciples of the "Master."

"With regard to Wagner, I don't think that his operas should be performed in concert. For perfect representation they demand the dramatic adjuncts of the stage. I make exception to five or six of his overtures, such as the overture to 'Die Minnesinger,' which, by the way, is to be opening number on my first program, the 'Gotterdammerung' overture and the Vorspiel to 'Tristan and Isolde.'"

It is safe to say that he enters upon his work supported by the respect and kindly feeling of both orchestra and audience. Whether he preserves this respect until the end of his engagement, rests entirely with himself. He has admirable musicians under him; behind him he has money. He has been heralded as a great leader. It remains to be seen whether he is a man of narrow mind, a bigot whose sole desire is to propagate German music; or a musician who asks of music only this: is it good or is it bad, regardless of its school, careless as to its origin or nationality.

PHILIP HALE.

Oct 20

GLOBE—SUNDAY,

CONCERT EVENTS.

Nikisch Once More Proves Himself the Artist.

New Beauties Evoked by His Baton from Familiar Orchestral Classics.

Baermann This Week—The Star Programme—Preludes and Echoes.

True musicians are born, not made. If this were not so we should have advanced, today no farther than in Scarlatti's time Arthur Nikisch, who represents the most advanced school of conducting, is assuredly one of these born musicians. A second hearing of the work of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under his direction, only confirms and re emphasizes the impression he first made here in Music Hall. It is already abundantly evident that the public may count upon hearing delightful interpretations. New beauties are discovered in old favorites. There is sure to be nothing cut and dried in his programmes at all, whatever the works he may offer to attention.

Wagner has said that a conductor should find his tempo in the character of the music—a rule not to be safely followed by any one not a musician by nature, but which demonstrates its truth always when a man like Nikisch cuts nobly away from tradition. The new leader, though obviously a man of feeling, and consequently one who must feel the excitement inevitable at the performance of a noble piece of music, has a most remarkable control over himself as well as over his musicians, and is never "carried off his feet," as some distinguished directors have been.

Mr. Nikisch conducted yesterday's concert without a score, excepting, of course, in the 'cello concerto, Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, the opening number of the programme, found an interpretation delicious, exquisitely shaded, thoroughly sympathetic. No more familiar great work could have been chosen than Beethoven's seventh symphony. But under Nikisch's baton new charms were revealed in the score. In the opening movement he took the time much slower than any other conductor has done here so far as can be recalled. He restrains rather than urges on the orchestra; producing his effects by the subordination of secondary parts and the result is that he is able to produce a wonderful singing quality, so to speak, that makes the melody stand out, and presents most vividly the thought in the composer's mind. Such a performance of the seventh symphony as was given yesterday emphasizes the advance in methods that has been gained in these concerts.

When Mr. Henschel opened the first symphony concert year nine seasons ago, he gave as a good many readers may recall, Haydn's twelfth symphony or at any rate, the work so numbered in the Breitkopf and Hartel edition. The tempo was taken at a rate so rapid as to completely disguise the pretty little legato melody with which the allegro begins, and this struck the keynote to his conception of lively movements generally—to push the orchestra up to its capacity for rapidity of tones. Even with Mr. Henschel's successor, wonderful disciplinarian though he was, this ambitious tendency was manifest. Something was gained, undoubtedly, but that Mr. Nikisch will show us how much was lost is evident from his reading of the two widely different symphonies already presented. Nothing which the composer has written is to be slighted or hurried over. He dwells upon every little effect, as if jealous it should escape our attention. In his view the whole aggregation of musicians is but as a solo instrument. Nikisch plays on the orchestra exactly as he would on a pianoforte; and his interpretation, not only of the symphony but the Mendelssohn number, was thoroughly individualized and strikingly effective. Nothing finer, certainly, than the playing of the "Fingal's Cave" overture has been heard since the Boston Symphony orchestra was established. The performance was a revelation in delicate effect—in results that could not be gained had the leader not so artistically adjusted and subordinated the forces at his command. Nikisch's magnetism is very great. His manner is essentially dramatic, and in very large measure the remarkable influence he has thus early gained over his players is due to this fact. With his orchestra and his audiences enthusiastic, it is safe to say that the only people likely to carp at Nikisch will come from ranks to which he does not belong—the ranks of the conservative "made" musicians.

The soloist yesterday was Mr. Anton Hekking. No slight addition to the effect of the work of this artist of the 'cello was gained by the orchestral accompaniment. It was dainty, delicate, almost ethereal, sinking almost into insignificance for a moment and again gaining strength, but never anything more than a charming subordination to the soloist's work. Mr. Hekking gave the concerto delightfully, and the air from Bach's "Suite," as well as the "Papillon" were performed in a most finished and artistic manner. But the 'cellist swayed his audience most by his playing of Schumann's "Traumerei." It was exquisitely delicate, so light that the audience held its breath lest the faint thread of melody should be lost. It seemed as if the dropping of a pin or the rustling of a bit of paper must have destroyed the spell. No more dainty, sympathetic, heart-appealing interpretation of the "Traumerei" could be imagined. All in all, it was one of the gems of a concert that on Friday afternoon, as well as yesterday evening, won admiration from audiences crowding the hall to overflowing.

The programme for this week is signally attractive. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and he is assigned Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte, in E flat. The orchestra is to open the concert with the noble "Egmont" overture. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor will follow the pianoforte solo, and the closing work is to be the Mendelssohn "Italian" symphony.

Anton Hekking, who so successfully appeared as soloist at the symphony concert last evening, is the new 'cellist of the Kneisel quartet. This organization will give six concerts in Chickering Hall on Monday evenings, Oct. 28, Dec. 2, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, Feb. 24 and March 31. The soloists engaged for these concerts are Mrs. Moore Lawson, Miss Rose Stewart, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Ernst Perabo and Arthur Foote. Season tickets will be sold to subscribers at the box office Music Hall, tomorrow (Monday) morning, at 9.

Oct 20

SUNDAY HERALD

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Anton Hekking, Soloist.

Mr. Nikisch as a Programme Maker—The Bostonians' New England Success—The Public School Music Issue—The Hegner Concerts—News, Notes, Comment and Gossip.

The second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last evening, with Mr. Anton Hekking as soloist, and the following selections as a programme:

Brahms..Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, op. 56.
Goltermann.....Concerto for 'cello, in A minor
Mendelssohn.....Overture "Fingal's Cave"
Solo for violoncello.
Bach.....Air
Schumann.....Traumerei
Popper.....Papillon
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A

It is already apparent that the new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, is not a success as a programme maker, and it is to be trusted that his attention will be quickly given to a study of Mr. Henschal's models in this particular during the first two years' concerts of this orchestra. The programmes of Mr. Gericke's regime were not such as Boston audiences desire, and a continuance of his methods in choosing and arranging the selections for these concerts by the new conductor will seriously jeopardize his present popularity with Symphony patrons. The limited experience that Mr. Nikisch has enjoyed as a concert conductor, may make it desirable for him to acquire a familiarity with the standard overtures and symphonic works by their performance under his baton, but his experience in this line will be gained under protest at these concerts. The library of the orchestra is well stocked with enjoyable compositions of the modern school, which have not had a recent hearing, and during the last five years Boston has heard few of the compositions from French and English sources which have been brought forward in Paris and London. The promises given by Mr. Nikisch, if he has been correctly reported, led to a feeling that his programmes would show a broad, liberal spirit toward all schools; but the three that have been announced do not realize the pleasant anticipations that have been indulged in by the patrons of these concerts in recent years. In choosing the Brahms' variations on Haydn's chorale "St. Anthony," Mr. Nikisch had an excellent opportunity to display the virtuosity of his orchestra, and as the new conductor has a just pride in the technical proficiency of his band, it may be pardonable to use such a composition to afford opportunities in this line. Such compositions are little more than orchestral exercises, however, and a few, a very few, of them will suffice for a season. The excellencies of the wood wind department of the band were given great prominence in this number, and the complicated instrumental adornments of the simple hymn were played with faultless skill by the orchestra. Mr. Anton Hekking, the soloist of the evening, is a 'cello player of great ability, and his selection as leader of his division of the band is a most admirable choice. His style has the largeness and breadth demanded for his position in the orchestra, and also the delicacy and technical skill desired for the best solo work. The portions of the Goltermann concerto proved highly interesting novelties, and the melodious theme of the andante was sung with exquisite expression by the instrument under Mr. Hekking's touch. The air by Bach and the familiar "Traumerei" by Schumann served further to show Mr. Hekking's rare gifts in sentimental compositions, and the brilliant "Papillon" by Popper exhibited the player's technical attainments most admirably. Mr. Hekking became an instant favorite with his audience, and gained a well merited recognition of his abilities as a player. The reading of the seventh symphony was certainly original and full of the conductor's individuality, but a closer following of the conventional interpretations would have given better results in certain portions of the work. The romantic characteristics of the first two movements were not brought out with all desired success, and the interpretation of the lovely allegretto was particularly disappointing. However unsatisfactory the beginning, the ending more than made amends, and in the brilliant reading of the finale all that had gone before was forgiven, the splendid work done in this movement disarming all criticism and winning the conductor an enthusiastic commendation from his audience. The Mendelssohn overture made a particularly pleasing number of the programme, the lights and shades were strengthened with admirable taste, and the beauties of the tone coloring greatly enhanced in this way. The programme for the third concert, with Mr. Carl Baermann as soloist, will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Egmont"; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat; Schubert, symphony in B minor (unfinished); Mendelssohn, symphony in A (Italian).

Oct 21

POST,

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening to an audience even larger and more enthusiastic than that of last week:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme by Haydn, op. 56
Goltermann.....Adagio and finale from concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture "Fingal's Cave"
Bach.....Air
Schumann.....Traumerei
Popper.....Papillon
Soli for violoncello.
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A

Although this programme, like its predecessor, seemed unsatisfactory in its arrangement, no such feeling existed upon hearing its actual performance. The new conductor as a programme maker is not only successful, but he is very subtle; it seems to be impossible to judge of the effectiveness of his arrangement until it is heard. One just criticism might be made with regard to Saturday night's programme, but from a practical and not an artistic point of view. The initial number lasted nearly half an hour, which was rather hard upon the people who had come perhaps only half a minute late, and yet were obliged to stand in the draughty corridors for so long a time. It may also be observed in regard to these "Variations" that their chief interest centres in the manner of their instrumentation. It is indeed to be regretted that in his larger and more important works Brahms has been unable to use the orchestra as effectively and beautifully as is the case here. The number was finely played, and the many intricate and dangerous passages were overcome with absolute ease. A very mixed impression was created by the new violoncello soloist, Mr. Anton Hekking, but on the whole he appeared in a decidedly favorable light. The Goltermann concerto is about as bad and uninteresting an exhibition as could well be imagined of the product of a virtuoso-compositeur. There is unfortunately very little good concert music for the violoncello; but there is very little which is quite as undesirable as this concerto. Mr. Hekking is therefore all the more to be complimented upon the success which he scored in a work which could not possibly interest his listeners. He has an admirable tone, wonderful technique, and his whole style of playing is broad and finished; but if the term may be applied to his instrument—he completely lacks a mezzo-voce. He either uses his really very beautiful full and open tone or an infinitely delicate and dainty pianissimo, but in between he seems to have nothing to speak of. The constantly recurring effect of this very marked contrast is a little wearying to the ear. It is presumable, however, that this may have been largely due on Saturday to his evident nervousness. With regard to the three solo selections which followed the overture, a distinct protest must be made. The Bach "Air" from the suite in D—which, for some occult reason, the otherwise careful and erudite critic of the Gazette refers to as an excerpt from the Christmas oratorio—and even more especially the Schumann "Träumerei" are most distinctly and unchangeably polyphonic compositions, and therefore completely unsuited to performance as "solo" pieces. That lovely conception, the "Träumerei," is so disfigured and distorted from the original thought by the manner in which it is presented by this arrangement as to be offensive in the extreme to the musical ear. Nothing could be farther removed from the noble romanticism of Schumann's artistic soul than the cheap sentimentality of last Saturday's arrangement and performance of this little pianoforte masterpiece. Mr. Hekking was loudly applauded after all his selections, and has every reason to feel satisfied with his reception.

And Mr. Nikisch? What a splendid work he did! And the public seems to be completely his own. It has been asserted by many writers on music that each man's position in the history of music should depend chiefly on that which he may have done which had never been done before; that which was original in both conception and execution. This is probably true, and in that case Mendelssohn takes his place among the mighty dead on the strength of the music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and more especially the "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" overture. This work is so daringly original and beautiful that no matter how badly it may be played and presented it never misses its effect. If this is so, how immeasurably does it gain in its power over the listener when read with the marvellous, the positively magic beauty and romantic inspiration which characterized its performance under the sympathetic hands of Mr. Nikisch. The picture was perfect in detail and mass of color; it was the true, breathing soul of the composition discovered and laid bare by another artistic spirit which vibrated with it in complete concord. As was the case the week before, even in this more than familiar work, Mr. Nikisch pointed out new beauties which have before passed unnoticed; and especially worthy of notice is the fact that tender and romantic as the interpretation was, at the same time it was splendidly broad and strong. The reading of the symphony was as new and interesting as that of the "Coriolan" overture at the first concert, and it is possible after a second experience to speak with greater freedom of the new conductor's Beethoven interpretations, and there can be no doubt that the public will soon learn to appreciate and understand—yes, and love the wonderful thoughts of the great master as placed before them by this whole-souled young conductor. It may be said at once that all the tempi were slower than usual, but for this heaven be praised! The "whirlwind" method of reading the scherzos and finales of classical symphonies has been fearfully overdone in this city, and the change is restful to the nerves and undoubtedly a gain artistically. The short introduction was strong and virile in the extreme, and the whole first movement was rendered with infinite variety of detail and color—intensely interesting in every bar. Most beautiful of all the movements, however, was the lovely allegretto. That nondescript and quaint class of musical-æsthetic experts who might be called "amateur interpreters of the human emotions" have written an infinite amount about Beethoven's "meaning" in this number; but one thing seems clear to all, that it means—sorrow. And as played by Mr. Nikisch it is strong, noble, masculine sorrow. There was plenty of sentiment but no trace of sentimentality, and one felt as if face to face with the great grief of a strong man, who bowed his head indeed, but with the determination to be strong, brave and patient. It was indeed a glorious interpretation. The whole symphony, in fact the whole programme, was most finely and conscientiously executed by the orchestra, who seem to thoroughly enjoy playing under their new master. His immense magnetism and his overflowing musical soul seem to touch every one of them, and each man does his very best. The well-grounded hopes for a season of unusual musical interest which were founded upon the first week's experience were more than confirmed on Saturday, and it can only be said—apropos of the extraordinary way in which Mr. Nikisch appears to be missed in his old home—that Leipsic's loss has been indeed our gain.

ARTHUR WELD.

Oct 19

ART JOURNAL.

Mr. Nikisch and His Opinions.

[BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.]

Mr. Arthur Nikisch unbosomed himself last week to a Herald reporter, and in last Sunday's issue of that paper appeared his estimate of Boston musicians.

"On being asked if he was pleased with the Boston Symphony orchestra as he had found it, he replied: 'I am more than pleased; it is magnificent. There are only two orchestras in Europe that can compare with it, and those are the orchestras at Dresden, conducted by Herr Schuch, and of Leipsig, which I myself conducted until I came here.'"

So, according to Mr. Nikisch, Europe is musically synonymous with Saxony. There is no first-class orchestra in Berlin, or in Vienna, or in Cologne, or in Hanover, or in Frankfort, or in Munich. This will be interesting news to the people of these cities.

And how about Paris, Mr. Nikisch? Have you ever heard the orchestra directed by Lamoureux, and would you say as a musician that, in precision, rhythm, fineness in detail and breadth in conception, in orchestral technique, either the orchestra directed by the shrewd Schuch, whose rapid advancement at court was perhaps due as much to the charms of a fair wife as any overmastering ability as a conductor, or the Leipsig orchestra, which now mourns your departure, is superior? Are they not both inferior?

Have you heard of late years the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, which long ago under Habeneck extorted praise from Richard Wagner, which now obeys Garcin? Have you heard any of the Berlioz concerts given by the men under Colonne?

Then there are orchestras in Russia and England, are there not?

But the good people of Saxony believe in Saxony and perhaps view all things musical through an Elbe fog, just as the famous Tartarin and his friends were influenced in their speech by the Meridional mirage. Tarascon is not the only city in the world; nor are the great orchestras to be found in Saxony alone.

When asked about his programme, Mr. Nikisch said: "It will be my effort in arranging my concerts to encourage young American composers. I believe that there is a great deal of musical talent in this country, and I think that it ought to be brought out." And he then speaks in warm terms of Mr. Arthur Bird. He declares himself an admirer of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner et al, and he says nothing of the modern French and Russian schools. Let us by all means have the compositions of Americans brought to a hearing, and it is to be hoped that in this particular Mr. Nikisch will follow the example of Theodore Thomas rather than that or Mr. Gericke. Let us also have an opportunity of hearing the works of the modern French and Russian composers. Possibly the music of Borodine, Cesar Franck, and Augusta Holmes would be more interesting to a Boston audience than the labored symphonic poem of some slavish imitator of Wagner, Herr This or Herr That.

What Mr. Nikisch says about Wagner is eminently sensible, though it may be a disappointment to the true, hysterical disciples of the "Master."

"With regard to Wagner, I don't think that his operas should be performed in concert. For perfect representation they demand the dramatic adjuncts of the stage. I make exception to five or six of his overtures, such as the overture to 'Die Minnesinger,' which, by the way, is to be opening number on my first program, the 'Gotterdammerung' overture and the Vorspiel to 'Tristan and Isolde.'"

It is safe to say that he enters upon his work supported by the respect and kindly feeling of both orchestra and audience. Whether he preserves this respect until the end of his engagement, rests entirely with himself. He has admirable musicians under him; behind him he has money. He has been heralded as a great leader. It remains to be seen whether he is a man of narrow mind, a bigot whose sole desire is to propagate German music; or a musician who asks of music only this: is it good or is it bad, regardless of its school, careless as to its origin or nationality.

PHILIP HALE.

[6]

[7] Oct 19

GAZETTE.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night was listened to by an audience fully as large as that which attended the concert of the week before. The programme afforded excellent opportunities for forming a clearer estimate of the qualities of Mr. Nikisch as a conductor, containing as it did Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. It may be said here that if the conductor gave indications in his first concert that he might prove, perhaps, a radical reformer in respect to generally received ideas in regard to the interpretation of familiar master works, he did not intensify them on this occasion. The rubato effects that were so alarmingly prevalent at the opening concert were reduced almost to a minimum at this one, and there was but little that could be objected to even by the most rigid and exacting of purists. The Brahms variations were read with delightful clearness, and a richness of color, a variety in effect, a grace and a force were imparted to them that deprived them of the pedantic dryness that had hitherto attached to them. The interpretation of this work was a revelation of many beauties that had before been hidden, and it was a worthy pendant to Mr. Nikisch's fine reading of the "Meistersinger" overture of the previous week. The Mendelssohn overture received a broadly poetic and romantic rendering, and its climaxes were given with splendid power and brilliancy, though there was occasionally wanting something of delicacy in the playing. We have heard the work when it made a much stronger impression. The reading of the Symphony, on the whole, did not depart greatly from what we have been accustomed to. The first allegro was taken slower and lost something of its familiar vivacity, which gave way to a certain inappropriate heaviness, but beyond this there was no fault to be found with it. The long crescendo on a pedal bass leading up to the climax of this movement was brought out with splendid impressiveness. The allegretto was taken more slowly than has been the rule, and with a loss of delicacy and precision that have marked former performances of it here. As it seemed to us, Mr. Nikisch laid too much stress upon the general effect he wished to produce, and neglected essential details of finish in the work of the orchestra. The scherzo was given brilliantly and spiritedly enough, and with a fine feeling for its more emphatic characteristics; but here again there was an unfamiliar coarseness in the orchestra. The finale was read and played with all necessary fire, and, taken altogether, with large and impressive effect. But it must be confessed that, despite many admirable moments in the performance of the symphony, it had an unusual heaviness and was wanting in the highest finish. The most enthusiasm was shown by the audience in its applause at the end of the Brahms variations, and justly, for the reading and playing of this selection was the one complete success in the purely orchestral work of the concert. The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking, who contributed the andante and finale from Goltermann's concerto for violoncello in A-minor, and a group of smaller pieces, to the programme. The artist created a furore by his playing and fairly earned and fully deserved the applause he received. He has a large, noble tone, exquisite purity of intonation, and plays with the taste and feeling of a thorough artist. His sustained cantabile playing in the andante of the concerto was of rare beauty and expressiveness, and the allegro was given with perfect artistic dignity, and a delightful absence of anything suggesting the mere virtuoso. He was recalled heartily after this selection. Later he played the well known air, by Bach, from the Christmas oratorio, Schumann's "Traumerei," and a trifle by Popper that might have been spared. The delicacy and tenderness with which he played the "Traumerei" excited the audience greatly, and it was only the determination of the artist that resisted the encore that was so imperatively demanded. Mr. Hekking's success was complete. At the next concert Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony will be given. Mr. Carl Baermann is to be the soloist, and will play Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat.

Oct 19

GAZETTE.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch already promises to achieve more personal popularity than was attained by either of his predecessors. He has a decided charm of manner, and is possessed of almost as much personal magnetism as Georg Henschel was blessed with. His heart and soul are given up to music and his work; and it is doubtful whether he will allow himself to be lured away by the fascinations of society. Had Mr. Gericke not emulated the American habit of burning the candle at both ends, he would, in all likelihood, be at present at the head of our orchestra. It is impossible for any man of average strength to give out so much of himself in his work as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra necessarily does, and yet be able to fritter away his nights at fashionable semi-Bohemian parties. It is said that Mr. Gericke wasted his health and injured his constitution by attempting to lead a fashionable and a working life at one and the same time. He by no means accepted a tenth of the invitations showered upon him; but he allowed himself to drift into the habit of going to a few houses, and, unfortunately, those were the very houses where the late hours helped to sap his constitution. Mr. Nikisch is an enthusiastic musician, and has already made himself popular with the members of his orchestra, as well as at the Tavern Club, where he has naturally stepped into his predecessor's position. Although he spoke little, if any, English before his arrival, he has already mastered the language sufficiently for ordinary conversation. It is pleasant to find that he is liberal enough to give the modern composers a hearing. Mr. Gericke was obliged to go outside the narrow limits he first laid down, in answer to general demand; and if Mr. Nikisch fulfils his promises, Boston will have little cause to complain of the Symphony programmes. Perhaps the most noticeable thing about the new conductor is his hands. These are exceedingly beautiful, being white as marble, small and well shaped. There is no doubt that he realizes this fact; for he takes exceptional care of them, almost always wearing gloves, even often at the private rehearsals. The Boston girls have already begun to rave over these hands, especially when one is used to smooth his back hair. It is well for the susceptible girls to remember that there is a Mrs. Nikisch on the other side of the ocean, and therefore it ought to be impossible for them to work up a sentiment for a married man. Unfortunately, they have taken too many lessons from their married sisters, and realize that marital chains are often no impediment to a flirtation. In this case, as in that of the last conductor, they will find their sentiment and flirtations quite unreciprocated, and will have to content themselves with surreptitious glances at the first and second violins.

NEMO.

Oct 21

ADVERTISER.

THE SYMPHONY.

An Interesting Programme and One That Evoked Much Enthusiasm.

A very interesting programme (although it contained little of the element of novelty), and one which kept the audience at a high pitch of enthusiasm, was that of Saturday night. It was oddly arranged in some respects, since the only overture came in the middle of the concert, while the opening number was a set of variations. Such a number as Schumann's "Traumerei," also, could scarcely be called fitting for the occasion, being a transcription from a piano work, and becoming as a 'cello solo, a sop to the time-devouring Cerberus, and something better suited to a popular than a symphonic concert. But the performance again showed the great powers of the new conductor, and the splendid ability of the orchestra. It has been said that happy countries have no history, and it might be added that excellent concerts ought to have no reviews, for a long string of laudatory adjectives becomes rather tiresome to any reader. Yet I can give only praise to the marvellous clearness of the variations of Haydn's Theme (Chorale St. Antoni) by Brahms.

Once more the conductor led the concert without the aid of scores, and again he showed that this proceeding is an advantage, by the perfect control of the orchestra gained. The variations were clear in every part, and the suitable distinctions between the different presentations of the theme were very finely drawn. Brahms is the one great living master of the variation form. Whether on piano or with full orchestra, he always shows a sense of fitness, as well as great skill and learning, as witness the piano variations upon the last theme that Schumann wrote (the unhappy master thought that it was dictated by spirits) which is appropriately ended by a funeral march, or the variations of a Handelian theme culminating in a fugue. Beethoven in his search for grand finales, pushed the variation from across the border line of development, and Brahms, in some respects the true successor of Beethoven, does much the same thing. The finale of this set of variations becomes a grandiose development and is full of breadth and majesty. Apart from the ingenuity of construction, such works serve admirably to display an orchestra; instrument after instrument passes in review, and the tone-coloring is chameleon-like in its changes. The wood wind instruments had many opportunities to display their excellence of intonation and shading, and used them to advantage, especially M. Molé on the flute in the finale; the muted strings in the eighth variation were also remarkable, even where all was so good. The number was a triumph for orchestra and conductor.

The lion's share of the applause was won, as usual by the soloist. Mr. Anton Hekking is an artist "by the grace of God." His 'cello playing is neat, flawless, and has enough of passion and expression in it to take it out of the realms of mere virtuosity, and to redeem it from the insipidity which sometimes attends on technical perfection. In Goltermann's concerto (two movements) the andante was given with pure, sweet tone, and there was clearness even in the most difficult harmonics. The double stopping was also without flaw, although of considerable intricacy, and the skips were made with admirable security. Nevertheless the artist had not Mr. Giese's breadth and power, and in the Bach "air" the tone seemed shallow. But this is probably due to the instrument rather than the artist; not every one can own such a superb Stradivarius as Fritz Giese does. In "Traümerei" Mr. Hekking touched a responsive chord in the breasts of the audience, and they very nearly forced an encore. A good vibrato and a nearly inaudible pianissimo had something to do with this. I have seen Remenyi use this popular failing to advantage and make a pianissimo that was quite inaudible by removing his bow almost imperceptibly from the strings, and melt an audience very nearly to tears by it, and after all our Symphony audiences are also like unto these. In Popper's "Papillon" the butterfly flew through the difficult harmonic passages in a most dainty manner, and Mr. Hekking was called out after his performance most enthusiastically.

Revenous a notre orchestre! Everyone knows what triumphs Mr. Gericke used to achieve with the overtures he gave; last night Mr. Nikisch proved that this form was to be as successful under his conductorship. Mendelssohn's "Hebrides Overture" was through and through delightful. Such shading, such a dreamy plashing of waves, such delicate yet effective contrasts, may not be described with type; only those who heard it may treasure its memory. It is becoming a very fashionable thing in musical circles nowadays, thanks to Wagner and Liszt, when Mendelssohn is mentioned or played, to smile patronizingly and say "Very elegant, but"—or "He is melodic and symmetrical, but"—I am glad for the benefit of these "butters" that some great conductors are holding stoutly to this healthy and beautiful composer, that the "Hebrides" made a success, and that the Italian symphony is to follow it this week.

The seventh symphony closed the programme. While I was astonished at some parts of the reading I am quite ready to acknowledge its general manliness and power. Summed up briefly the merits and demerits were these: The introduction, very effective and broad, the organ point at its end most excellently managed. The first movement begun astonishingly slow for a "Vivace," but the second theme given in stronger contrast because of this. The allegretto (the gem of it all) taken with the right tempo, not mawkish or funereal on the one hand, nor flippant on the other, but overshaded a little in some portions. The scherzo, very good, especially in allowing the horn tones to stand out clearly in the important organ point and also in giving the violins due prominence. The lack of these points have been the defect of some previous performances here. The finale was something new to Bostonians; such a saturnalia of percussive and brass instruments! If Mr. Gericke had been in the hall he would have doubted his own ears. Was it a fault? I think not, for I believe that when Beethoven was in his grotesque and joking mood, as he certainly was in the finales of both the seventh and eighth symphonies, he desired just such a tumultuous effect. Beethoven's humor was not of the delicate, refined sort, but was as fierce as that of Aristophanes, and such a reading as that of Saturday night promises well for the "Eroica," and the ninth symphony, when they come.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Oct 20

BOSTON TIMES.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SECOND CONCERT.

The programme for the second Symphony, even if it may not have drawn the confirmed, musical hermit from his cell, was from the educational standpoint as judiciously arranged as the average auditor could desire. It read as follows:

Brahms,—Variations on a theme by Haydn op. 56; Goltermann,—Andante and Finale from concerto for 'cello in A minor, op. 14; Mendelssohn,—Overture, "Fingal's Cave"; Soli for 'cello,—Air (melody from the orchestral suite in D)—Bach; Traummerei, Schumann; and Papillon, Popper;—Beethoven, Symphony, No. 7 in A.

Thus was a repertory rendered attractive, not only because it included master-works, the merit of which had long been recognized, but because compositions of lesser importance, but thoroughly well-made and interesting, were also included. To enjoy the evening first with the most recent of the three great B's—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—and to end it with the seventh symphony seemed wholly appropriate. The fact of the monumental variations of Brahms being his fifty-sixth opus is worth noting as he had previously published not more than two or three orchestral works; but the freehand and masterly finish of his instrumentation are as noticeable in these variations as in almost anything he afterwards wrote, always excepting his C minor symphony. With what care, too, does he make conspicuous his matchless ingenuity as a contrapuntist and scholastic especially in the two-fold counterpoint with which he announces the theme, at the very commencement, where there is all that dross-less purity that is the inseparable resultant of a double contrapuntal style of writing. In the eighth variation his reduction of the theme to the smaller factors of notation is extraordinary on account of the ease and naturalness with which it is accomplished. There is a latent pedantry, to be sure, whenever counterpoint by diminution is employed, and even Bach's genius could barely conceal his scholasticism at such times; but the variations, while they contain much that is grand in the emotional sense, and also inspiring, plainly illustrate the whys and wherefores of Brahms's unequaled rank as a scholastic.

Beethoven's seventh symphony still holds its own as the most picturesque and imaginative of all orchestral tone-pictures, the pastoral symphony not excepted. As regards its picturesqueness, had Beethoven himself not deemed it superior to "The Pastoral," he would have prescribed in its behalf some definite picture. The work is so well known that any analysis of it would seem supererogatory, but it may be added that if it will not always be a modern symphony, like the glorious ninth, it is still one of the profoundest realizations of nature, glancing, as Carlyle would say, into the deepest deeps of beauty, and seeming at times no less a scene-painting than a soul-painting.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the concert was pregnant with charm; invariably sympathetic in its response to the conductor's reading, and almost as invariably precise and accurate. Despite all the popular entrancement effected by Mr. Nikisch, it would be both unjust and disrespectful to infer that he to any extent aims at such extrinsic effects as might impel the attention of the average auditor and at the same time compromise the composer's intent.

Mr. Nikisch is, in a very conspicuous sense of the term, a subjective interpreter; but he is neither an obtrusive radical nor a sensationalist. His individuality simply teems with poetic and original ideas. These he seldom fails to subordinate to the composer's will. With the "Fingal's Cave" overture, however, there was the occasional impression conveyed that he was trying to out-Mendelssohn Mendelssohn, but as a whole, the performance was charmingly piquant, and in the best sense acceptable. The Brahms variations were thoroughly enwarmed with the conductor's individuality, and the symphony was remarkably well played, the various tempi taken being no less effective than scrupulously judicious and artistic.

Mr. Anton Hekking was the soloist. He is as refined and artistic in his conceptions as could be desired; his tone is not voluminous but it is notably sympathetic, and save in the slight shortcomings of intonation when he played the concerto, the purity of his tone is simply drossless. The facility with which he renders some of the most involved of roulades is marvellous, and he produces a pianissimo, the clearness and delicacy of which it would seem impossible to outrival. He was deservedly applauded and recalled.

Oct 20

BOSTON TIMES.

The recent visit of the new Boston conductor of the Higginson Symphony concerts, Herr Nikisch, to Manchester-by-the-Sea, as the guest of Col. Higginson, his patron, has been made the occasion of several very amusing episodes. In the first place, it must be known that that particular resort is dear to the Boston 400, and kept sacred by them to their own exclusive interests. Occasionally a painfully aspiring woman, who swears that she will be in the swim or die, tries the experiment of leasing a cottage there; or still more ambitious, builds one, and sets herself to work to build up a position thereby. This season one of the fiercest of that type, with persistent zeal, has taken root in the sacred soil, builded a sumptuous cottage and proceeded to climb. After casting about all summer for the coveted opportunity to make the first rung of the ladder, she was fain to sink back in disappointment and chagrin, when the German musician appeared on the horizon. Then she aroused herself to one more Herculean attempt before it should be absolutely too late, put to the utmost test every influence she could command and caught the lion for a dinner, with his host, Colonel Higginson; but, as might have been expected, not Mrs. Higginson. The same method was tried afterwards by other equally aspiring climbers with equal success, for it was hardly policy for Herr Nikisch to refuse such attentions, forced though they were, at the outset of his career, when an evening, however insignificant, might prove troublesome, and specially as his predecessor, Gericke, had stumbled into the same pitfall. This victimizing of the new conductor has made a good deal of amusement for the sweet set, one of whom has dubbed him the "Climber's Hope." It should be added, to set the truly charming gentleman right, that he is winning golden opinions from the best people, who will in all good time teach him to separate the pure metal from the dross.—Town Topics.

Oct 21

TRAVELLER.

The Second Symphony Concert.

Anton Hekking, Soloist.

The programme of the second Symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme, by Haydn, op. 56
Goltermann.....{Andante and Finale from Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Solo for violoncello.
Bach.....Air
Schumann.....Traumerei
Popper.....Papillon
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7, in A

The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking. A great audience attended, including hundreds who stood throughout the performance of the long programme. Mr. Nikisch did not gratify the expectation of many in extreme and sensational effects. He bestowed his warm individuality upon everything, giving color and meaning to every phrase, treating the overture and portions of the symphony, notably the allegretto and the scherzo, with a different touch than perhaps we have been accustomed to, but in no case did his readings greatly antagonize the purists.

The new conductor's tendency is to diagnose his programme in every part, and the process is very interesting to the hearer. The Brahms Variations were finely read, especially the finale. Mention should be made of the exquisite playing of the wood-wind band in the Brahms piece and elsewhere; the orchestra has never had so fine a quartet in this department. M. Sautet's oboe playing is even more artistic than formerly, while the new clarinetest is a valuable acquisition. Again did Mr. Nikisch conduct without score and with the greatest possible distinction. The orchestra responded instantly to his slightest deflection in tempi, while the manner in which individual parts were controlled for the better expression of the melodic idea or the proper elevation or suppression of the accompanying voices was always artistic. The tonality of the band was never more agreeable, and we are sure the gain in virility, already a marked consequence of Mr. Nikisch's spirit, will not diminish this whilom characteristic. Mr. Hekking confirmed the excellent impression he made at one of the chamber concerts of last season. The Goltermann music, though beneath the standard of these concerts, proved a good vehicle for the display of the player's cantabile and of his technique. Mr. Hekking is a finished artist, lacking somewhat the wealth of tone and the sensuous appeal the playing of his predecessor in the orchestra has, but withal a delightful performer. The playing of the group of smaller pieces gave much pleasure; the orchestra accompanied each of the selections in a most sympathetic and unobtrusive manner. The programme for the third concert, with Mr. Carl Baermann as soloist, will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Egmont"; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat; Schubert, symphony in B minor (unfinished); Mendelssohn, symphony in A (Italian).

Oct 22

POST

RECEPTION TO HERR NIKISCH.

Quite a number musical people and persons prominent in art and literature were present yesterday at the reception given to Herr Nikisch by Mr. B. J. Lang at his house on Brimmer street. Among the guests were ex-Governor Claflin, Mr. George L. Osgood, General Francis A. Walker, Messrs. T. and J. Adamowski, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. W. R. Richards, Mr. W. F. Apthorp, Professor H. B. Hill of Harvard College, Mr. Arlo Bates, Mr. George Chase, Mr. Barrett Wendell, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl and Mr. Francis H. Peabody.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, AT 8.

October 23d, November 20th, January 1st, and January 29th.

PROGRAMME

Subscription now open at the warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the four Concerts, $4.00. Subscription closes Thursday evening, October 17th. Tickets delivered, to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, on Friday and Saturday, October 18th and 19th.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1889

A SUCCESSFUL CONCERT

Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence.

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 23.—[SPECIAL.]—The first of a series of four subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given tonight before a large and representative audience, the programme being as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Seneschal's aria from "Jean de Paris".....Boieldieu
Mr. Fischer.
Entr'acte music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Songs with piano—
a. "Der Wanderer".....Schubert
b. "Der Schönste Engel".....Graben-Hoffmann
Mr. Fischer.
Symphony in A major ("Italian").....Mendelssohn

The acoustics of the hall are not entirely satisfactory, and although some of the pianissimo passages came out clearer than in our Music Hall, the more marked fortissimo, sounded a little coarse in places. On the other hand, Mr. Fischer was heard to greater advantage than in Boston. The fault seems to be that the hall is too long and broad for its height. The overture was superbly played, and here again Mr. Nikisch gave evidence of the immensely artistic power of his own individuality, as the interpretation was a considerable departure from the ordinary "traditions," and it may be unhesitatingly stated that his reading is an improvement upon these same mysterious and indefinable "traditions," which, after all, are generally matter of habit arising usually from laziness and lack of originality, or, more properly speaking, individuality on the part of most conductors. The "Rosamunde" music was played with the same infinite charm and delicacy which characterized its performance at the first concert in Boston. Mr. Fischer, although apparently suffering from a slight cold, sang in admirable fashion, and was loudly applauded both after the aria and the songs. The difficult colorateur passages of the former were overcome with perfect ease, and the latter were rendered with beautiful artistic feeling and finish. As an encore he sang the well-known "Es War ein Traum," by Lassen. The piano accompaniments to the songs were admirably played by Mr. Max Zach of the orchestra, who possesses in a high degree the peculiar artistic qualities necessary to the accompanist.

As was right and proper, the climax of the programme was reached in the symphony, which was magnificently played, and it was magnificently right! The peculiar characteristics of Mendelssohn's musical soul are like second nature to Mr. Nikisch, it would seem. He read the whole work, and particularly the two middle movements (andante con moto and con moto moderato) in a wonderfully romantic and picturesque manner—and the pronounced southern coloring was evidently and properly accentuated. With each hearing the great humanity of our new conductor's work becomes more apparent, and tonight his great personal magnetism made itself felt here quite as strongly as in Boston. No one can help having the most absolute conviction that Arthur Nikisch is a true, genuine musician to the bottom of his soul, and his continued success is certain. At all events, the "out-of-town" season has opened under quite as auspicious circumstances as did the home concerts, and there is every probability that in their turn, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and all the other cities on the orchestra's list will be added to the category of Mr. Nikisch's conquests.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24.

NIKISCH AT PROVIDENCE.

First of a Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 23.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave the first of a series of four concerts in Infantry Hall this evening. The audience, which was an exceptionally large one, was composed of the best known society people here.

The programme was as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber: entr'acte music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A.

Emil Fischer was the soloist of the evening, and rendered Seneschal's aria from "Jean de Paris," with orchestral accompaniment, and Schubert's "The Wanderer" and "Schonste Engel" by Graben-Hofman, with piano accompaniment by Max Zach.

The appearance of Herr Nikisch was the signal for a burst of applause which lasted some moments, and was repeated again and again at the end of each number.

The performance was an unqualified success, and the orchestra never played better.

The next concert takes place Nov. 20, and the sale of season tickets is much greater than in years past.

[illegible] so complementing another, Mr. Nikisch was tonight a strikingly characteristic person. His unique treatment of the Coriolan overture and the symphony reminded me of the fact that though Chopin could hardly recognize his own music when played by Liszt, it was often thought by friends of the musicians that it was more enjoyable thus than when played by Chopin himself. It would seem that in this one matter of strikingly original readings of standard works, for which readings Mr. Nikisch is already celebrated, he is a strangely consistent person to fill this peculiar position of musical omnipotence which Mr. Higginson has created. This Hungarian (and that Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian explains much that we see and have heard of him), with his surprising readings of this evening's music, promises fund for interest and curiosity this winter, second only to that of the music itself. I must confess to great enjoyment, as well as surprise, from much that I heard tonight, and to great admiration for the management of many details—the close of the Coriolan overture, for instance, was something amazing in the beauty of its conception and the refinement of its execution, while the treatment of the episode between the scherzo and the finale of the symphony was truly wonderful. No fear that the orchestra that is brought to do such work can deteriorate. Quite the contrary.

The order of the pieces on the programme was as unique and unconventional as the performance, but after hearing the concert I should not know how to improve that order.

If Mr. Nikisch can better control his orchestra by using no notes himself, I suppose I ought to be contented, but I certainly as much prefer to see the score of a symphony under a conductor's eye during a performance, as I do to see the Bible under the eye of a clergyman while a psalm of David is being spoken. I cannot doubt that a man of luminous talent and ability has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's orchestra. Surely we shall have a winter of great musical excitement and interest at his hands.

B. J. LANG.

PROF. PAINE'S PRAISE.

Prof. John K. Paine was seen by a HERALD representative at the close of the concert, and was enthusiastic over the fine work of Mr. Nikisch as conductor, and said:

"I find that Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fire and fine expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. Above all, he gives the orchestral instruments full freedom, especially the brass. They are not restrained, as with the previous conductor, but the orchestra can appear in its full glory. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

"What have you to say, professor, as to the make-up and arrangement of the programme? Do you think that the symphony should come first, last or in the middle?"

"In regard to the latter question, I think no strict rule can be laid down. It depends on the combination of pieces. The symphony may sometimes appear better at the last, but a new work oftener appears to advantage

---

[illegible] so complementing another, Mr. Nikisch was tonight a strikingly characteristic person. His unique treatment of the Coriolan overture and the symphony reminded me of the fact that though Chopin could hardly recognize his own music when played by Liszt, it was often thought by friends of the musicians that it was more enjoyable thus than when played by Chopin himself. It would seem that in this one matter of strikingly original readings of standard works, for which readings Mr. Nikisch is already celebrated, he is a strangely consistent person to fill this peculiar position of musical omnipotence which Mr. Higginson has created. This Hungarian (and that Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian explains much that we see and have heard of him), with his surprising readings of this evening's music, promises fund for interest and curiosity this winter, second only to that of the music itself. I must confess to great enjoyment, as well as surprise, from much that I heard tonight, and to great admiration for the management of many details—the close of the Coriolan overture, for instance, was something amazing in the beauty of its conception and the refinement of its execution, while the treatment of the episode between the scherzo and the finale of the symphony was truly wonderful. No fear that the orchestra that is brought to do such work can deteriorate. Quite the contrary.

The order of the pieces on the programme was as unique and unconventional as the performance, but after hearing the concert I should not know how to improve that order.

If Mr. Nikisch can better control his orchestra by using no notes himself, I suppose I ought to be contented, but I certainly as much prefer to see the score of a symphony under a conductor's eye during a performance, as I do to see the Bible under the eye of a clergyman while a psalm of David is being spoken. I cannot doubt that a man of luminous talent and ability has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's orchestra. Surely we shall have a winter of great musical excitement and interest at his hands.

B. J. LANG.

PROF. PAINE'S PRAISE.

Prof. John K. Paine was seen by a HERALD representative at the close of the concert, and was enthusiastic over the fine work of Mr. Nikisch as conductor, and said:

"I find that Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fire and fine expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. Above all, he gives the orchestral instruments full freedom, especially the brass. They are not restrained, as with the previous conductor, but the orchestra can appear in its full glory. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

"What have you to say, professor, as to the make-up and arrangement of the programme? Do you think that the symphony should come first, last or in the middle?"

"In regard to the latter question, I think no strict rule can be laid down. It depends on the combination of pieces. The symphony may sometimes appear better at the last, but a new work oftener appears to advantage

---

[illegible] [8]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1889

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The First of the Series at Infantry Hall Last Night.

The good sized audience that gathered in Infantry Hall last evening to hear the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed that the extraordinary interest aroused in Boston by the new conductor and the work of the orchestra under him was largely shared by the musical people of Providence. It was distinctly gratifying that so excellent an audience should have appeared to do honor to Mr. Nikisch, for last evening was the first time that he has given a performance in this country in any city outside of Boston.

The programme of last evening's concert was as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Aria from "Jean de Paris".....Boieldieu
MR. EMIL FISCHER.
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Songs with Piano { (a) "Der Wanderer".....Schubert
(b) "Schoenste Engel".....Graben-Hoffmann
MR. EMIL FISCHER.
Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn

Mr. Nikisch's presence confirmed for those at the concert the account already given in these columns of his appearance and manner. He revealed himself as a young man of short stature and slight figure, with the finely cut features of an artist, to which latter is given a certain pallor by his jet black hair and pointed beard. He mounts an extraordinarily high platform to conduct and overtops his men by almost his whole height. His manner is extremely composed, direct and concentrated, and is all for his orchestra with nothing for his audience. His beat is generally short and sharp, always instinct with decision, and extraordinarily simple for a conductor who has so much to bring out of his orchestra and so much to put into it. Sometimes it sweeps into a long, undulatory movement, sometimes it shrinks to a pulsation so minute as to be scarcely visible as a beat at all. And as has already been said, he conducts without notes, without even the form of a music stand before him, and with the plainest proof that the score as a whole, and in every slightest detail, is entirely within the domination of his memory—an astonishing feat, but one that has its sole purpose in utility rather than in effect, for it gives an unlimited freedom and power of control to the conductor that is equal to it.

The programme set down for last evening was undoubtedly something of a disappointment to many musical people. It had nothing that might not have been quite familiar to even a slight musical experience; it was concerned solely with the strictly melodious, with the lighter mood of the romantic schools of music; and it left unrepresented some of the weightier matters that many would gladly have had given a place. But those who came with that feeling must have gone away with fully as deep a conviction of Mr. Nikisch's power as anything he could have done would have given them. He filled the performance of this sunny and brilliantly melodious programme with some of the highest qualities of orchestral playing and great interpretation, as surely as though his material had been the stormiest passion that ever was put into music. Yet there was but little of that aggressively modern spirit in its more obvious manifestations that has marked his conducting so far in Boston. Thoroughly modern. Mr. Nikisch's readings certainly were in their wealth and variety of dynamic effect, in their marvellous elaboration of the most subtle melodic and rythmic qualities dwelling in every great composition — the bringing out of every slightest phase that contributes to the meaning of the whole, — in the blazing splendor, the inimitable richness of the tonal quality he secures, in the virility and vigor and solidity imparted by his ringing use of the brass. But there was less evident, because there was less occasion for it, that remarkable freedom in the tempo which Mr. Nikisch in his opening Boston concert used so strikingly in connection with these other orchestral resources, to secure emotional intensity, or strong dramatic effect. Yet there were a few passages notably inspired and quickened with a new meaning in this respect. There was evident, however, a larger freedom granted the orchestra, and an increased spirit, a warmer sentiment in its playing resulting therefrom. Greater technical perfection, more absolute accuracy in attack and polish in enunciation than the Boston orchestra has attained in past years there could not well be. Mr. Nikisch certainly has the great advantage of taking this remarkable body of men delivered over to him in the very acme of their perfect form, and of moulding them to suit the deeper musical purpose and intellectuality with which his work is inspired.

Both the Euryanthe overture and the first movement of the symphony were taken at an extraordinarily rapid rate, and both were given a much more characteristic representation thereby, than they usually receive. In the former the vigor of the trombones and of the kettle drums was particularly notable in comparison with a recent performance of the same piece here, and the whole performance illustrated the advantage that Mr. Nikisch's conception has over perfunctory technical conducting in picturesqueness and force. Never could the poetry of Schubert have a tenderer setting forth than it received in the Rosamunde ballet music, which was played with a grace and charm which were wholly in keeping and which obtained much of their individuality from the delightful work of the exceptionally fine artists upon the flute, oboe and clarinet in the orchestra.

The symphony may truly be said to have offered a surprise to most of those present in the attractiveness and real charm that it had under Mr. Nikisch's hand. Without a single idea of deep feeling, or of aught but gayety with a brief interruption of gentle reverie, it, nevertheless, was given a splendid vigor, a dazzling and many-sided brilliancy that touched the hearer at many new points. Of great effect were the almost imperceptible retarding of the rapid first movement at the organ point on C sharp, after the repeat, and just before the close, allowing a slight but potent acceleration at the very end. In the scherzo, more than a passing word of praise ought to be given to the playing by the horns and bassoons of the brief passage allotted to them alone, which was as exquisite in tone as it was musical in phrasing. Worthy of all praise was the clearness of the rushing last movement, in which the crisp and vigorous notes of the brass were given a distinctly invigorating power in fixing the character of the movement.

Mr. Emil Fischer was the soloist. His powerful bass voice was given a test of flexibility in the exceedingly uninteresting bravura aria he chose from the opera of "Jean de Paris," that never again will be ranked with living and vital works. In Schubert's great song he put his powers to much better use, and discovered the dramatic power and tragic sentiment of it with an abundance of insight and real sympathy. The Graben-Hoffmann song got him back for an encore, for which he gave a beautiful song of Lassen's. There was a singular unevenness in Mr. Fischer's vocal doings last evening; his voice is of beautiful richness and quality, but though ordinarily he phrases with [illegible] artistic appreciation, there will [illegible] be a passage where he quite fails to put the right touch. But his was a performance that can very rarely be [illegible] in the range and strong effective

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, AT 8.

October 23d, November 20th, January 1st, and January 29th.

PROGRAMME

Subscription now open at the warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the four Concerts, $4.00. Subscription closes Thursday evening, October 17th. Tickets delivered, to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, on Friday and Saturday, October 18th and 19th.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

n so complementin. another, Mr.
ch was tonight a strikingly characteristic
n. His unique treatment of the Coriolan ure and the symphony reminded me of act that though Chopin could hardly nize his own music when played by
, it was often thought by friends of the musicians that it was more enjoyable than when played by Chopin self. It would seem that in one matter of strikingly origireadings of standard works, for ch readings Mr. Nikisch is already cele-ated, he is a strangely consistent person to ll this peculiar position of musical omnipoce which Mr. Higginson has created.
s Hungarian (and that Mr. Nikisch is a ngarian explains much that we see and ve heard of him), with his surprising reads of this evening's music, promises fund interest and curiosity this winter, second y to that of the music itself. I must nfess to great enjoyment, as well as sur-ise, from much that I heard toght, and to great admiration for the anagement of many details—the close t the Coriolan overture, for instance, was omething amazing in the beauty of its coneption and the refinement of its execution, hile the treatment of the episode between he scherzo and the finale of the symphony s truly wonderful. No fear that the orchesthat is brought to do such work can deriorate. Quite the contrary.

The order of the pieces on the programme as as unique and unconventional as the perormance, but after hearing the concert I hould not know how to improve that order.

If Mr. Nikisch can better control his orches-ra by using no notes himself, I suppose I ought to be contented, but I certainly as much prefer to see the score of a symphony under a conductor's eye during a performance, as I do to see the Bible under the eye of a clergyman while a psalm of David is being spoken. I cannot doubt that a man of luminous talent and ability has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's orchestra.
Surely we shall have a winter of great musical excitement and interest at his hands.

B. J. LANG.

PROF. PAINE'S PRAISE.

Prof. John K. Paine was seen by a HERALD representative at the close of the concert, and was enthusiastic over the fine work of Mr. Nikisch as conductor, and said:

"I find that Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fire and fine expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. Above all, he gives the orchestral instruments full freedom, especially the brass. They are not restrained, as with the previous conductor, but the orchestra can appear in its full glory. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

"What have you to say, professor, as to the make-up and arrangement of the programme? Do you think that the symphony should come first, last or in the middle?"

"In regard to the latter question, I think no strict rule can be laid down. It depends on the combination of pieces. The symphony may sometimes appear better at the last, but a new work oftener appears to advantage portion so complementin. another, Mr.

Nikisch was tonight a strikingly characteristic person. His unique treatment of the Coriolan overture and the symphony reminded me of the fact that though Chopin could hardly recognize his own music when played by Liszt, it was often thought by friends of the two musicians that it was more enjoyable thus than when played by Chopin himself. It would seem that in this one matter of strikingly original readings of standard works, for which readings Mr. Nikisch is already celebrated, he is a strangely consistent person to fill this peculiar position of musical omnipo-tence which Mr. Higginson has created.
This Hungarian (and that Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian explains much that we see and have heard of him), with his surprising readings of this evening's music, promises fund for interest and curiosity this winter, second only to that of the music itself. I must confess to great enjoyment, as well as surprise, from much that I heard tonight, and to great admiration for the management of many details—the close of the Coriolan overture, for instance, was something amazing in the beauty of its conception and the refinement of its execution, while the treatment of the episode between the scherzo and the finale of the symphony was truly wonderful. No fear that the orchestra that is brought to do such work can deteriorate. Quite the contrary.

The order of the pieces on the programme was as unique and unconventional as the performance, but after hearing the concert I should not know how to improve that order.

If Mr. Nikisch can better control his orchestra by using no notes himself, I suppose I ought to be contented, but I certainly as much prefer to see the score of a symphony under a conductor's eye during a performance, as I do to see the Bible under the eye of a clergyman while a psalm of David is being spoken. I cannot doubt that a man of luminous talent and ability has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's orchestra.
Surely we shall have a winter of great musical excitement and interest at his hands.

B. J. LANG.

PROF. PAINE'S PRAISE.

Prof. John K. Paine was seen by a HERALD representative at the close of the concert, and was enthusiastic over the fine work of Mr. Nikisch as conductor, and said:

"I find that Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fire and fine expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. Above all, he gives the orchestral instruments full freedom, especially the brass. They are not restrained, as with the previous conductor, but the orchestra can appear in its full glory. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

"What have you to say, professor, as to the make-up and arrangement of the programme? Do you think that the symphony should come first, last or in the middle?"

"In regard to the latter question, I think no strict rule can be laid down. It depends on the combination of pieces. The symphony may sometimes appear better at the last, but a new work oftener appears to advantage

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, OCT. 24, 1889

A SUCCESSFUL CONCERT

Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence.

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 23.—[SPECIAL.]—The first of a series of four subscription concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given tonight before a large and representative audience, the programme being as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Seneschal's aria from "Jean de Paris".....Boieldieu
Mr. Fischer.
Entr'acte music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Songs with piano—
a. "Der Wanderer".....Schubert
b. "Der Schöuste Engel".....Graben-Hoffmann
Mr. Fischer.
Symphony in A major ("Italian").....Mendelssohn

The acoustics of the hall are not entirely satisfactory, and although some of the pianissimo passages came out clearer than in our Music Hall, the more marked fortissimo, sounded a little coarse in places. On the other hand, Mr. Fischer was heard to greater advantage than in Boston. The fault seems to be that the hall is too long and broad for its height. The overture was superbly played, and here again Mr. Nikisch gave evidence of the immensely artistic power of his own individuality, as the interpretation was a considerable departure from the ordinary "traditions," and it may be unhesitatingly stated that his reading is an improvement upon these same mysterious and indefinable "traditions," which, after all, are generally matter of habit arising usually from laziness and lack of originality, or, more properly speaking, individuality on the part of most conductors. The "Rosamunde" music was played with the same infinite charm and delicacy which characterized its performance at the first concert in Boston. Mr. Fischer, although apparently suffering from a slight cold, sang in admirable fashion, and was loudly applauded both after the aria and the songs. The difficult colorateur passages of the former were overcome with perfect ease, and the latter were rendered with beautiful artistic feeling and finish. As an encore he sang the well-known "Es War ein Traum," by Lassen. The piano accompaniments to the songs were admirably played by Mr. Max Zach of the orchestra, who possesses in a high degree the peculiar artistic qualities necessary to the accompanist.

As was right and proper, the climax of the programme was reached in the symphony, which was magnificently played, and it was magnificently right! The peculiar characteristics of Mendelssohn's musical soul are like second nature to Mr. Nikisch, it would seem. He read the whole work, and particularly the two middle movements (andante con moto and con moto moderato) in a wonderfully romantic and picturesque manner—and the pronounced southern coloring was evidently and properly accentuated. With each hearing the great humanity of our new conductor's work becomes more apparent, and tonight his great personal magnetism made itself felt here quite as strongly as in Boston. No one can help having the most absolute conviction that Arthur Nikisch is a true, genuine musician to the bottom of his soul, and his continued success is certain. At all events, the "out-of-town" season has opened under quite as auspicious circumstances as did the home concerts, and there is every probability that in their turn, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and all the other cities on the orchestra's list will be added to the category of Mr. Nikisch's conquests.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24.

NIKISCH AT PROVIDENCE.

First of a Series of Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, Oct. 23.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, gave the first of a series of four concerts in Infantry Hall this evening. The audience, which was an exceptionally large one, was composed of the best known society people here.

The programme was as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber: entr'acte music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A.

Emil Fischer was the soloist of the evening, and rendered Seneschal's aria from "Jean de Paris," with orchestral accompaniment, and Schubert's "The Wanderer" and "Schonste Engel" by Graben-Hofman, with piano accompaniment by Max Zach.

The appearance of Herr Nikisch was the signal for a burst of applause which lasted some moments, and was repeated again and again at the end of each number.

The performance was an unqualified success, and the orchestra never played better.

The next concert takes place Nov. 20, and the sale of season tickets is much greater than in years past.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL [8]

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1889.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The First of the Series at Infantry Hall Last Night.

The good sized audience that gathered in Infantry Hall last evening to hear the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed that the extraordinary interest aroused in Boston by the new conductor and the work of the orchestra under him was largely shared by the musical people of Providence. It was distinctly gratifying that so excellent an audience should have appeared to do honor to Mr. Nikisch, for last evening was the first time that he has given a performance in this country in any city outside of Boston.

The programme of last evening's concert was as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Aria from "Jean de Paris".....Boieldieu
MR. EMIL FISCHER.
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Songs with Piano { (a) "Der Wanderer".....Schubert
(b) "Schoenste Engel".....Graben-Hoffmann }
MR. EMIL FISCHER.
Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn

Mr. Nikisch's presence confirmed for those at the concert the account already given in these columns of his appearance and manner. He revealed himself as a young man of short stature and slight figure, with the finely cut features of an artist, to which latter is given a certain pallor by his jet black hair and pointed beard. He mounts an extraordinarily high platform to conduct and overtops his men by almost his whole height. His manner is extremely composed, direct and concentrated, and is all for his orchestra with nothing for his audience. His beat is generally short and sharp, always instinct with decision, and extraordinarily simple for a conductor who has so much to bring out of his orchestra and so much to put into it. Sometimes it sweeps into a long, undulatory movement, sometimes it shrinks to a pulsation so minute as to be scarcely visible as a beat at all. And as has already been said, he conducts without notes, without even the form of a music stand before him, and with the plainest proof that the score as a whole, and in every slightest detail, is entirely within the domination of his memory—an astonishing feat, but one that has its sole purpose in utility rather than in effect, for it gives an unlimited freedom and power of control to the conductor that is equal to it.

The programme set down for last evening was undoubtedly something of a disappointment to many musical people. It had nothing that might not have been quite familiar to even a slight musical experience; it was concerned solely with the strictly melodious, with the lighter mood of the romantic schools of music; and it left unrepresented some of the weightier matters that many would gladly have had given a place. But those who came with that feeling must have gone away with fully as deep a conviction of Mr. Nikisch's power as anything he could have done would have given them. He filled the performance of this sunny and brilliantly melodious programme with some of the highest qualities of orchestral playing and great interpretation, as surely as though his material had been the stormiest passion that ever was put into music. Yet there was but little of that aggressively modern spirit in its more obvious manifestations that has marked his conducting so far in Boston. Thoroughly modern. Mr. Nikisch's readings certainly were in their wealth and variety of dynamic effect, in their marvellous elaboration of the most subtle melodic and rythmic qualities dwelling in every great composition — the bringing out of every slightest phase that contributes to the meaning of the whole, — in the blazing splendor, the inimitable richness of the tonal quality he secures, in the virility and vigor and solidity imparted by his ringing use of the brass. But there was less evident, because there was less occasion for it, that remarkable freedom in the tempo which Mr. Nikisch in his opening Boston concert used so strikingly in connection with these other orchestral resources, to secure emotional intensity, or strong dramatic effect. Yet there were a few passages notably inspired and quickened with a new meaning in this respect. There was evident, however, a larger freedom granted the orchestra, and an increased spirit, a warmer sentiment in its playing resulting therefrom. Greater technical perfection, more absolute accuracy in attack and polish in enunciation than the Boston orchestra has attained in past years there could not well be. Mr. Nikisch certainly has the great advantage of taking this remarkable body of men delivered over to him in the very acme of their perfect form, and of moulding them to suit the deeper musical purpose and intellectuality with which his work is inspired.

Both the Euryanthe overture and the first movement of the symphony were taken at an extraordinarily rapid rate, and both were given a much more characteristic representation thereby, than they usually receive. In the former the vigor of the trombones and of the kettle drums was particularly notable in comparison with a recent performance of the same piece here, and the whole performance illustrated the advantage that Mr. Nikisch's conception has over perfunctory technical conducting in picturesqueness and force. Never could the poetry of Schubert have a tenderer setting forth than it received in the Rosamunde ballet music, which was played with a grace and charm which were wholly in keeping and which obtained much of their individuality from the delightful work of the exceptionally fine artists upon the flute, oboe and clarinet in the orchestra.

The symphony may truly be said to have offered a surprise to most of those present in the attractiveness and real charm that it had under Mr. Nikisch's hand. Without a single idea of deep feeling, or of aught but gayety with a brief interruption of gentle reverie, it, nevertheless, was given a splendid vigor, a dazzling and many-sided brilliancy that touched the hearer at many new points. Of great effect were the almost imperceptible retarding of the rapid first movement at the organ point on C sharp, after the repeat, and just before the close, allowing a slight but potent acceleration at the very end. In the scherzo, more than a passing word of praise ought to be given to the playing by the horns and bassoons of the brief passage allotted to them alone, which was as exquisite in tone as it was musical in phrasing. Worthy of all praise was the clearness of the rushing last movement, in which the crisp and vigorous notes of the brass were given a distinctly invigorating power in fixing the character of the movement.

Mr. Emil Fischer was the soloist. His powerful bass voice was given a test of flexibility in the exceedingly uninteresting bravura aria he chose from the opera of "Jean de Paris," that never again will be ranked with living and vital works. In Schubert's great song he put his powers to much better use, and discovered the dramatic power and tragic sentiment of it with an abundance of insight and real sympathy. The Graben-Hoffmann song got him back for an encore, for which he gave a beautiful song of Lassen's. There was a singular unevenness in Mr. Fischer's vocal doings last evening; his voice is of beautiful richness and quality, but though ordinarily he phrases with [illegible] artistic appreciation, there will occasionally be a passage where he quite fails to put the right touch. But his was a performance that can very rarely be equalled in the range and strong effective-

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1889.

Mr. Nikisch only confirmed the favorable impression formed of him on first hearing, at the second symphony concert last Saturday evening, in Boston. His reading of the seventh symphony of Beethoven is highly praised by the local critics. Mr. Hekking, the new 'cellist, also came in for a share of approbation for his finished performance of the Golterman concerto.

PROVIDENCE CONCERTS

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with assistance of

MISS LOUISE MEISLINGER,

of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York,

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,

the distinguished young Pianiste, and others to be announced.

INFANTRY HALL,

1889-90.

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, NOV'R 20, JAN'Y 1, AND JAN'Y 30,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

No efforts will be spared to make these Concerts the leading musical events of the season. The performances will be of the same excellence as those in Boston, where hundreds have been turned away from each concert thus far given this season.

Analytical programmes in book form, similar to those used at the London Philharmonic Concerts, will be issued and mailed to subscribers in advance of each concert.

To enable a larger number to avail themselves of the advantages offered to Season Ticket holders, subscriptions will be received for a short time at the Warerooms of Mess. M. Steinert & Sons and Season Tickets issued for the remaining three Concerts at $3 each.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 26, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For the majority of auditors the chief element of interest in tonight's concert will be—as it was at the rehearsal of yesterday afternoon—the performance by Mr. Baermann of Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, being that in E-flat, his last and greatest. The rare appearances of this fine artist have peculiar value in more ways than one; beside the mere comfort and pleasure they give in their assurance of a true playing of something chosen from the best in music, they are helpful and instructive. They teach how to give thought to its proper exposition, feeling its just weight, and form its correct proportion; they show how to subordinate one's own powers to an author's purposes, and to be content even to have one's own accomplishments in art underrated, if only the meaning and expression of a composition can be seen and felt directly and fully. They show what to emulate and what to avoid in personal manner and professional style, and they give encouragement to modest and sincere workers that what they do faithfully and well will be appreciated and desired even though no clamor of popularity and notoriety follow them. We hold Mr. Baermann to be the most satisfactory and the best of the pianists who are to be heard in this country, because to a strong, supple and sometimes splendid technique he adds the culture of a man whose interest and knowledge are not limited to his own profession, the intellectual discrimination of the scholar and the docent, and the enthusiasm of the artist. We have no comparisons to make, and we know the many high qualities of other pianists; but in none do we find so well blended as in Mr. Baermann the exact expression of sense, the regard for rhythm, the gradation of color and force and the deep art feeling which are all needed for the highest expositors of great music. Especially in Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Liszt have we enjoyed his playiug, and we found ever new illustrations of his insight, his sympathy and his successful transference of the author's ideas to the listener's mind in his yesterday afternoon rendering of this concerto, which he has already played twice before to Symphony audiences. The perfect lucidity and delicacy of the allegro, the tenderness of the adagio, and the buoyancy of the rondo were alike admirable and were received with great applause by an enormous audience. A strong and dramatic reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, kept quite close to the standard interpretation, began the concert. The third place was occupied,—not by the unfinished Schubert symphony, as proposed,—but by the "Kamarins-kaja" of Elinka, once played at a "Popular" by Mr. Gericke, but now first placed in a Symphony programme; the reading was picturesque and romantic, the quaint irregular accent and the wandering flights of the themes being skilfully marked; one passage also gave a capital opportunity for the delicious tone and free execution of the new first clarinet to be well noticed. The last place was assigned to Mendelssohn's "Indian" symphony, which we could not delay to hear. On Saturday next, Mr. Emil Fischer will sing twice, and the orchestra will play the "Euryanthe" overture, two MS. "Episodes" by Arthur Bird (their first hearing) and Valkmann's B-flat symphony.

On Thursday evening the orchestra will give the first concert of five at the Sanders Theatre. The programme has not been given out yet, but it is known that Mrs. Moore-Lawson, a very delightful soprano, will sing. The orchestra sounds superbly in this amphitheatre and the music-lover will be well repaid for a trip thither to hear it.

SUNDAY [illegible]

BOSTON, OCTOBER 27, 1889

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert---Carl Baermann, Soloist.

The third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, when Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and the several numbers were as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.....Beethoven
Fantasie for orchestra, "Komarinskaja".....Glinka
Symphony in A, "Italian".....Mendelssohn

Although such programmes as this are not altogether satisfactory after a five-years' experience with similar selections in these concerts, there can be little but praise given in commenting upon its performance. Mr. Nikisch certainly gave to these familiar compositions a freshness and interest seldom realized in their earlier productions here, and this fact made the concert a source of enjoyment, despite the lack of skill shown in choosing its selections. The change made from the original list of works announced, by which the Glinka fantasie was substituted for the unfinished symphony by Schubert, may be taken as an evidence of a desire on the new conductor's part to meet the reasonable demands of his audiences, and the next programme in this series gives further evidence of this intention on the part of Mr. Nikisch. The reading given the symphony more fully realized all its romantic beauty than any heard here in recent years, and the interpretation of the andante movement was almost a revelation. Throughout the entire composition the exquisite tone coloring of the orchestration was brought out with thoroughly delightful effect, and the artistic nature of the conductor was shown in all the admirable work done under his baton. The familiar "Egmont" overture was played with equal success, and the virile quality of the tone of the strings in this number again illustrated the greater freedom given the men under the new regime. The Glinka fantasie was played in a way that gave its ever varying contrasts with striking effect, and the odd conceits of quaint Russian folk songs were finely shown in the performance. The soloist of the evening, Mr. Carl Baermann, needs no added words of commendation in these columns. Always a favorite with Boston audiences since he established his residence here, he had a most hearty welcome upon his entrance, and again repeated his great success in the Beethoven concerto, which he has played so satisfactorily in earlier seasons. The charm of his playing in this great composition swayed the audience and held its attention to the last, and then the applause which rewarded the player made a fit tribute to his attainments as a pianist. It is seldom that so good a reading of the orchestral score of the concerto has been heard here, and the enjoyment attending this number was greatly enhanced by the ability of Mr. Nikish as shown in this portion of the programme. The soloist at the next concert will be Mr. Emil Fischer, basso, and the programme will include Weber's overture, "Euryanthe"; Weber's Lysiart's air from "Euryanthe"; Arthur Bird's two episodes for orchestra (MS.) (a) "Oriental Scene," (b) "Intermezzo"; songs with pianoforte, and Volkmann's symphony in B flat.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5, Beethoven; "Komarinskaja" Fantasie on two Russian folk songs, for orchestra, by Glinka, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. The reading accorded the "Egmont" overture would have been unexceptionable, had it not been for the liberties taken with the tempo here and there, which interfered with the strong current of the music, and interrupted its course for the mere production of a sugary effect. The opening was given with splendid vigor, and there was a fine dignity in the interpretation generally save when Mr. Nikisch indulged his propensity for "showing up" whenever a bit of flowing melody appears. The work of the orchestra was, on the whole, the best it has done this season so far, and this excellence was maintained through the Mendelssohn symphony, which was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch from beginning to end, and with an utter absence of that capriciousness in respect to varying the time which he has manifested in his other readings of symphonies. The opening movement was taken somewhat faster, and the minuet somewhat slower than usual, but with an effect with which no fault is to be found in view of the fact that it did no violence to the innate character of the music. The Glinka fantasie, which had been heard here before at one of the Popular Concerts of last season, has a delightfully quaint originality in melody, rhythm, harmonies and orchestral effect. Mr. Nikisch's treatment of this selection was full of character, and it would be difficult to conceive a more sympathetic or more appropriate reading than he accorded it. The lack of space at our command prevents a more detailed account of the performances, but it may be said in brief, that both Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra showed a marked advance over their efforts in the two preceding concerts. The soloist was Carl Baermann, whose performance of the noble concerto is in need of no fresh laudation; nor is it necessary to add that it was both read and played in the purest artistic taste, with a masterly command of refined technique, and an enthusiasm and a sympathetic sentiment that felt every shade of meaning in the work. The performance was rewarded with a storm of applause, and the artist was twice recalled with immense fervor. At the next concert will be played Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," two Episodes for orchestra, by Arthur Bird (first time) and Volkmann's Symphony in B-flat. Mr. Emil Fischer is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from "Euryanthe" and a group of songs.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 28, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Carl Baermann was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, giving Beethoven's Imperial Concerto in E flat. Mr. Baermann is always cordially received by Music Hall audiences, and his appearances are not so frequent as to cause any diminution in the cordiality. A great concerto for the piano in his hands becomes a thing of much interest, and he was doubtless responsible for a share of the standees who completely filled the hall. Mr. Baermann's work is always that of an artist, yet this concerto, which had been often given at the Symphony concerts, and by him as well, seemed to take on new beauty Saturday evening. The clear and admirable technique of Mr. Baermann, the expressive shading, the rich and beautiful accompaniment of the orchestra, all contributed to an ensemble that was all that the most ultra-musical could wish.

For the orchestral work a change had been made, and for the intermediate number a bridal song and dance by Glinka, one of the earliest Russian composers of note, was given. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony were the other numbers.

The fact that scarcely a person left the hall until the close of the symphony, and the concert was long, is evidence that the work of Mr. Nikisch is of sufficient attraction to keep even the standees in their places. The beautiful andante of the symphony as well as the closing movement were specimens of the rare gift of the conductor, and the overture and selection from Glinka were given with all the characteristic shading which has come to be looked for as a matter of course. Next week we are to have Weber and a symphony by Volkmann, with selections from Arthur Bird (manuscript), for the first time in Boston. Mr. Emil Fischer of New York will sing.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartet, composed of the same artists as last year with the exception of Mr. Hekking, 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Giese, gave the first concert of its fifth season in Chickering Hall, Monday night. The programme was:

Quartet in E Minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs—
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F Major, op. 88.....Brahms

Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson was the singer. Mr. Max Zach played the second viola in the quintet.

Volkmann's quartet, played for the second time in these concerts, is one of those works that can always be heard with sincere and lively pleasure. It is bright and interesting from first to last, and more than once agreeably reminds one of Mozart in its graceful and elegant simplicity and easy flow. It was played to perfection, and Mr. Hekking's beautifully pure, sweet and even tone contributed exquisitely to the ensemble in the excellence of its blending and sustaining quality. Brahms's quintet was given by the club in its completeness for the first time, the third and last movement being added, bringing the work to a brilliant close. It need hardly be said that the whole was given most carefully and superbly, and that its many difficulties were most triumphantly overcome. Its beauties, indeed, as well as the frequent strangeness of its modulations and confusion of rhythms, its learning and highly wrought workmanship, were set in the clearest possible lights, all of which excellence found deep appreciation and due desert in long-continued applause at the end. Indeed, the playing of this justly admired quartet has never been smoother, more brilliant nor more finished, and the continued regard in which they are held was seen in the large and intelligent audience of musically disposed subscribers. Mrs. Lawson, whose singing made such a good impression at the Worcester Festival, was heard in Boston for the first time. Presser's song was by no means a suitable choice for the occasion, and she did her powers little justice in it, but in the charming song by Schumann and in that by Wolff she proved herself a pleasing and capable singer, possessing a voice of good range and quality as well as taste and intelligence. Her accompaniments were played by Mr. Arthur Foote in his usual musicianly and graceful manner.

of some previous performances here.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1889.

Mr. Nikisch only confirmed the favorable impression formed of him on first hearing, at the second symphony concert last Saturday evening, in Boston. His reading of the seventh symphony of Beethoven is highly praised by the local critics. Mr. Hekking, the new 'cellist, also came in for a share of approbation for his finished performance of the Golterman concerto.

PROVIDENCE CONCERTS

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with assistance of

MISS LOUISE MEISLINGER,

the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York,

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,

the Distinguished Young Pianiste, with others to be announced.

INFANTRY HALL,

1889-90.

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, NOV'R 20, JAN'Y 1, AND JAN'Y 29
AT 8 O'CLOCK.

Now [illegible] to make [illegible] as the [illegible] is tested, [illegible] concert thus far given this season.

Avail'l programmes in book form, similar [illegible] at the [illegible]

[illegible] Concerts will be [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] of some previous performances here.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 26, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For the majority of auditors the chief element of interest in tonight's concert will be—as it was at the rehearsal of yesterday afternoon—the performance by Mr. Baermann of Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, being that in E-flat, his last and greatest. The rare appearances of this fine artist have peculiar value in more ways than one; beside the mere comfort and pleasure they give in their assurance of a true playing of something chosen from the best in music, they are helpful and instructive. They teach how to give thought to its proper exposition, feeling its just weight, and form its correct proportion; they show how to subordinate one's own powers to an author's purposes, and to be content even to have one's own accomplishments in art underrated, if only the meaning and expression of a composition can be seen and felt directly and fully. They show what to emulate and what to avoid in personal manner and professional style, and they give encouragement to modest and sincere workers that what they do faithfully and well will be appreciated and desired even though no clamor of popularity and notoriety follow them. We hold Mr. Baermann to be the most satisfactory and the best of the pianists who are to be heard in this country, because to a strong, supple and sometimes splendid technique he adds the culture of a man whose interest and knowledge are not limited to his own profession, the intellectual discrimination of the scholar and the docent, and the enthusiasm of the artist. We have no comparisons to make, and we know the many high qualities of other pianists; but in none do we find so well blended as in Mr. Baermann the exact expression of sense, the regard for rhythm, the gradation of color and force and the deep art feeling which are all needed for the highest expositors of great music. Especially in Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Liszt have we enjoyed his playiug, and we found ever new illustrations of his insight, his sympathy and his successful transference of the author's ideas to the listener's mind in his yesterday afternoon rendering of this concerto, which he has already played twice before to Symphony audiences. The perfect lucidity and delicacy of the allegro, the tenderness of the adagio, and the buoyancy of the rondo were alike admirable and were received with great applause by an enormous audience. A strong and dramatic reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, kept quite close to the standard interpretation, began the concert. The third place was occupied,—not by the unfinished Schubert symphony, as proposed,—but by the "Ka narins-kaja" of Elinka, once played at a "Popular" by Mr. Gericke, but now first placed in a Symphony programme; the reading was picturesque and romantic, the quaint irregular accent and the wandering flights of the themes being skilfully marked; one passage also gave a capital opportunity for the delicious tone and free execution of the new first clarinet to be well noticed. The last place was assigned to Mendelssohn's "Indian" symphony, which we could not delay to hear. On Saturday next, Mr. Emil Fischer will sing twice, and the orchestra will play the "Euryanthe" overture, two MS. "Episodes" by Arthur Bird (their first hearing) and Valkmann's B-flat symphony.

On Thursday evening the orchestra will give the first concert of five at the Sanders Theatre. The programme has not been given out yet, but it is known that Mrs. Moore-Lawson, a very delightful soprano, will sing. The orchestra sounds superbly in this amphitheatre and the music-lover will be well repaid for a trip thither to hear it.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert---Carl Baermann, Soloist.

The third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, when Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and the several numbers were as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.....Beethoven
Fantasie for orchestra, "Komarinskaja".....Glinka
Symphony in A, "Italian".....Mendelssohn

Although such programmes as this are not altogether satisfactory after a five-years' experience with similar selections in these concerts, there can be little but praise given in commenting upon its performance. Mr. Nikisch certainly gave to these familiar compositions a freshness and interest seldom realized in their earlier productions here, and this fact made the concert a source of enjoyment, despite the lack of skill shown in choosing its selections. The change made from the original list of works announced, by which the Glinka fantasie was substituted for the unfinished symphony by Schubert, may be taken as an evidence of a desire on the new conductor's part to meet the reasonable demands of his audiences, and the next programme in this series gives further evidence of this intention on the part of Mr. Nikisch. The reading given the symphony more fully realized all its romantic beauty than any heard here in recent years, and the interpretation of the andante movement was almost a revelation. Throughout the entire composition the exquisite tone coloring of the orchestration was brought out with thoroughly delightful effect, and the artistic nature of the conductor was shown in all the admirable work done under his baton. The familiar "Egmont" overture was played with equal success, and the virile quality of the tone of the strings in this number again illustrated the greater freedom given the men under the new regime. The Glinka fantasie was played in a way that gave its ever varying contrasts with striking effect, and the odd conceits of quaint Russian folk songs were finely shown in the performance. The soloist of the evening, Mr. Carl Baermann, needs no added words of commendation in these columns. Always a favorite with Boston audiences since he established his residence here, he had a most hearty welcome upon his entrance, and again repeated his great success in the Beethoven concerto, which he has played so satisfactorily in earlier seasons. The charm of his playing in this great composition swayed the audience and held its attention to the last, and then the applause which rewarded the player made a fit tribute to his attainments as a pianist. It is seldom that so good a reading of the orchestral score of the concerto has been heard here, and the enjoyment attending this number was greatly enhanced by the ability of Mr. Nikish as shown in this portion of the programme. The soloist at the next concert will be Mr. Emil Fischer, basso, and the programme will include Weber's overture, "Euryanthe"; Weber's Lysiart's air from "Euryanthe"; Arthur Bird's two episodes for orchestra (M. S.) (a) "Oriental Scene," (b) "Intermezzo"; songs with pianoforte, and Volkmann's symphony in B flat.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5, Beethoven; "Komarinskaja" Fantasie on two Russian folk songs, for orchestra, by Glinka, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. The reading accorded the "Egmont" overture would have been unexceptionable, had it not been for the liberties taken with the tempo here and there, which interfered with the strong current of the music, and interrupted its course for the mere production of a sugary effect. The opening was given with splendid vigor, and there was a fine dignity in the interpretation generally save when Mr. Nikisch indulged his propensity for "showing up" whenever a bit of flowing melody appears. The work of the orchestra was, on the whole, the best it has done this season so far, and this excellence was maintained through the Mendelssohn symphony, which was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch from beginning to end, and with an utter absence of that capriciousness in respect to varying the time which he has manifested in his other readings of symphonies. The opening movement was taken somewhat faster, and the minuet somewhat slower than usual, but with an effect with which no fault is to be found in view of the fact that it did no violence to the innate character of the music. The Glinka fantasie, which had been heard here before at one of the Popular Concerts of last season, has a delightfully quaint originality in melody, rhythm, harmonies and orchestral effect. Mr. Nikisch's treatment of this selection was full of character, and it would be difficult to conceive a more sympathetic or more appropriate reading than he accorded it. The lack of space at our command prevents a more detailed account of the performances, but it may be said in brief, that both Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra showed a marked advance over their efforts in the two preceding concerts. The soloist was Carl Baermann, whose performance of the noble concerto is in need of no fresh laudation; nor is it necessary to add that it was both read and played in the purest artistic taste, with a masterly command of refined technique, and an enthusiasm and a sympathetic sentiment that felt every shade of meaning in the work. The performance was rewarded with a storm of applause, and the artist was twice recalled with immense fervor. At the next concert will be played Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," two Episodes for orchestra, by Arthur Bird (first time) and Volkmann's Symphony in B-flat. Mr. Emil Fischer is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from "Euryanthe" and a group of songs.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 28, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Carl Baermann was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, giving Beethoven's Imperial Concerto in E flat. Mr. Baermann is always cordially received by Music Hall audiences, and his appearances are not so frequent as to cause any diminution in the cordiality. A great concerto for the piano in his hands becomes a thing of much interest, and he was doubtless responsible for a share of the standees who completely filled the hall. Mr. Baermann's work is always that of an artist, yet this concerto, which had been often given at the Symphony concerts, and by him as well, seemed to take on new beauty Saturday evening. The clear and admirable technique of Mr. Baermann, the expressive shading, the rich and beautiful accompaniment of the orchestra, all contributed to an ensemble that was all that the most ultra-musical could wish.

For the orchestral work a change had been made, and for the intermediate number a bridal song and dance by Glinka, one of the earliest Russian composers of note, was given. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony were the other numbers.

The fact that scarcely a person left the hall until the close of the symphony, and the concert was long, is evidence that the work of Mr. Nikisch is of sufficient attraction to keep even the standees in their places. The beautiful andante of the symphony as well as the closing movement were specimens of the rare gift of the conductor, and the overture and selection from Glinka were given with all the characteristic shading which has come to be looked for as a matter of course. Next week we are to have Weber and a symphony by Volkmann, with selections from Arthur Bird (manuscript), for the first time in Boston. Mr. Emil Fischer of New York will sing.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartet, composed of the same artists as last year with the exception of Mr. Hekking, 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Giese, gave the first concert of its fifth season in Chickering Hall, Monday night. The programme was:

Quartet in E Minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs—
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F Major, op. 88.....Brahms

Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson was the singer. Mr. Max Zach played the second viola in the quintet. Volkmann's quartet, played for the second time in these concerts, is one of those works that can always be heard with sincere and lively pleasure. It is bright and interesting from first to last, and more than once agreeably reminds one of Mozart in its graceful and elegant simplicity and easy flow. It was played to perfection, and Mr. Hekking's beautifully pure, sweet and even tone contributed exquisitely to the ensemble in the excellence of its blending and sustaining quality. Brahms's quintet was given by the club in its completeness for the first time, the third and last movement being added, bringing the work to a brilliant close. It need hardly be said that the whole was given most carefully and superbly, and that its many difficulties were most triumphantly overcome. Its beauties, indeed, as well as the frequent strangeness of its modulations and confusion of rhythms, its learning and highly wrought workmanship, were set in the clearest possible lights, all of which excellence found deep appreciation and due desert in long-continued applause at the end. Indeed, the playing of this justly admired quartet has never been smoother, more brilliant nor more finished, and the continued regard in which they are held was seen in the large and intelligent audience of musically disposed subscribers. Mrs. Lawson, whose singing made such a good impression at the Worcester Festival, was heard in Boston for the first time. Presser's song was by no means a suitable choice for the occasion, and she did her powers little justice in it, but in the charming song by Schumann and in that by Wolff she proved herself a pleasing and capable singer, possessing a voice of good range and quality as well as taste and intelligence. Her accompaniments were played by Mr. Arthur Foote in his usual musicianly and graceful manner.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1889.

Mr. Nikisch only confirmed the favorable impression formed of him on first hearing, at the second symphony concert last Saturday evening, in Boston. His reading of the seventh symphony of Beethoven is highly praised by the local critics. Mr. Hekking, the new 'cellist, also came in for a share of approbation for his finished performance of the Golterman concerto.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS AND VARIOUS MUSICAL AUTHORITIES.

H. E. KREHBIEL in New York Tribune.

"Herr Nikisch is the kind of Conductor who gives people who can think something to think about. He troubles the musical waters with his baton and will not have them stagnate. He belongs to the younger set of Conductors who are putting an end to the old music-box style of performance. He is an interpreter, expounder, commentator; but he lets the instruments inspired by the men executing his will make the publication. He invites a fortissimo by a wave of his wand, but he does not act the fortissimo for the edification of the audience. He uses no music but he makes no parade of the fact.

His gestures are incisive and full of nervous energy, but not sweeping. * * * *

He does not obtrude his signs of expression upon the public, though he uses them freely; his men know his intentions before they come before the people. He directs his men, controls and sways them; they are his agents of expression, the vehicles of his emotional proclamation. They follow him boldly in the wildest charge, for he neglects no cue. He is a leader whom it is safe to follow."

W. S. HENDERSON in New York Times.

"Mr. Nikisch unquestionably possesses in addition to his command as a disciplinarian a rich and generous warmth of temperament. He has a sympathetic appreciation of the composer's feelings that reaches backward across the years and becomes instinct with a vitality that seems contemporaneous with the birth of the work in the composer's mind. This is the highest tribute that can be paid to a Conductor. It is a quality which he shares with a master-actor who reveals to us the soul of a dramatic poem. This is what Mr. Nikisch does for a composition. He finds its soul. * * * *

It is a happy thing not only for Boston, but for America, that there is a Col. Higginson to keep such an Orchestra together, to retain it for the continued production of thoroughly rehearsed performances, and for the complete and satisfactory exposition of its Conductor's conceptions. It is another happy thing that so strong a leader has been found for this musical battalion. Mr. Nikisch is undeniably the man to take up the work which Mr. Gericke has laid down and carry it forward to new and grander heights."

RICHARD ALDRICH in Providence Journal.

"Greater technical perfection, more absolute accuracy in attack and polish in enunciation than the Boston Orchestra has attained in past years there could not well be. Mr. Nikisch certainly has the great advantage of taking this remarkable body of men delivered over to him in the very acme of their perfect form, and of moulding them to suit the deeper musical purpose and intellectuality with which his work is inspired."

CARL ZERRAHN.

"Mr. Nikisch is not a drill-master. He is a Conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

"Mr. Nikisch is certainly a Conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years."

ARTHUR WELD in Boston Post.

"The whole programme was most finely and conscientiously executed by the Orchestra who seem to thoroughly enjoy playing under their new master. His immense magnetism and his overflowing musical soul seem to touch every one of them and each man does his very best.

The well-grounded hopes for a season of unusual musical interest which were founded upon the first week's experience were more than confirmed on Saturday, and it can only be said—apropos of the extraordinary way in which Mr. Nikisch appears to be missed in his own home—that Leipsic's loss has been indeed our gain."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 26, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For the majority of auditors the chief element of interest in tonight's concert will be—as it was at the rehearsal of yesterday afternoon—the performance by Mr. Baermann of Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, being that in E-flat, his last and greatest. The rare appearances of this fine artist have peculiar value in more ways than one; beside the mere comfort and pleasure they give in their assurance of a true playing of something chosen from the best in music, they are helpful and instructive. They teach how to give thought to its proper exposition, feeling its just weight, and form its correct proportion; they show how to subordinate one's own powers to an author's purposes, and to be content even to have one's own accomplishments in art underrated, if only the meaning and expression of a composition can be seen and felt directly and fully. They show what to emulate and what to avoid in personal manner and professional style, and they give encouragement to modest and sincere workers that what they do faithfully and well will be appreciated and desired even though no clamor of popularity and notoriety follow them. We hold Mr. Baermann to be the most satisfactory and the best of the pianists who are to be heard in this country, because to a strong, supple and sometimes splendid technique he adds the culture of a man whose interest and knowledge are not limited to his own profession, the intellectual discrimination of the scholar and the docent, and the enthusiasm of the artist. We have no comparisons to make, and we know the many high qualities of other pianists; but in none do we find so well blended as in Mr. Baermann the exact expression of sense, the regard for rhythm, the gradation of color and force and the deep art feeling which are all needed for the highest expositors of great music. Especially in Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Liszt have we enjoyed his playiug, and we found ever new illustrations of his insight, his sympathy and his successful transference of the author's ideas to the listener's mind in his yesterday afternoon rendering of this concerto, which he has already played twice before to Symphony audiences. The perfect lucidity and delicacy of the allegro, the tenderness of the adagio, and the buoyancy of the rondo were alike admirable and were received with great applause by an enormous audience. A strong and dramatic reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, kept quite close to the standard interpretation, began the concert. The third place was occupied,—not by the unfinished Schubert symphony, as proposed,—but by the "Kamarins-kaja" of Elinka, once played at a "Popular" by Mr. Gericke, but now first placed in a Symphony programme; the reading was picturesque and romantic, the quaint irregular accent and the wandering flights of the themes being skilfully marked; one passage also gave a capital opportunity for the delicious tone and free execution of the new first clarinet to be well noticed. The last place was assigned to Mendelssohn's "Indian" symphony, which we could not delay to hear. On Saturday next, Mr. Emil Fischer will sing twice, and the orchestra will play the "Euryanthe" overture, two MS. "Episodes" by Arthur Bird (their first hearing) and Valkmann's B-flat symphony.

On Thursday evening the orchestra will give the first concert of five at the Sanders Theatre. The programme has not been given out yet, but it is known that Mrs. Moore-Lawson, a very delightful soprano, will sing. The orchestra sounds superbly in this amphitheatre and the music-lover will be well repaid for a trip thither to hear it.

The Symphony Concert---Carl Baermann, Soloist.

The third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, when Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and the several numbers were as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.....Beethoven
Fantasie for orchestra, "Komarinskaja".....Glinka
Symphony in A, "Italian".....Mendelssohn

Although such programmes as this are not altogether satisfactory after a five-years' experience with similar selections in these concerts, there can be little but praise given in commenting upon its performance. Mr. Nikisch certainly gave to these familiar compositions a freshness and interest seldom realized in their earlier productions here, and this fact made the concert a source of enjoyment, despite the lack of skill shown in choosing its selections. The change made from the original list of works announced, by which the Glinka fantasie was substituted for the unfinished symphony by Schubert, may be taken as an evidence of a desire on the new conductor's part to meet the reasonable demands of his audiences, and the next programme in this series gives further evidence of this intention on the part of Mr. Nikisch. The reading given the symphony more fully realized all its romantic beauty than any heard here in recent years, and the interpretation of the andante movement was almost a revelation. Throughout the entire composition the exquisite tone coloring of the orchestration was brought out with thoroughly delightful effect, and the artistic nature of the conductor was shown in all the admirable work done under his baton. The familiar "Egmont" overture was played with equal success, and the virile quality of the tone of the strings in this number again illustrated the greater freedom given the men under the new regime. The Glinka fantasie was played in a way that gave its ever varying contrasts with striking effect, and the odd conceits of quaint Russian folk songs were finely shown in the performance. The soloist of the evening, Mr. Carl Baermann, needs no added words of commendation in these columns. Always a favorite with Boston audiences since he established his residence here, he had a most hearty welcome upon his entrance, and again repeated his great success in the Beethoven concerto, which he has played so satisfactorily in earlier seasons. The charm of his playing in this great composition swayed the audience and held its attention to the last, and then the applause which rewarded the player made a fit tribute to his attainments as a pianist. It is seldom that so good a reading of the orchestral score of the concerto has been heard here, and the enjoyment attending this number was greatly enhanced by the ability of Mr. Nikish as shown in this portion of the programme. The soloist at the next concert will be Mr. Emil Fischer, basso, and the programme will include Weber's overture, "Euryanthe"; Weber's Lysiart's air from "Euryanthe"; Arthur Bird's two episodes for orchestra (MS.) (a) "Oriental Scene," (b) "Intermezzo"; songs with pianoforte, and Volkmann's symphony in B flat.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5, Beethoven; "Komarinskaja" Fantasie on two Russian folk songs, for orchestra, by Glinka, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. The reading accorded the "Egmont" overture would have been unexceptionable, had it not been for the liberties taken with the tempo here and there, which interfered with the strong current of the music, and interrupted its course for the mere production of a sugary effect. The opening was given with splendid vigor, and there was a fine dignity in the interpretation generally save when Mr. Nikisch indulged his propensity for "showing up" whenever a bit of flowing melody appears. The work of the orchestra was, on the whole, the best it has done this season so far, and this excellence was maintained through the Mendelssohn symphony, which was beautifully read by Mr. Nikisch from beginning to end, and with an utter absence of that capriciousness in respect to varying the time which he has manifested in his other readings of symphonies. The opening movement was taken somewhat faster, and the minuet somewhat slower than usual, but with an effect with which no fault is to be found in view of the fact that it did no violence to the innate character of the music. The Glinka fantasie, which had been heard here before at one of the Popular Concerts of last season, has a delightfully quaint originality in melody, rhythm, harmonies and orchestral effect. Mr. Nikisch's treatment of this selection was full of character, and it would be difficult to conceive a more sympathetic or more appropriate reading than he accorded it. The lack of space at our command prevents a more detailed account of the performances, but it may be said in brief, that both Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra showed a marked advance over their efforts in the two preceding concerts. The soloist was Carl Baermann, whose performance of the noble concerto is in need of no fresh laudation; nor is it necessary to add that it was both read and played in the purest artistic taste, with a masterly command of refined technique, and an enthusiasm and a sympathetic sentiment that felt every shade of meaning in the work. The performance was rewarded with a storm of applause, and the artist was twice recalled with immense fervor. At the next concert will be played Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," two Episodes for orchestra, by Arthur Bird (first time) and Volkmann's Symphony in B-flat. Mr. Emil Fischer is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from "Euryanthe" and a group of songs.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 28, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Carl Baermann was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday evening, giving Beethoven's Imperial Concerto in E flat. Mr. Baermann is always cordially received by Music Hall audiences, and his appearances are not so frequent as to cause any diminution in the cordiality. A great concerto for the piano in his hands becomes a thing of much interest, and he was doubtless responsible for a share of the standees who completely filled the hall. Mr. Baermann's work is always that of an artist, yet this concerto, which had been often given at the Symphony concerts, and by him as well, seemed to take on new beauty Saturday evening. The clear and admirable technique of Mr. Baermann, the expressive shading, the rich and beautiful accompaniment of the orchestra, all contributed to an ensemble that was all that the most ultra-musical could wish.

For the orchestral work a change had been made, and for the intermediate number a bridal song and dance by Glinka, one of the earliest Russian composers of note, was given. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony were the other numbers.

The fact that scarcely a person left the hall until the close of the symphony, and the concert was long, is evidence that the work of Mr. Nikisch is of sufficient attraction to keep even the standees in their places. The beautiful andante of the symphony as well as the closing movement were specimens of the rare gift of the conductor, and the overture and selection from Glinka were given with all the characteristic shading which has come to be looked for as a matter of course. Next week we are to have Weber and a symphony by Volkmann, with selections from Arthur Bird (manuscript), for the first time in Boston. Mr. Emil Fischer of New York will sing.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The Kneisel Quartet, composed of the same artists as last year with the exception of Mr. Hekking, 'cellist, who takes the place of Mr. Giese, gave the first concert of its fifth season in Chickering Hall, Monday night. The programme was:

Quartet in E Minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs—
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F Major, op. 88.....Brahms

Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson was the singer. Mr. Max Zach played the second viola in the quintet. Volkmann's quartet, played for the second time in these concerts, is one of those works that can always be heard with sincere and lively pleasure. It is bright and interesting from first to last, and more than once agreeably reminds one of Mozart in its graceful and elegant simplicity and easy flow. It was played to perfection, and Mr. Hekking's beautifully pure, sweet and even tone contributed exquisitely to the ensemble in the excellence of its blending and sustaining quality. Brahms's quintet was given by the club in its completeness for the first time, the third and last movement being added, bringing the work to a brilliant close. It need hardly be said that the whole was given most carefully and superbly, and that its many difficulties were most triumphantly overcome. Its beauties, indeed, as well as the frequent strangeness of its modulations and confusion of rhythms, its learning and highly wrought workmanship, were set in the clearest possible lights, all of which excellence found deep appreciation and due desert in long-continued applause at the end. Indeed, the playing of this justly admired quartet has never been smoother, more brilliant nor more finished, and the continued regard in which they are held was seen in the large and intelligent audience of musically disposed subscribers. Mrs. Lawson, whose singing made such a good impression at the Worcester Festival, was heard in Boston for the first time. Presser's song was by no means a suitable choice for the occasion, and she did her powers little justice in it, but in the charming song by Schumann and in that by Wolff she proved herself a pleasing and capable singer, possessing a voice of good range and quality as well as taste and intelligence. Her accompaniments were played by Mr. Arthur Foote in his usual musicianly and graceful manner.

of noble previous performances here.

Boston [illegible]

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 18.

ANTICS OF THE WAITERS.

They Crowd and Jam for the Coveted First Place.

Police Hustled to One Side by the Throng of Ticket Seekers.

Wild Scene at Midnight in the Court Leading to Music Hall.

After the sale of the rehearsal tickets yesterday morning Music Hall court was kept cleared by the police until midnight, at which hour it had been announced the court would again be thrown open to the waiters. Two hours before midnight Winter street became crowded with waiters and Fox's martyrs.

Fox had engaged 80 men to stand for him, and other speculators had their gangs. Each was bound to be first in place. Hence ensued a scene.

A rope had been stretched across the entrance to the court. In front of it stood Sergt. Kimball, Sergt. Brickley and Patrolmen Powers, Norton, Brennan and Henessey. Inside the rope were merely the manager of the symphonies, Mr. Ellis, his assistant, Mr. Comee, Arthur Wild, the well-known musical critic, and Engineer Kilgore of the hall. It was with difficulty that the police could keep the sidewalk clear during the latter part of the evening. The crowd reached entirely across the street.

About 11 o'clock the fun began. Speculators and their men pressed close to the front and were next to the rope. Those behind kept pressing forward. Those in front tried to hold their ground. The pressure was too great for them, and they were repeatedly rushed over the "dead line," when the officers promptly grabbed them, clubbed them and hauled them back into the ranks again.

The struggle for position increased as the time drew near to 12. When the clock lacked but a quarter of the bided hour there was a grand rush. A half-dozen men were sent head foremost over the rope into the court. The police found them desperate, and there was a very spirited struggle, but order was finally restored.

Shortly after 12 o'clock, the sergeant announced that 30 men would be admitted by the left entrance. This entrance was a narrow passageway inside a row of stone forts. The crowd jammed and surged over that way. The police said "Now!" and opened a passageway for the 30. Every man in the crowd seemed to labor under the impression that he belonged to the chosen number, and, consequently, every man in the crowd made a rush for that narrow passageway.

First came James Sullivan. He didn't intend to run; he had understood that was against the rules, but the press behind sent him spinning along like a cork on the crest of an angry billow. He was in the lead half way up the court trying to keep the crowd back, when by him shot the flying figure of William Jones, a colored boy. Then the whole crowd started on the run. They reached the end of the court, and were piled up in the corner. There they struggled, fought, slugged, pounded and scratched.

Mr. Ellis, Mr. Comee, Mr. Weld and Mr. Kilgore were there. Mr. Comee had a policeman's billy, and Mr. Weld had a heavy cane.

"We shall have to do what we can to straighten things out here," said Mr. Weld.

Mr. Conley of the Adams House had eight messenger boys in line, Joe Cavanagh had several men and Mr. Hayfield had a gang.

When all had settled into their places there was a cry for chairs. It began to rain. Some had overcoats and put them on. Those who did not turned up their coat-collars, put their hands in their pockets, and stood the wet as best they could.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

Kneisel Quartet Concert—The Hegner Concert Sale—Notes.

The fifth season of Kneisel Quartet concerts was well begun last night in Chickering Hall. The quartet appeared with Mr. Hekking in place of Mr. Giese. The programme was: Volkmann Quartet in E minor, op. 35; Songs—"By the Danube," G. Presser; "The Almond Tree," Schumann; "Tuscan Song," Tyson Wolff (Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson); Quintet, op. 88, Brahms. Both the instrumental numbers had been heard in previous concerts by this quartet, but their eminent worth is cause enough for their revival. The quintet is one of the least hard of all of Brahms's compositions for the chamber; who can hear the beautiful second movement with its alternating sorrow and gayety, and then deny Brahms the possession of musical feeling; Volkmann's quartet is a concise and technically well-made composition, melodious and interesting. The playing of both numbers was so refined and musically just, that criticism is stayed. Mr. Hekking is, perhaps, a degree over cautious with his tone, yet the ensemble of the quartet is only a trifle less study than formerly. It marks the possession of an artistic conscience when the first programme of a new season is so thoroughly well prepared as was that of last night. The large audience was unusually interested and appreciative, and it goes without saying was composed of the best musical element. Mrs. Lawson made a pleasant impression, but did not sing as freely, save in the bright song by Wolff, as is her wont. It was her first appearance in Boston. Hers is a thoroughly musical nature, and her lovely voice is in itself a prize. The pianoforte accompaniments were in the safe and helpful hands of Arthur Foote.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Those who expected Strauss' waltzes and other frivolities from our new conductor, because of his catholicity of taste in music, are doomed to disappointment. The third programme brought chiefly Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and the next is to bring Weber and Volkman. That the public is quite satisfied with the arrangement is evident from the fact that even standing room is with difficulty attainable at either rehearsals or concerts. This was not to be wondered at at last night's concert, for Professor Baermann is so great a pianist, and so modest in the number of his public appearances, that there is not the slightest chance of his ever wearing out his welcome from the public; and when to such a great artist is added a most interesting conductor, and a perfect orchestra, the combination is worth travelling a long way to hear.

The fifth number of the programme was the Egmont overture, which reminded of the triumph of the "Coriolanus" overture, as given a couple of weeks ago. Inspired directly by Goethe, and by the love of liberty and universal brotherhood which was always a dominant idea with Beethoven, it becomes one of his most earnest works and has its root in the same enthusiasm which led to the "Heroic" symphony, and the immense Ninth symphony. The close union of thought and tone in this overture is remarkable, (it was the hearing of "Egmont" which first led Wagner to believe that poetry could be intensified by music) yet I should be loth to go to the lengths which some of the "intention finders" have attained with this short work. It is sufficient if we find reflected in it some of the misery and suspense of Holland and the Netherlands, some of the presentiment of Egmout's treacherous doom, and at the end, a triumph over tyranny, and these changes of emotions were splendidly brought out by Mr. Nikisch. At the beginnning the sombre chords were as impressive as possible, and the anxious pauses of suspense were given with a poetry of feeling that could not but reveal their true meaning to any student either of Goethe or Motley. The brisk finale, too, in which the piccolo is used as in no other work in the whole repertoire, giving by a few simple runs a fierce brilliancy to a movement whose tone color would be dull without it, was performed in admirable contrast; a fine reading of a most dramatic overture. Then came what the audience were evidently most interested in—Professor Baermann and the Emperor concerto. It fitted well to such a majestic preamble. Of all the piano works of Beethoven, it seems to me the most distinctly masculine, so much so, indeed, that I have never heard an entirely satisfactory performance of it even by the greatest female pianists, Essipoff, Mehlig, Aus der Ohe, Clara Schumann, all leave something to be desired in this work, while they completely conquer many others. Another feature besides the masculinity, in which this work stands above all others of its school, is the absolute poise attained between piano and orchestra. Chopin's two concertos are the most beautiful of piano pieces (with an accidental orchestra in the background); Beethoven's earlier concertos, if one excepts the fourth, do not wholly wed the orchestra to the solo instrument; but in this work the two elements fuse and become one. It therefore, takes more than a mere pianist to play the "Emperor" concerto—it takes a musician. It was in this matter that Professor Baermann pleased me most; every technical difficulty was artistically overcome, but no technical difficulty was brought to the auditor's notice; one thought of the ensemble, of the beauty of the ideas expressed, of the rich intertwining of the two parts, but never of the solo pianist, as such. The performer evidently understood every detail of the score, and had grasped the composer's full intention—abnegation of piano effects to the effect of the whole.

The shading was absolutely without fault, and the left hand scales at the end of the first movement were clear as crystal. The short adagio proved that Professor Baermann is becoming more and more expressive with each performance. There was a tenderness and beauty in this portion of the work which was worthy of all praise.

The finale was taken a trifle too rapidly at first (although entirely free from blur), but after the orchestra had repeated the theme a little slower, the unity was undisturbed, and the final scales, after the mysterious kettle drum strokes, were a whirlwind of triumph.

The performance of the Kamarinskaia, by Glinka, was a great revelation of the powers of the conductor. Heard here some years ago the work made at the best but a tame impression, but last night it was all aglow with life and vigor. I have heard the chief theme of this work sung under the leadership of a Russian conductor, and the interpretation was vividly like that of last night's concert. The brusque sforzando effects, the bold kettledrum strokes and the capricious changes, were all quite in line with the subject. It must be borne in mind that the Kamarinskaia is a Russian dance, executed wholly by male dancers, like the Halling of Norway, and it is not as dainty or refined in its touches as a minuet or a waltz. The brusquerie, with which Mr. Nikisch invested it, were all eminently proper in such a work, and reminded of Mr. Gericke's successes in the Hungarian dances of last season. The work brought the new clarinettist to the front more prominently than anything yet given, and his excellent intonation and shading deserve all praise.

The Italian symphony may never have the rank of the Scotch one, but it is as sunny in its first movement as the latter is sombre, and it is pleasing from first note to last. Most delightful of it all was the andante in which the violas presented the theme with a tenderness that had just the Mendelssohnian touch of refined melancholy.

In the trio of the scherzo the horns played most beautifully, and the trumpets, although not having so prominent a part, made the most of their phrases. One may well be proud of the harmonie of our orchestra, as well as of the strings. The last named instruments had their opportunity in the finale—and used it. Mr. Nikisch did not turn the saltarelle into a tarantelle as some conductors do, but showed a keen understanding of subtler differences of tempo, as well as of shading. Although the audience might have been more enthusiastic, particularly after the concerto, and the Kamarinskaia, yet scarcely any left before the last cadence had been reached, a fact worthy of record in a concert lasting until quarter of ten.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1889.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening to an audience which completely filled Music Hall:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat.....Beethoven
"Komarinskaja" fantasie for orchestra.....Glinka
Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn
Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

The symphony has already been mentioned in this column with reference to its performance in Providence last Wednesday, and it need only be said now that the superior acoustic properties of Music Hall caused the interpretation to appear, if possible, to even greater advantage than in the rather noisy and over-resonant hall in Providence. The chief feature of Mr. Nikisch's reading is its extreme picturesqueness and, so to speak, its good humor. He is quite en rapport with the particularly gay mood in which Mendelssohn conceived this work, and he gives that side of the composition its full due. Of many beautiful details, that which probably appealed most immediately to the public at large was the beautiful horn passage in the third movement, which recurred several times and which was most exquisitely played by Mr. Reiter. The Russian composition is a singular work, and very difficult of comprehension to our musical ears. There is a terrible lack of sustained phrase, as the whole consists of a row of neat little musical thoughts and variations on the Russian folk-songs, which are placed side by side, but with little connection. It was, however, finely played by the orchestra, although it all too evidently puzzled the listeners.

Technically speaking, Mr. Baermann was at his best on Saturday. It is improbable that he has ever played with greater finish of detail, delicacy of touch and elegance of conception. His playing was as clear as crystal and the interpretation of the noble work was thoughtful, sympathetic and conscientious. But the tempi were too fast throughout, and this especially marred the general effect in the last movement. He was very enthusiastically received.

All three numbers were deeply interesting, and they were all magnificently played; but the artistic interest of the concert lay in the Beethoven overture. It would seem almost as if Mr. Nikisch were determined to try and move such as still lamentably fail to understand his Beethoven conceptions, and if, after his "Egmont" reading, they yet hold out against him, he might as well give up all hope of proselyting them. It was a reading which could hardly help stirring the unprejudiced listener to his very soul. It was like a panorama of all the tragic moments of Egmont's life. It must have been the way in which Beethoven conceived the work, it was so perfect. This seems a fitting occasion to say a few words about "classical" interpretations in general. Since the appearance of Mr. Nikisch before the public in Boston, and the manner in which he has surprised his audiences with regard to some of the older compositions, a great deal has been said in private, and also in the newspapers, about musical "traditions." It seems that many people feel that he has gone deliberately against the "traditions," and particularly in the case of Beethoven. The real truth is that there is no such thing as "tradition" in music. Not yet seven years ago, in an old palace on the great waterway of the City of the Ocean, the greatest master of the times died. His whole life had been a determined attempt to certify his position towards the public and more especially towards the conductors. And when Richard Wagner went to Venice to die, his mind was doubtless quite at rest on one point. He thought he had left his "traditions" fixed beyond possibility of change—"mortised and tenoned in granite." Not at all. Today, after only seven years, there are no Wagner traditions, and if this is so, where shall we find Beethoven traditions after sixty-two years? For every musician that Beethoven knew personally, Wagner probably knew fifty, and yet he is interpreted today in a thousand different ways. Even at Bayreuth, the Mecca of all his followers, we have seen last year, during Levy's illness, an interpretation of "Parsifal" by Mottl which was totally different from Levy's, and yet Frau Wagner herself was coaching him. The "classical" traditions, such as they are, do not come from Beethoven nor the other great masters. Far from it. They are from some conductor who was in those times, or later on, what Mr. Nikisch is in Boston today; that is to say, a musician to the tips of his fingers; a splendid, whole-souled, magnetic musician, who played the works in his own way, and the public in those days thought he was right, and followed him. Well, likely enough Mr. Nikisch may do the same thing here. Times may change, but the soul of the music will remain always, and if it has to be interpreted in a slightly different way for different countries and races, it is still Beethoven. Other objectors say that Mr. Nikisch offends against the "evident spirit of Beethoven." Will any man say what the "evident spirit" of any painter, musician or writer has been? The same thing always has been and always will be beautiful to different people in different ways. And this is certainly truer of music than of the plastic and imitative arts. The strongest hold that absolute music has over the public at large is precisely the fact that a hundred people may listen and it may mean a different thing and strike different responding chords in all of them, and yet all will be pleased. There is doubtless an "evident spirit" in music to each separate person, but not to any twenty, and certainly not to ten thousand. What call have we in this country of progress for this ridiculous ultra-conservatism? Is America the place to start a new Philistinism in music? In this generation, where the young musicians are growing up all around us, receptive and ready to learn, let us reach out both hands to Mr. Nikisch, who comes to us as a warm-hearted young teacher and a prophet—and let us not draw back because we have a metronome in one hand and a book of instructions by some "Stock capellmeister" in the other. Let us remember that the essence of music is its soul and not its mathematics; and it is better to touch one person's heart than to satisfy fifty people's conventionalities.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON [illegible]

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

[10]

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRD CONCERT.

With each renewed experience with Mr. Nikisch as a conductor the more transparent do his methods of conducting become. He never obscures his intent and the anxious and fastidious auditor is constantly kept on the alert for some new and wholly unexampled interpretation of some well-known master-work.

Whether all this is as it should be is an open question. There are two classes of interpreters, the one objective and the other subjective; the former seldom reads between the lines while the latter almost invariably does so. The more orthodox the critic, the more pronounced will be his dislike for such methods as the subjective interpreter is wont to employ. It is in just this respect that Mr. Nikisch courageously places himself at either the advantage or disadvantage of the vast amount of criticism that he must inevitably encounter. His position is by no means a negative position. If he desires a retard, an accelerando, a rubato or any other symbol of musical expression that may not appear in the score, he makes it and announces his "new departure" with all the prominence of a genuine master.

In defense of his so doing it should be borne in mind that the most disloyal interpreters of classical music have often been the classical composers whenever they have appeared in public as performers. This is especially true of Beethoven, who, at the head of an orchestra, as tradition informs us, was widely at variance with his score, not only as regards his prescribed tempi, but in all other respects. The right of a conductor or interpreter to be at variance with the composer, is one that wholly depends upon the merit and breadth of his education as a musician.

Therefore, when Mr. Nikisch is at variance with the composer, his ability to maintain his position should correspond with his artistic merit. Of this much is known—by hearsay, 'tis true, but by such well-founded hearsay that the utmost reliance may be placed upon it. He is an educated composer, and an uncommonly good performer upon the violin and pianoforte. Let his peers, then, be the first to find all manner of fault with him, but it will remain for the general public, as jurors, to discriminate as to what is merely a fault-finder's opinion on the one hand, and what is absolute merit on the other.

The programme for last evening's concert was as follows:

Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, Beethoven; "Komarinskaja," Glinka; symphony in A (Italian), Mendelssohn.

Few overtures make so exciting an impression as Beethoven's "Egmont," and a more remarkably compressed, brief, yet forceful and complete epitome of a tragic poem it would be difficult to name. All the music is as clear, full and strong as the very language of the tragedy itself. There is nothing patched up or uncertain in its plan; it is as free from all chaotic vagary as it is characteristic of the great master himself.

Mainly on account of the programme the entire concert was the most exhilarating of the season thus far, but the event of deepest interest was Carl Baermann's performance of the Emperor concerto. Perhaps the most just verdict that could be rendered of Mr. Baermann's conception would be that it was a remarkably clear and complete photograph of the work as it is written, and in an unusually strong light. Seldom, if ever has the heroic first movement moved upward and onward with such exciting and inspired momentum. Then followed that deep and poetic melody of infinite sweetness, singing itself out from the muted strings, and with an effect that is altogether heavenly. But here the masterly artist at the piano did not seem in full sympathy with the intent of the composer; and it was not until the unaccountable motive of the allegro had taken wings, that one found the photograph again at its clearest; yet the wonderfully rich orchestral parts,—rich in images, rich in ideas and rich in coloring, were not done anything like the justice that they have heretofore received. Of Mr. Baermann's playing in this last movement, it can only be said that it disarmed criticism. He rendered the work without notes, and at the conclusion of his performance one felt that the artist had not merely trusted to his marvellous memory, with flawless success, but to his sure, firm, and limpid technique, with a tone alike audible in the most delicate and subtle as well as in the strongest passages, but that he had been completely master not simply of the charming instrument on which he performed, but of himself. The little pieces by Glinka that the orchestra played, are scarcely worthy of serious mention.

From the orchestra there was not all the fine precision that has heretofore been noticeable, and especially is this true of the playing of the violins, while instead there was an abundance of the pungent quality. The former warmth and richness of the 'cellos was also missed. Mendelssohn's warmest and most rose-colored symphony, however, went to a charm, the ensemble being alive and vital at every point.

At the next concert the soloist will be Emil Fischer, the eminent basso.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 18.

ANTICS OF THE WAITERS.

They Crowd and Jam for the Coveted First Place.

Police Hustled to One Side by the Throng of Ticket Seekers.

Wild Scene at Midnight in the Court Leading to Music Hall.

After the sale of the rehearsal tickets yesterday morning Music Hall court was kept cleared by the police until midnight, at which hour it had been announced the court would again be thrown open to the waiters. Two hours before midnight Winter street became crowded with waiters and Fox's martyrs.

Fox had engaged 80 men to stand for him, and other speculators had their gangs. Each was bound to be first in place. Hence ensued a scene.

A rope had been stretched across the entrance to the court. In front of it stood Sergt. Kimball, Sergt. Brickley and Patrolmen Powers, Norton, Brennan and Henessey. Inside the rope were merely the manager of the symphonies, Mr. Ellis, his assistant, Mr. Comee, Arthur Wild, the well-known musical critic, and Engineer Kilgore of the hall. It was with difficulty that the police could keep the sidewalk clear during the latter part of the evening. The crowd reached entirely across the street.

About 11 o'clock the fun began. Speculators and their men pressed close to the front and were next to the rope. Those behind kept pressing forward. Those in front tried to hold their ground. The pressure was too great for them, and they were repeatedly rushed over the "dead line," when the officers promptly grabbed them, clubbed them and hauled them back into the ranks again.

The struggle for position increased as the time drew near to 12. When the clock lacked but a quarter of the bided hour there was a grand rush. A half-dozen men were sent head foremost over the rope into the court. The police found them desperate, and there was a very spirited struggle, but order was finally restored.

Shortly after 12 o'clock, the sergeant announced that 30 men would be admitted by the left entrance. This entrance was a narrow passageway inside a row of stone forts. The crowd jammed and surged over that way. The police said "Now!" and opened a passageway for the 30. Every man in the crowd seemed to labor under the impression that he belonged to the chosen number, and, consequently, every man in the crowd made a rush for that narrow passageway.

First came James Sullivan. He didn't intend to run; he had understood that was against the rules, but the press behind sent him spinning along like a cork on the crest of an angry billow. He was in the lead half way up the court trying to keep the crowd back, when by him shot the flying figure of William Jones, a colored boy. Then the whole crowd started on the run. They reached the end of the court, and were piled up in the corner. There they struggled, fought, slugged, pounded and scratched.

Mr. Ellis, Mr. Comee, Mr. Weld and Mr. Kilgore were there. Mr. Comee had a policeman's billy, and Mr. Weld had a heavy cane.

"We shall have to do what we can to straighten things out here," said Mr. Weld.

Mr. Conley of the Adams House had eight messenger boys in line, Joe Cavanagh had several men and Mr. Hayfield had a gang.

When all had settled into their places there was a cry for chairs. It began to rain. Some had overcoats and put them on. Those who did not turned up their coat-collars, put their hands in their pockets, and stood the wet as best they could.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

Kneisel Quartet Concert—The Hegner Concert Sale—Notes.

The fifth season of Kneisel Quartet concerts was well begun last night in Chickering Hall. The quartet appeared with Mr. Hekking in place of Mr. Giese. The programme was: Volkmann Quartet in E minor, op. 35; Songs—"By the Danube," G. Presser; "The Almond Tree," Schumann; "Tuscan Song," Tyson Wolff (Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson); Quintet, op. 88, Brahms. Both the instrumental numbers had been heard in previous concerts by this quartet, but their eminent worth is cause enough for their revival. The quintet is one of the least hard of all of Brahms's compositions for the chamber; who can hear the beautiful second movement with its alternating sorrow and gayety, and then deny Brahms the possession of musical feeling; Volkmann's quartet is a concise and technically well-made composition, melodious and interesting. The playing of both numbers was so refined and musically just, that criticism is stayed. Mr. Hekking is, perhaps, a degree over cautious with his tone, yet the ensemble of the quartet is only a trifle less study than formerly. It marks the possession of an artistic conscience when the first programme of a new season is so thoroughly well prepared as was that of last night. The large audience was unusually interested and appreciative, and it goes without saying was composed of the best musical element. Mrs. Lawson made a pleasant impression, but did not sing as freely, save in the bright song by Wolff, as is her wont. It was her first appearance in Boston. Hers is a thoroughly musical nature, and her lovely voice is in itself a prize. The pianoforte accompaniments were in the safe and helpful hands of Arthur Foote.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Those who expected Strauss' waltzes and other frivolities from our new conductor, because of his catholicity of taste in music, are doomed to disappointment. The third programme brought chiefly Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and the next is to bring Weber and Volkman. That the public is quite satisfied with the arrangement is evident from the fact that even standing room is with difficulty attainable at either rehearsals or concerts. This was not to be wondered at at last night's concert, for Professor Baermann is so great a pianist, and so modest in the number of his public appearances, that there is not the slightest chance of his ever wearing out his welcome from the public; and when to such a great artist is added a most interesting conductor, and a perfect orchestra, the combination is worth travelling a long way to hear.

The fifth number of the programme was the Egmont overture, which reminded of the triumph of the "Coriolanus" overture, as given a couple of weeks ago. Inspired directly by Goethe, and by the love of liberty and universal brotherhood which was always a dominant idea with Beethoven, it becomes one of his most earnest works and has its root in the same enthusiasm which led to the "Heroic" symphony, and the immense Ninth symphony. The close union of thought and tone in this overture is remarkable, (it was the hearing of "Egmont" which first led Wagner to believe that poetry could be intensified by music) yet I should be loth to go to the lengths which some of the "intention finders" have attained with this short work. It is sufficient if we find reflected in it some of the misery and suspense of Holland and the Netherlands, some of the presentiment of Egmont's treacherous doom, and at the end, a triumph over tyranny, and these changes of emotions were splendidly brought out by Mr. Nikisch. At the beginning the sombre chords were as impressive as possible, and the anxious pauses of suspense were given with a poetry of feeling that could not but reveal their true meaning to any student either of Goethe or Motley. The brisk finale, too, in which the piccolo is used as in no other work in the whole repertoire, giving by a few simple runs a fierce brilliancy to a movement whose tone color would be dull without it, was performed in admirable contrast; a fine reading of a most dramatic overture. Then came what the audience were evidently most interested in—Professor Baermann and the Emperor concerto. It fitted well to such a majestic preamble. Of all the piano works of Beethoven, it seems to me the most distinctly masculine, so much so, indeed, that I have never heard an entirely satisfactory performance of it even by the greatest female pianists, Essipoff, Mehlig, Aus der Ohe, Clara Schumann, all leave something to be desired in this work, while they completely conquer many others. Another feature besides the masculinity, in which this work stands above all others of its school, is the absolute poise attained between piano and orchestra. Chopin's two concertos are the most beautiful of piano pieces (with an accidental orchestra in the background); Beethoven's earlier concertos, if one excepts the fourth, do not wholly wed the orchestra to the solo instrument; but in this work the two elements fuse and become one. It therefore, takes more than a mere pianist to play the "Emperor" concerto—it takes a musician. It was in this matter that Professor Baermann pleased me most; every technical difficulty was artistically overcome, but no technical difficulty was brought to the auditor's notice; one thought of the ensemble, of the beauty of the ideas expressed, of the rich intertwining of the two parts, but never of the solo pianist, as such. The performer evidently understood every detail of the score, and had grasped the composer's full intention—abnegation of piano effects to the effect of the whole.

The shading was absolutely without fault, and the left hand scales at the end of the first movement were clear as crystal. The short adagio proved that Professor Baermann is becoming more and more expressive with each performance. There was a tenderness and beauty in this portion of the work which was worthy of all praise.

The finale was taken a trifle too rapidly at first (although entirely free from blur), but after the orchestra had repeated the theme a little slower, the unity was undisturbed, and the final scales, after the mysterious kettle drum strokes, were a whirlwind of triumph.

The performance of the Kamarinskaia, by Glinka, was a great revelation of the powers of the conductor. Heard here some years ago the work made at the best but a tame impression, but last night it was all aglow with life and vigor. I have heard the chief theme of this work sung under the leadership of a Russian conductor, and the interpretation was vividly like that of last night's concert. The brusque sforzando effects, the bold kettledrum strokes and the capricious changes, were all quite in line with the subject. It must be borne in mind that the Kamarinskaia is a Russian dance, executed wholly by male dancers, like the Halling of Norway, and it is not as dainty or refined in its touches as a minuet or a waltz. The brusquerie, with which Mr. Nikisch invested it, were all eminently proper in such a work, and reminded of Mr. Gericke's successes in the Hungarian dances of last season. The work brought the new clarinettist to the front more prominently than anything yet given, and his excellent intonation and shading deserve all praise.

The Italian symphony may never have the rank of the Scotch one, but it is as sunny in its first movement as the latter is sombre, and it is pleasing from first note to last. Most delightful of it all was the andante in which the violas presented the theme with a tenderness that had just the Mendelssohnian touch of refined melancholy.

In the trio of the scherzo the horns played most beautifully, and the trumpets, although not having so prominent a part, made the most of their phrases. One may well be proud of the harmonie of our orchestra, as well as of the strings. The last named instruments had their opportunity in the finale—and used it. Mr. Nikisch did not turn the saltarelle into a tarantelle as some conductors do, but showed a keen understanding of subtler differences of tempo, as well as of shading. Although the audience might have been more enthusiastic, particularly after the concerto, and the Kamarinskaia, yet scarcely any left before the last cadence had been reached, a fact worthy of record in a concert lasting until quarter of ten.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1889.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening to an audience which completely filled Music Hall:

Overture to "Egmont" ..... Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat ..... Beethoven
"Komarinskaja" fantasie for orchestra ..... Glinka
Symphony in A (Italian) ..... Mendelssohn
Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

The symphony has already been mentioned in this column with reference to its performance in Providence last Wednesday, and it need only be said now that the superior acoustic properties of Music Hall caused the interpretation to appear, if possible, to even greater advantage than in the rather noisy and over-resonant hall in Providence. The chief feature of Mr. Nikisch's reading is its extreme picturesqueness and, so to speak, its good humor. He is quite en rapport with the particularly gay mood in which Mendelssohn conceived this work, and he gives that side of the composition its full due. Of many beautiful details, that which probably appealed most immediately to the public at large was the beautiful horn passage in the third movement, which recurred several times and which was most exquisitely played by Mr. Reiter. The Russian composition is a singular work, and very difficult of comprehension to our musical ears. There is a terrible lack of sustained phrase, as the whole consists of a row of neat little musical thoughts and variations on the Russian folk-songs, which are placed side by side, but with little connection. It was, however, finely played by the orchestra, although it all too evidently puzzled the listeners.

Technically speaking, Mr. Baermann was at his best on Saturday. It is improbable that he has ever played with greater finish of detail, delicacy of touch and elegance of conception. His playing was as clear as crystal and the interpretation of the noble work was thoughtful, sympathetic and conscientious. But the tempi were too fast throughout, and this especially marred the general effect in the last movement. He was very enthusiastically received.

All three numbers were deeply interesting, and they were all magnificently played; but the artistic interest of the concert lay in the Beethoven overture. It would seem almost as if Mr. Nikisch were determined to try and move such as still lamentably fail to understand his Beethoven conceptions, and if, after his "Egmont" reading, they yet hold out against him, he might as well give up all hope of proselyting them. It was a reading which could hardly help stirring the unprejudiced listener to his very soul. It was like a panorama of all the tragic moments of Egmont's life. It must have been the way in which Beethoven conceived the work, it was so perfect. This seems a fitting occasion to say a few words about "classical" interpretations in general. Since the appearance of Mr. Nikisch before the public in Boston, and the manner in which he has surprised his audiences with regard to some of the older compositions, a great deal has been said in private, and also in the newspapers, about musical "traditions." It seems that many people feel that he has gone deliberately against the "traditions," and particularly in the case of Beethoven. The real truth is that there is no such thing as "tradition" in music. Not yet seven years ago, in an old palace on the great waterway of the City of the Ocean, the greatest master of the times died. His whole life had been a determined attempt to certify his position towards the public and more especially towards the conductors. And when Richard Wagner went to Venice to die, his mind was doubtless quite at rest on one point. He thought he had left his "traditions" fixed beyond possibility of change—"mortised and tenoned in granite." Not at all. Today, after only seven years, there are no Wagner traditions, and if this is so, where shall we find Beethoven traditions after sixty-two years? For every musician that Beethoven knew personally, Wagner probably knew fifty, and yet he is interpreted today in a thousand different ways. Even at Bayreuth, the Mecca of all his followers, we have seen last year, during Levy's illness, an interpretation of "Parsifal" by Mottl which was totally different from Levy's, and yet Frau Wagner herself was coaching him. The "classical" traditions, such as they are, do not come from Beethoven nor the other great masters. Far from it. They are from some conductor who was in those times, or later on, what Mr. Nikisch is in Boston today; that is to say, a musician to the tips of his fingers; a splendid, whole-souled, magnetic musician, who played the works in his own way, and the public in those days thought he was right, and followed him. Well, likely enough Mr. Nikisch may do the same thing here. Times may change, but the soul of the music will remain always, and if it has to be interpreted in a slightly different way for different countries and races, it is still Beethoven. Other objectors say that Mr. Nikisch offends against the "evident spirit of Beethoven." Will any man say what the "evident spirit" of any painter, musician or writer has been? The same thing always has been and always will be beautiful to different people in different ways. And this is certainly truer of music than of the plastic and imitative arts. The strongest hold that absolute music has over the public at large is precisely the fact that a hundred people may listen and it may mean a different thing and strike different responding chords in all of them, and yet all will be pleased. There is doubtless an "evident spirit" in music to each separate person, but not to any twenty, and certainly not to ten thousand. What call have we in this country of progress for this ridiculous ultra-conservatism? Is America the place to start a new Philistinism in music? In this generation, where the young musicians are growing up all around us, receptive and ready to learn, let us reach out both hands to Mr. Nikisch, who comes to us as a warm-hearted young teacher and a prophet—and let us not draw back because we have a metronome in one hand and a book of instructions by some "Stock capellmeister" in the other. Let us remember that the essence of music is its soul and not its mathematics; and it is better to touch one person's heart than to satisfy fifty people's conventionalities.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON TIMES, SU[illegible]

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

[10]

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRD CONCERT.

With each renewed experience with Mr. Nikisch as a conductor the more transparent do his methods of conducting become. He never obscures his intent and the anxious and fastidious auditor is constantly kept on the alert for some new and wholly unexampled interpretation of some well-known master-work.

Whether all this is as it should be is an open question. There are two classes of interpreters, the one objective and the other subjective; the former seldom reads between the lines while the latter almost invariably does so. The more orthodox the critic, the more pronounced will be his dislike for such methods as the subjective interpreter is wont to employ. It is in just this respect that Mr. Nikisch courageously places himself at either the advantage or disadvantage of the vast amount of criticism that he must inevitably encounter. His position is by no means a negative position. If he desires a retard, an accelerando, a rubato or any other symbol of musical expression that may not appear in the score, he makes it and announces his "new departure" with all the prominence of a genuine master.

In defense of his so doing it should be borne in mind that the most disloyal interpreters of classical music have often been the classical composers whenever they have appeared in public as performers. This is especially true of Beethoven, who, at the head of an orchestra, as tradition informs us, was widely at variance with his score, not only as regards his prescribed tempi, but in all other respects. The right of a conductor or interpreter to be at variance with the composer, is one that wholly depends upon the merit and breadth of his education as a musician.

Therefore, when Mr. Nikisch is at variance with the composer, his ability to maintain his position should correspond with his artistic merit. Of this much is known—by hearsay, 'tis true, but by such well-founded hearsay that the utmost reliance may be placed upon it. He is an educated composer, and an uncommonly good performer upon the violin and pianoforte. Let his peers, then, be the first to find all manner of fault with him, but it will remain for the general public, as jurors, to discriminate as to what is merely a fault-finder's opinion on the one hand, and what is absolute merit on the other.

The programme for last evening's concert was as follows:

Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, Beethoven; "Komarinskaja," Glinka; symphony in A (Italian), Mendelssohn.

Few overtures make so exciting an impression as Beethoven's "Egmont," and a more remarkably compressed, brief, yet forceful and complete epitome of a tragic poem it would be difficult to name. All the music is as clear, full and strong as the very language of the tragedy itself. There is nothing patched up or uncertain in its plan; it is as free from all chaotic vagary as it is characteristic of the great master himself.

Mainly on account of the programme the entire concert was the most exhilarating of the season thus far, but the event of deepest interest was Carl Baermann's performance of the Emperor concerto. Perhaps the most just verdict that could be rendered of Mr. Baermann's conception would be that it was a remarkably clear and complete photograph of the work as it is written, and in an unusually strong light. Seldom, if ever has the heroic first movement moved upward and onward with such exciting and inspired momentum. Then followed that deep and poetic melody of infinite sweetness, singing itself out from the muted strings, and with an effect that is altogether heavenly. But here the masterly artist at the piano did not seem in full sympathy with the intent of the composer; and it was not until the unaccountable motive of the allegro had taken wings, that one found the photograph again at its clearest; yet the wonderfully rich orchestral parts,—rich in images, rich in ideas and rich in coloring, were not done anything like the justice that they have heretofore received. Of Mr. Baermann's playing in this last movement, it can only be said that it disarmed criticism. He rendered the work without notes, and at the conclusion of his performance one felt that the artist had not merely trusted to his marvellous memory, with flawless success, but to his sure, firm, and limpid technique, with a tone alike audible in the most delicate and subtle as well as in the strongest passages, but that he had been completely master not simply of the charming instrument on which he performed, but of himself. The little pieces by Glinka that the orchestra played, are scarcely worthy of serious mention.

From the orchestra there was not all the fine precision that has heretofore been noticeable, and especially is this true of the playing of the violins, while instead there was an abundance of the pungent quality. The former warmth and richness of the 'cellos was also missed. Mendelssohn's warmest and most rose-colored symphony, however, went to a charm, the ensemble being alive and vital at every point.

At the next concert the soloist will be Emil Fischer, the eminent basso.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 18.

ANTICS OF THE WAITERS.

They Crowd and Jam for the Coveted First Place.

Police Hustled to One Side by the Throng of Ticket Seekers.

Wild Scene at Midnight in the Court Leading to Music Hall.

After the sale of the rehearsal tickets yesterday morning Music Hall court was kept cleared by the police until midnight, at which hour it had been announced the court would again be thrown open to the waiters. Two hours before midnight Winter street became crowded with waiters and Fox's martyrs.

Fox had engaged 80 men to stand for him, and other speculators had their gangs. Each was bound to be first in place. Hence ensued a scene.

A rope had been stretched across the entrance to the court. In front of it stood Sergt. Kimball, Sergt. Brickley and Patrolmen Powers, Norton, Brennan and Henessey. Inside the rope were merely the manager of the symphonies, Mr. Ellis, his assistant, Mr. Comee, Arthur Wild, the well-known musical critic, and Engineer Kilgore of the hall. It was with difficulty that the police could keep the sidewalk clear during the latter part of the evening. The crowd reached entirely across the street.

About 11 o'clock the fun began. Speculators and their men pressed close to the front and were next to the rope. Those behind kept pressing forward. Those in front tried to hold their ground. The pressure was too great for them, and they were repeatedly rushed over the "dead line," when the officers promptly grabbed them, clubbed them and hauled them back into the ranks again.

The struggle for position increased as the time drew near to 12. When the clock lacked but a quarter of the bided hour there was a grand rush. A half-dozen men were sent head foremost over the rope into the court. The police found them desperate, and there was a very spirited struggle, but order was finally restored.

Shortly after 12 o'clock, the sergeant announced that 30 men would be admitted by the left entrance. This entrance was a narrow passageway inside a row of stone forts. The crowd jammed and surged over that way. The police said "Now!" and opened a passageway for the 30. Every man in the crowd seemed to labor under the impression that he belonged to the chosen number, and, consequently, every man in the crowd made a rush for that narrow passageway.

First came James Sullivan. He didn't intend to run; he had understood that was against the rules, but the press behind sent him spinning along like a cork on the crest of an angry billow. He was in the lead half way up the court trying to keep the crowd back, when by him shot the flying figure of William Jones, a colored boy. Then the whole crowd started on the run. They reached the end of the court, and were piled up in the corner. There they struggled, fought, slugged, pounded and scratched.

Mr. Ellis, Mr. Comee, Mr. Weld and Mr. Kilgore were there. Mr. Comee had a policeman's billy, and Mr. Weld had a heavy cane.

"We shall have to do what we can to straighten things out here," said Mr. Weld.

Mr. Conley of the Adams House had eight messenger boys in line, Joe Cavanagh had several men and Mr. Hayfield had a gang.

When all had settled into their places there was a cry for chairs. It began to rain. Some had overcoats and put them on. Those who did not turned up their coat-collars, put their hands in their pockets, and stood the wet as best they could.

Boston Daily Traveller.
TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

Kneisel Quartet Concert—The Hegner Concert Sale—Notes.

The fifth season of Kneisel Quartet concerts was well begun last night in Chickering Hall. The quartet appeared with Mr. Hekking in place of Mr. Giese. The programme was: Volkmann Quartet in E minor, op. 35; Songs—"By the Danube," G. Presser; "The Almond Tree," Schumann; "Tuscan Song," Tyson Wolff (Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson); Quintet, op. 88, Brahms. Both the instrumental numbers had been heard in previous concerts by this quartet, but their eminent worth is cause enough for their revival. The quintet is one of the least hard of all of Brahms's compositions for the chamber; who can hear the beautiful second movement with its alternating sorrow and gayety, and then deny Brahms the possession of musical feeling; Volkmann's quartet is a concise and technically well-made composition, melodious and interesting. The playing of both numbers was so refined and musically just, that criticism is stayed. Mr. Hekking is, perhaps, a degree over cautious with his tone, yet the ensemble of the quartet is only a trifle less study than formerly. It marks the possession of an artistic conscience when the first programme of a new season is so thoroughly well prepared as was that of last night. The large audience was unusually interested and appreciative, and it goes without saying was composed of the best musical element. Mrs. Lawson made a pleasant impression, but did not sing as freely, save in the bright song by Wolff, as is her wont. It was her first appearance in Boston. Hers is a thoroughly musical nature, and her lovely voice is in itself a prize. The pianoforte accompaniments were in the safe and helpful hands of Arthur Foote.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Those who expected Strauss' waltzes and other frivolities from our new conductor, because of his catholicity of taste in music, are doomed to disappointment. The third programme brought chiefly Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and the next is to bring Weber and Volkman. That the public is quite satisfied with the arrangement is evident from the fact that even standing room is with difficulty attainable at either rehearsals or concerts. This was not to be wondered at at last night's concert, for Professor Baermann is so great a pianist, and so modest in the number of his public appearances, that there is not the slightest chance of his ever wearing out his welcome from the public; and when to such a great artist is added a most interesting conductor, and a perfect orchestra, the combination is worth travelling a long way to hear.

The fifth number of the programme was the Egmont overture, which reminded of the triumph of the "Coriolanus" overture, as given a couple of weeks ago. Inspired directly by Goethe, and by the love of liberty and universal brotherhood which was always a dominant idea with Beethoven, it becomes one of his most earnest works and has its root in the same enthusiasm which led to the "Heroic" symphony, and the immense Ninth symphony. The close union of thought and tone in this overture is remarkable, (it was the hearing of "Egmont" which first led Wagner to believe that poetry could be intensified by music) yet I should be loth to go to the lengths which some of the "intention finders" have attained with this short work. It is sufficient if we find reflected in it some of the misery and suspense of Holland and the Netherlands, some of the presentiment of Egmont's treacherous doom, and at the end, a triumph over tyranny, and these changes of emotions were splendidly brought out by Mr. Nikisch. At the beginnning the sombre chords were as impressive as possible, and the anxious pauses of suspense were given with a poetry of feeling that could not but reveal their true meaning to any student either of Goethe or Motley. The brisk finale, too, in which the piccolo is used as in no other work in the whole repertoire, giving by a few simple runs a fierce brilliancy to a movement whose tone color would be dull without it, was performed in admirable contrast; a fine reading of a most dramatic overture. Then came what the audience were evidently most interested in—Professor Baermann and the Emperor concerto. It fitted well to such a majestic preamble. Of all the piano works of Beethoven, it seems to me the most distinctly masculine, so much so, indeed, that I have never heard an entirely satisfactory performance of it even by the greatest female pianists, Essipoff, Mehlig, Aus der Ohe, Clara Schumann, all leave something to be desired in this work, while they completely conquer many others. Another feature besides the masculinity, in which this work stands above all others of its school, is the absolute poise attained between piano and orchestra. Chopin's two concertos are the most beautiful of piano pieces (with an accidental orchestra in the background); Beethoven's earlier concertos, if one excepts the fourth, do not wholly wed the orchestra to the solo instrument; but in this work the two elements fuse and become one. It therefore, takes more than a mere pianist to play the "Emperor" concerto—it takes a musician. It was in this matter that Professor Baermann pleased me most; every technical difficulty was artistically overcome, but no technical difficulty was brought to the auditor's notice; one thought of the ensemble, of the beauty of the ideas expressed, of the rich intertwining of the two parts, but never of the solo pianist, as such. The performer evidently understood every detail of the score, and had grasped the composer's full intention—abnegation of piano effects to the effect of the whole.

The shading was absolutely without fault, and the left hand scales at the end of the first movement were clear as crystal. The short adagio proved that Professor Baermann is becoming more and more expressive with each performance. There was a tenderness and beauty in this portion of the work which was worthy of all praise.

The finale was taken a trifle too rapidly at first (although entirely free from blur), but after the orchestra had repeated the theme a little slower, the unity was undisturbed, and the final scales, after the mysterious kettle drum strokes, were a whirlwind of triumph.

The performance of the Kamarinskaia, by Glinka, was a great revelation of the powers of the conductor. Heard here some years ago the work made at the best but a tame impression, but last night it was all aglow with life and vigor. I have heard the chief theme of this work sung under the leadership of a Russian conductor, and the interpretation was vividly like that of last night's concert. The brusque sforzando effects, the bold kettledrum strokes and the capricious changes, were all quite in line with the subject. It must be borne in mind that the Kamarinskaia is a Russian dance, executed wholly by male dancers, like the Halling of Norway, and it is not as dainty or refined in its touches as a minuet or a waltz. The brusquerie, with which Mr. Nikisch invested it, were all eminently proper in such a work, and reminded of Mr. Gericke's successes in the Hungarian dances of last season. The work brought the new clarinettist to the front more prominently than anything yet given, and his excellent intonation and shading deserve all praise.

The Italian symphony may never have the rank of the Scotch one, but it is as sunny in its first movement as the latter is sombre, and it is pleasing from first note to last. Most delightful of it all was the andante in which the violas presented the theme with a tenderness that had just the Mendelssohnian touch of refined melancholy.

In the trio of the scherzo the horns played most beautifully, and the trumpets, although not having so prominent a part, made the most of their phrases. One may well be proud of the harmonie of our orchestra, as well as of the strings. The last named instruments had their opportunity in the finale—and used it. Mr. Nikisch did not turn the saltarelle into a tarantelle as some conductors do, but showed a keen understanding of subtler differences of tempo, as well as of shading. Although the audience might have been more enthusiastic, particularly after the concerto, and the Kamarinskaia, yet scarcely any left before the last cadence had been reached, a fact worthy of record in a concert lasting until quarter of ten.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Post.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1889.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch presented the following programme on Saturday evening to an audience which completely filled Music Hall:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E flat.....Beethoven
"Komarinskaja" fantasie for orchestra.....Glinka
Symphony in A (Italian).....Mendelssohn
Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

The symphony has already been mentioned in this column with reference to its performance in Providence last Wednesday, and it need only be said now that the superior acoustic properties of Music Hall caused the interpretation to appear, if possible, to even greater advantage than in the rather noisy and over-resonant hall in Providence. The chief feature of Mr. Nikisch's reading is its extreme picturesqueness and, so to speak, its good humor. He is quite en rapport with the particularly gay mood in which Mendelssohn conceived this work, and he gives that side of the composition its full due. Of many beautiful details, that which probably appealed most immediately to the public at large was the beautiful horn passage in the third movement, which recurred several times and which was most exquisitely played by Mr. Reiter. The Russian composition is a singular work, and very difficult of comprehension to our musical ears. There is a terrible lack of sustained phrase, as the whole consists of a row of neat little musical thoughts and variations on the Russian folk-songs, which are placed side by side, but with little connection. It was, however, finely played by the orchestra, although it all too evidently puzzled the listeners.

Technically speaking, Mr. Baermann was at his best on Saturday. It is improbable that he has ever played with greater finish of detail, delicacy of touch and elegance of conception. His playing was as clear as crystal and the interpretation of the noble work was thoughtful, sympathetic and conscientious. But the tempi were too fast throughout, and this especially marred the general effect in the last movement. He was very enthusiastically received.

All three numbers were deeply interesting, and they were all magnificently played; but the artistic interest of the concert lay in the Beethoven overture. It would seem almost as if Mr. Nikisch were determined to try and move such as still lamentably fail to understand his Beethoven conceptions, and if, after his "Egmont" reading, they yet hold out against him, he might as well give up all hope of proselyting them. It was a reading which could hardly help stirring the unprejudiced listener to his very soul. It was like a panorama of all the tragic moments of Egmont's life. It must have been the way in which Beethoven conceived the work, it was so perfect. This seems a fitting occasion to say a few words about "classical" interpretations in general. Since the appearance of Mr. Nikisch before the public in Boston, and the manner in which he has surprised his audiences with regard to some of the older compositions, a great deal has been said in private, and also in the newspapers, about musical "traditions." It seems that many people feel that he has gone deliberately against the "traditions," and particularly in the case of Beethoven. The real truth is that there is no such thing as "tradition" in music. Not yet seven years ago, in an old palace on the great waterway of the City of the Ocean, the greatest master of the times died. His whole life had been a determined attempt to certify his position towards the public and more especially towards the conductors. And when Richard Wagner went to Venice to die, his mind was doubtless quite at rest on one point. He thought he had left his "traditions" fixed beyond possibility of change—"mortised and tenoned in granite." Not at all. Today, after only seven years, there are no Wagner traditions, and if this is so, where shall we find Beethoven traditions after sixty-two years? For every musician that Beethoven knew personally, Wagner probably knew fifty, and yet he is interpreted today in a thousand different ways. Even at Bayreuth, the Mecca of all his followers, we have seen last year, during Levy's illness, an interpretation of "Parsifal" by Mottl which was totally different from Levy's, and yet Frau Wagner herself was coaching him. The "classical" traditions, such as they are, do not come from Beethoven nor the other great masters. Far from it. They are from some conductor who was in those times, or later on, what Mr. Nikisch is in Boston today; that is to say, a musician to the tips of his fingers; a splendid, whole-souled, magnetic musician, who played the works in his own way, and the public in those days thought he was right, and followed him. Well, likely enough Mr. Nikisch may do the same thing here. Times may change, but the soul of the music will remain always, and if it has to be interpreted in a slightly different way for different countries and races, it is still Beethoven. Other objectors say that Mr. Nikisch offends against the "evident spirit of Beethoven." Will any man say what the "evident spirit" of any painter, musician or writer has been? The same thing always has been and always will be beautiful to different people in different ways. And this is certainly truer of music than of the plastic and imitative arts. The strongest hold that absolute music has over the public at large is precisely the fact that a hundred people may listen and it may mean a different thing and strike different responding chords in all of them, and yet all will be pleased. There is doubtless an "evident spirit" in music to each separate person, but not to any twenty, and certainly not to ten thousand. What call have we in this country of progress for this ridiculous ultra-conservatism? Is America the place to start a new Philistinism in music? In this generation, where the young musicians are growing up all around us, receptive and ready to learn, let us reach out both hands to Mr. Nikisch, who comes to us as a warm-hearted young teacher and a prophet—and let us not draw back because we have a metronome in one hand and a book of instructions by some "Stock capellmeister" in the other. Let us remember that the essence of music is its soul and not its mathematics; and it is better to touch one person's heart than to satisfy fifty people's conventionalities.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON TIMES, SUNDAY.
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

[10]

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRD CONCERT.

With each renewed experience with Mr. Nikisch as a conductor the more transparent do his methods of conducting become. He never obscures his intent and the anxious and fastidious auditor is constantly kept on the alert for some new and wholly unexampled interpretation of some well-known master-work.

Whether all this is as it should be is an open question. There are two classes of interpreters, the one objective and the other subjective; the former seldom reads between the lines while the latter almost invariably does so. The more orthodox the critic, the more pronounced will be his dislike for such methods as the subjective interpreter is wont to employ. It is in just this respect that Mr. Nikisch courageously places himself at either the advantage or disadvantage of the vast amount of criticism that he must inevitably encounter. His position is by no means a negative position. If he desires a retard, an accelerando, a rubato or any other symbol of musical expression that may not appear in the score, he makes it and announces his "new departure" with all the prominence of a genuine master.

In defense of his so doing it should be borne in mind that the most disloyal interpreters of classical music have often been the classical composers whenever they have appeared in public as performers. This is especially true of Beethoven, who, at the head of an orchestra, as tradition informs us, was widely at variance with his score, not only as regards his prescribed tempi, but in all other respects. The right of a conductor or interpreter to be at variance with the composer, is one that wholly depends upon the merit and breadth of his education as a musician.

Therefore, when Mr. Nikisch is at variance with the composer, his ability to maintain his position should correspond with his artistic merit. Of this much is known—by hearsay, 'tis true, but by such well-founded hearsay that the utmost reliance may be placed upon it. He is an educated composer, and an uncommonly good performer upon the violin and pianoforte. Let his peers, then, be the first to find all manner of fault with him, but it will remain for the general public, as jurors, to discriminate as to what is merely a fault-finder's opinion on the one hand, and what is absolute merit on the other.

The programme for last evening's concert was as follows:

Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, Beethoven; "Komarinskaja," Glinka; symphony in A (Italian), Mendelssohn.

Few overtures make so exciting an impression as Beethoven's "Egmont," and a more remarkably compressed, brief, yet forceful and complete epitome of a tragic poem it would be difficult to name. All the music is as clear, full and strong as the very language of the tragedy itself. There is nothing patched up or uncertain in its plan; it is as free from all chaotic vagary as it is characteristic of the great master himself.

Mainly on account of the programme the entire concert was the most exhilarating of the season thus far, but the event of deepest interest was Carl Baermann's performance of the Emperor concerto. Perhaps the most just verdict that could be rendered of Mr. Baermann's conception would be that it was a remarkably clear and complete photograph of the work as it is written, and in an unusually strong light. Seldom, if ever has the heroic first movement moved upward and onward with such exciting and inspired momentum. Then followed that deep and poetic melody of infinite sweetness, singing itself out from the muted strings, and with an effect that is altogether heavenly. But here the masterly artist at the piano did not seem in full sympathy with the intent of the composer; and it was not until the unaccountable motive of the allegro had taken wings, that one found the photograph again at its clearest; yet the wonderfully rich orchestral parts,—rich in images, rich in ideas and rich in coloring, were not done anything like the justice that they have heretofore received. Of Mr. Baermann's playing in this last movement, it can only be said that it disarmed criticism. He rendered the work without notes, and at the conclusion of his performance one felt that the artist had not merely trusted to his marvellous memory, with flawless success, but to his sure, firm, and limpid technique, with a tone alike audible in the most delicate and subtle as well as in the strongest passages, but that he had been completely master not simply of the charming instrument on which he performed, but of himself. The little pieces by Glinka that the orchestra played, are scarcely worthy of serious mention.

From the orchestra there was not all the fine precision that has heretofore been noticeable, and especially is this true of the playing of the violins, while instead there was an abundance of the pungent quality. The former warmth and richness of the 'cellos was also missed. Mendelssohn's warmest and most rose-colored symphony, however, went to a charm, the ensemble being alive and vital at every point.

At the next concert the soloist will be Emil Fischer, the eminent basso.

CHICKERING HALL.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. CORINNE MOORE-LAWSON, Soprano.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 28TH, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

VOLKMANN. QUARTET, in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.
Allegro comodo.
Scherzo (Presto.)
Andantino.
Finale; Allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

GUSTAV PRESSER. "By the Danube."
SCHUMANN. "The Almond Tree."
TYSON WOLFF. "Tuscan Song."

BRAHMS. QUINTET, in F, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio
Grave ed appassionata.
Allegro energico (first time.)
Second Viola, MR. MAX ZACH.

SECOND CONCERT, Monday, December 2d, at 8 P. M.

Mr. Nikisch's Third Offering in the Symphony Course.

Although Mr. Nikisch, in his programme on this occasion, still places the symphony last—an arrangement which was justly criticised when the orchestra was in another conductor's hands—he has such a happy knack of arrangement that not only is adverse criticism nugatory, but one is compelled to acknowledge that valuable effects are gained by this order of procedure. The person who does not enjoy the programmes that Mr. Nikisch has presented is surely no musician. As regards his judgment, one thing is certain—if any error is to be set down against him it is in his leaning towards popularity; the charge of heaviness cannot be laid to his door.

Great expectations were raised, and very properly so, by the admirable programme announced for the third concert. It was unfortunate that circumstances compelled a vital alteration in Mr. Nikisch's plans. The change from Schubert's unfinished symphony to a fantasia by Glinka was very great. No doubt the odd, bizarre and characteristic music of the Russian composer was interesting enough—perhaps even able—but as a substitute for that most inspirational and beautiful of Franz Schubert's orchestral works it produced, naturally enough, a feeling of disappointment among the many who have come to know that singular production.

The soloist yesterday was the ever-welcome Carl Baermann. We have come to know him so well—to love him, almost—here in Boston that it seems superfluous to bestow commendation on his masterly and polished playing, especially so when he interprets a Beethoven concerto, which he always gives in that broad poetic, sympathetic way which distinguishes the thorough musician from the routine technician. One would think there must be close affiliation and sympathy between such a conductor as Nikisch and such a pianoforte virtuoso as Baermann. Their ideas of musical interpretation seem to run so exactly in the same line. The grand Beethoven concerto was played yesterday with the utmost finish as to details, and the utmost nobility as to the ensemble.

Certainly the special event of the concert so far as the purely orchestral portion of the programme is concerned was the performance of the famous "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn. It is all very well for critics who are fond of applying mathematics and the yardstick to the interpretation of music to carp at the "liberties" (?) which Mr. Nikisch takes with the works of this eminent classicist. But what thorough musician, free from traditional prejudice, can listen to either of the two great works of this composer with which Nikisch has thus far favored us without being delighted and charmed by the freedom and grace of the performance.

No fault could be found with the rapidity with which the tempo of the vivace movement was taken. Yet, notwithstanding the pace at which it was played, there was observable the finest shading—the utmost delicacy of touch. The performance was better, as a whole, than anything the orchestra has done this season. The usual enormous audience was in attendance, and there is no question but the organization has caught high popular favor. Indeed every concert makes newly evident the absurdity of the insinuation that has been made that the patrons of these concerts merely attend because it is "the fashion." The personnel of the audiences, the breathless attention with which the vast majority follow the interpretation of the orchestra, present unimpeachable evidence that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Gericke, has most interested, sympathetic and interested hearers.

The programme this week is of especial interest, as introducing two new works by "home talent," and as giving opportunity for a singer of deserved repute. This is the order:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Agathe's air from Euryanthe.....Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.).....Arthur Bird
a. Oriental scene.....
b. Intermezzo.....
First time in Boston.
Songs, with pianoforte.....
Symphony in B flat.....Volkman
Soloist, Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The first of the season's series of chamber music concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano, as soloist. The evening's selections were as follows: Quartet in E minor, op. 35, Volkmann; songs with piano—a, "By the Danube," Presser; b, "The Almond Tree," Schumann; c, "Tuscan Song," Wolff—Mrs. Lawson; quintet in F, op. 88, Brahms. The prominent popularity of the concerts given under Mr. Kneisel's direction was again shown by the attendance an of audience limited in numbers only by the capacity of the hall, the subscription list for the season well-nigh exhausting the supply of tickets. Briefly, it may be said that the playing of the quartet has suffered in no essential by the substitution of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese. Mr. Hekking is an admirable chamber player, and while his presence will not tend to make the ensemble of the quartet more verile, it is a strong factor in keeping it refined. The Volkmann quartet is well written, has abundant humor, and is, withal, melodic and interesting. Brahms, in the quartet, is more subtle and satisfies the heart more than in many of his chamber music. The reading of both works was an expression of the highest executive ability joined to musical feeling. The playing of the Kneisel quartet was never more polished, clear or sympathetic. More noticeable this season than ever is the rich quality of Mr. Roth's 'cello. The audience was especially appreciative and responsive. Mrs. Lawson sung for the first time in Boston on this occasion, and the songs by Presser and Wolff, both of the modern German school, are not known here; the latter's "Tuscan Song" is bright and has a good accompaniment, and Mrs Lawson made her orchestral part in the Schumann's "The Almond Tree" as sweetly sung. The singer, whose Baermann work at the Worcester festival is in new contrast, was not entirely at her ease at first, though nothing could hide her artistic temperament, nor mar the intelligence of her work. The songs were enjoyed by the audience, who recalled the singer. The piano accompaniments were sympathetically played by Arthur Foote.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Famous Quartet Begin Another Season at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, violoncello, with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, soprano, opened its fifth season in Chickering Hall last night. A large audience extended a warm welcome.

Following was the programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.....Volkman
Allegro comodo, scherzo (presto), andantino, finale allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

By the Danube.....Gustav Presser
The Almond Tree.....Schumann
Tuscan Song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F, op 88.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo ma con brio, grave ed appassionata, allegro energico (first time).
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

Volkmann was a very prolific writer, but among all his compositions none can be picked out that are more enjoyable than the quartet in E minor. The courage of the various movements, particularly of the finale, united with a fund of power to make the rendition very pleasing.

Mrs. Lawson's assistance was thoroughly welcome and was warmly received.

It was the quintet, however, that gave the greatest gratification. Attention and sympathy were both demanded during its entire production.

Two of the three movements of the quintet are combined in the second movement, than which a more compound arrangement seldom occurs. The music is teeming with profound melancholy. The happy episode of the allegro energico, so rollicking and cheerful, forms an agreeable contrast to the quavers of the old subject. The work ended excellently with a presto coda, spirited and delightful.

The next concert will occur on Monday night, Dec. 2.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Chickering Hall was well filled with a very representative audience last night for the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet series. The quartet, which is so far reorganized that Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the orchestra, replaces Mr. Giese, presented the following programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs.
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms
Second viola—Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartet is an interesting and beautiful work—and entirely in the very best spirit of classical chamber music. The andantino is extremely touching, and all the other movements present a multitude of melodic and harmonic beauties which follow one another with complete freedom and spontaneity. The chief interest, however, of the programme centred in the Brahms quintet. The first movement of this extraordinarily unequal work is one of the most beautiful, clear and original productions that has as yet emanated from the brain of this great contemporary composer of absolute music. Unfortunately, the middle movement (there are but three) is less clear and easy to understand, while the last, although it is undoubtedly a great exhibition of contrapuntal technique, is very dull and uninteresting to the listener. Both quartet and quintet were superbly played by the executants. If possible, the quartet has gained in ensemble and finish of detail. This is probably chiefly due to Mr. Kneisel's great musical intelligence and painstaking enthusiasm; still, he could not accomplish such result unless each individual member of his quartet was a thoroughly finished musician of the highest rank, and so they all are. They seem all to have high ideals and to strive bravely and unhesitatingly to achieve them—and indeed the results attained should amply repay them.

It is unfortunate that so charming a singer as Mrs. Moore-Lawson should have chosen such songs as she did to make her debut before a very exacting Boston audience. This conscientious and admirable artist made a profound impression at Worcester during the late festival, but last night the combination of evident nervousness and two songs entirely unsuited to a chamber-music programme weighed heavily against her chances of adequate recognition. The song by Presser is a bad example of the offensive ballad type, and the song by Wolff is not only dilettante in the extreme, but hopelessly commonplace. Still, Mrs. Moore-Lawson sang the songs, such as they were, very well, excepting the first, in which her nervousness was with difficulty overcome. She will be heard to much better advantage in Cambridge on Thursday next, where she sings with the Symphony Orchestra. And she is really so charming and finished an artist, when at her best, that she will doubtless do away with any slightly unsatisfactory impression that she may have produced last night.

ARTHUR WELD.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In arranging a concert program too little attention is paid to the limited capacity of the human ear. Either the concert is so long drawn out, or the program so unskilfully arranged, that the hearer, after an hour, is unable to receive musical impressions and leaves the hall jaded and depressed. Not without reason did the Italians compose operas which do not take over two hours in the performing, although at the opera the attention is in a measure diverted from the music by the action, costumes and scenery.

The concerts of to-day are as a rule too long. The interest too often flags with each successive number. To make an impression at the very start, to deepen this impression, to dismiss the audience hungry for music—this is no slight task. In this respect Theodore Thomas is unrivaled.

Now where is the proper place for the symphony? Mr. Nikisch seems to think it should be at the end. After an hour or more of music, the audience must hear the work which demands the most serious attention. Is this reasonable or natural?

It depends a little upon the nature of the symphony. If it be such a one as the "Hafner" of Mozart or the Ninth of Haydn, full of melody and life, as a final number it may be effective as a contrast to what has gone before. If it be one by Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms, let it be heard earlier in the evening. Why should that which demands the most careful attention be reserved until the ear necessarily has lost much of its powers of discrimination and enjoyment?

Is it rash to say that the symphony should be the second or third number of the program?

Nor is it by any means a universal custom to reserve the symphony for the last place. The first concert of the Paris Conservatory took place in March, 1828, and opened with Beethoven's Third Symphony. Looking over the program of successive years, it is seen that the symphony as a rule comes first. And in many German cities there is no fixed rule in regard to its place upon the program. The program is often divided into three parts, the second of which is devoted to the symphony.

The program of the second Symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme, by Haydn
Goltermann..{Andante and Finale from Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Bach.....{.....Air
Schumann.{For 'cello.....{..Traumerei
Popper....{....Papillon
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7

The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

Although the Brahms selection was admirably played, hearing it was not an unmixed pleasure. Brahms has shown in these variations technical ability, and his instrumentation is not so dry as in many of his more ambitious compositions. It is an exercise, a task which tries the skill of the performers and the patience of the hearers. There is not a spark of divine fire in the subject or variations. Not even the brilliant playing of the wood-wind could dispel the gloomy impression; and after ten minutes one could have exclaimed with Christopher Sly, "'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady; would't were done!"

The Mendelssohn overture was a delightful contrast to the labored incubration of Brahms. Mr. Nikisch took the tempo at the start somewhat slower than is the custom, with full, free swing; and by it the overture gained in beauty. The delicate passages allotted to the wood-wind were played with rare distinctness. It is not to be denied that here and there closer attention could have been paid to details perhaps petty but indicated by the composer. The piano of the composer is sometimes the forte of Mr. Nikisch. It seems ungracious, however, to allude to this, when his reading of the overture as a whole was so noble, and at the same time so romantic. And what a work of art this same overture is! Here, there is no trace of that sentimentality which disfigures so much of Mendelssohn's work for the piano. We recognize in it the Mendelssohn of "The Walpurgis Night," the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Greek choruses.

What an amount of nonsense has been written about the Seventh Symphony. Victims of hysteria have claimed that it portrayed everything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, in the water under the earth. One man claims that it "paints" a low carousal; another sees in it a procession in the catacombs; while one honest German declares it to be an odalisque's dream of love!

As if music could express anything but musical ideas. As if two people were affected in precisely the same way by a composition. Walt Whitman comes nearer the truth when he says, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments, ... it is not the oboe nor the beating drums, nor the score of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, ... it is nearer and farther than they."

Is there not pleasure enough in "pure musical beauty, inherent in sounds and their combinations?" Is it necessary for complete enjoyment to say of music, "It means this, it means that?"

In his reading of the Symphony Mr. Nikisch did not differ materially from other conductors, except that perhaps he took the vivace of the first movement as well as the last movement at a slower pace. As the critic of the Post remarked with reason, conductors have too often run riot in Beethoven allegros and prestos. And on the other hand we often hear an andante drawled out as though it were an adagio. The few liberties taken by Mr. Nikisch were such as would recommend themselves to any musical nature. If any of the movements was a disappointment, it was the famous allegretto; here and there were rough passages, and there was an absence of that careful finish which has been hitherto the characteristic of our orchestra. The last movement was full of the coarse, rollicking fun of Rabelais, and the player of the kettledrums might well have been the curé of Meudon.

Mr. Hekking was warmly applauded. His tone is pure, though not so large and noble as that of others; his technique is sure. The andante of the Goltermann concerto became a little monotonous from the sameness of tone.

The "Bach air" and "Traumerei" were disarrangements which pleased the people; Popper's "Papillon" is a singular composition which might have been written at the request of a German amateur and proprietor of a small beer garden, who wished to distract the attention of his customers during the tapping of a fresh keg.

PHILIP HALE.

CHICKERING HALL.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEĆENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. CORINNE MOORE-LAWSON, Soprano.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 28TH, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

VOLKMANN. QUARTET, in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.
Allegro comodo.
Scherzo (Presto.)
Andantino.
Finale; Allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

GUSTAV PRESSER. "BY THE DANUBE."
SCHUMANN. "THE ALMOND TREE."
TYSON WOLFF. "TUSCAN SONG."

BRAHMS. QUINTET, in F, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio
Grave ed appassionata.
Allegro energico (first time.)
Second Viola, MR. MAX ZACH.

SECOND CONCERT, Monday, December 2d, at 8 P. M.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

Mr. Nikisch's Third Offering in the Symphony Course.

Although Mr. Nikisch, in his programme making, still places the symphony last—an arrangement which was justly criticised when the orchestra was in another conductor's hands—he has such a happy knack of arrangement that not only is adverse criticism nugatory, but one is compelled to acknowledge that valuable effects are gained by this order of procedure. The person who does not enjoy the programmes that Mr. Nikisch has presented is surely no musician. As regards his judgment, one thing is certain—if any error is to be set down against him it is in his leaning towards popularity; the charge of heaviness cannot be laid to his door.

Great expectations were raised, and very properly so, by the admirable programme announced for the third concert. It was unfortunate that circumstances compelled a vital alteration in Mr. Nikisch's plans. The change from Schubert's unfinished symphony to a fantasia by Glinka was very great. No doubt the odd, bizarre and characteristic music of the Russian composer was interesting enough—perhaps even able—but as a substitute for that most inspirational and beautiful of Franz Schubert's orchestral works it produced, naturally enough, a feeling of disappointment among the many who have come to know that singular production.

The soloist yesterday was the ever-welcome Carl Baermann. We have come to know him so well—to love him, almost—here in Boston that it seems superfluous to pass commendation on his masterly and finished playing, especially so when he interprets a Beethoven concerto, which he always gives in that broad poetic, sympathetic way which distinguishes the thorough musician from the routine technician. One would think there must be close affiliation and sympathy between such a conductor as Nikisch and such a pianoforte virtuoso as Baermann. Their ideas of musical interpretation seem to run so exactly in the same line. The grand Beethoven concerto was played yesterday with the utmost finish as to details, and the utmost nobility as to the ensemble.

Certainly the special event of the concert so far as the purely orchestral portion of the programme is concerned was the performance of the famous "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn. It is all very well for critics who are fond of applying mathematics and the yardstick to the interpretation of music to carp at the "liberties" (?) which Mr. Nikisch takes with the works of this eminent classicist. But what thorough musician, free from traditional prejudice, can listen to either of the two great works of this composer with which Nikisch has thus far favored us without being delighted and charmed by the freedom and grace of the performance.

No fault could be found with the rapidity with which the tempo of the vivace movement was taken. Yet, notwithstanding the pace at which it was played, there was observable the finest shading—the utmost delicacy of touch. The performance was better, as a whole, than anything the orchestra has done this season. The usual enormous audience was in attendance, and there is no question but the organization has caught high popular favor. Indeed, every concert makes newly evident the absurdity of the insinuation that has been made that the patrons of these concerts merely attend because it is "the fashion." The personnel of the audiences, the breathless attention with which the vast majority follow the interpretation of the orchestra, present unimpeachable evidence that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Gericke, has most interested, sympathetic and interested hearers.

The programme this week is of especial interest, as introducing two new works by "home talent," and as giving opportunity for a singer of deserved repute. This is the order:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Lysiart's air from Euryanthe.....Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.).....Arthur Bird
a. Oriental scene.....
b. Intermezzo.....
First time in Boston.
Songs, with pianoforte.....
Symphony in B flat.....Volkman
Soloist, Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The first of the season's series of chamber music concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano, as soloist. The evening's selections were as follows: Quartet in E minor, op. 35, Volkmann; songs with piano—a, "By the Danube," Presser; b, "The Almond Tree," Schumann; c, "Tuscan Song," Wolff—Mrs. Lawson; quintet in F, op. 88, Brahms. The permanent popularity of the concerts given under Mr. Kneisel's direction was again shown by the attendance an of audience limited in numbers only by the capacity of the hall, the subscription list for the season well-nigh exhausting the supply of tickets. Briefly, it may be said that the playing of the quartet has suffered in no essential by the substitution of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese. Mr. Hekking is an admirable chamber player, and, while his presence will not tend to make the ensemble of the quartet more verile, it will be a strong factor in keeping it refined. The Volkmann quartet is well written, has abundant humor, and is, withal, melodic and interesting. Brahms, in the quartet, is more warm, and satisfies the heart more than in much of his chamber music. The reading of both works was an expression of the highest executive ability joined with musical feeling. The playing of the Kneisel quartet was never more polished, elegant or sympathetic. More noticeable this season than ever is the rich quality of the viola. The audience was especially attentive and responsive. Mrs. Lawson sung for the first time in Boston on this occasion. All the songs by Presser and Wolff, both of the [illegible] German school, are not known here; [illegible] "Tuscan Song" is bright and has a good [illegible] motion, and Mrs Lawson made her [illegible] effect in it. Schumann's "The Almond [illegible] was sweetly sung. The singer, whose [illegible] work at the Worcester festival is [illegible] not forgotten, was not entirely at her ease [illegible] night, though nothing could hide her [illegible] musical spirit, nor mar the intelligence [illegible] work. The songs were enjoyed by the [illegible] who recalled the singer. The [illegible] accompaniments were sympathetically played by Arthur Foote.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Famous Quartet Begin Another Season at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, violoncello, with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, soprano, opened its fifth season in Chickering Hall last night. A large audience extended a warm welcome.

Following was the programme;

Quartet in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.....Volkman
Allegro comodo, scherzo (presto), andantino, finale allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

By the Danube.....Gustav Presser
The Almond Tree.....Schumann
Tuscan Song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F, op 88.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo ma con brio, grave ed appassionata, allegro energico (first time).
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

Volkmann was a very prolific writer, but among all his compositions none can be picked out that are more enjoyable than the quartet in E minor. The courage of the various movements, particularly of the finale, united with a fund of power to make the rendition very pleasing.

Mrs. Lawson's assistance was thoroughly welcome and was warmly received.

It was the quintet, however, that gave the greatest gratification. Attention and sympathy were both demanded during its entire production.

Two of the three movements of the quintet are combined in the second movement, than which a more compound arrangement seldom occurs. The music is teeming with profound melancholy. The happy episode of the allegro energico, so rollicking and cheerful, forms an agreeable contrast to the quavers of the old subject. The work ended excellently with a presto coda, spirited and delightful.

The next concert will occur on Monday night, Dec. 2.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Chickering Hall was well filled with a very representative audience last night for the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet series. The quartet, which is so far reorganized that Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the orchestra, replaces Mr. Giese, presented the following programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs.
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms
Second viola—Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartet is an interesting and beautiful work—and entirely in the very best spirit of classical chamber music. The andantino is extremely touching, and all the other movements present a multitude of melodic and harmonic beauties which follow one another with complete freedom and spontaneity. The chief interest, however, of the programme centred in the Brahms quintet. The first movement of this extraordinarily unequal work is one of the most beautiful, clear and original productions that has as yet emanated from the brain of this great contemporary composer of absolute music. Unfortunately, the middle movement (there are but three) is less clear and easy to understand, while the last, although it is undoubtedly a great exhibition of contrapuntal technique, is very dull and uninteresting to the listener. Both quartet and quintet were superbly played by the executants. If possible, the quartet has gained in ensemble and finish of detail. This is probably chiefly due to Mr. Kneisel's great musical intelligence and painstaking enthusiasm; still, he could not accomplish such result unless each individual member of his quartet was a thoroughly finished musician of the highest rank, and so they all are. They seem all to have high ideals and to strive bravely and unhesitatingly to achieve them—and indeed the results attained should amply repay them.

It is unfortunate that so charming a singer as Mrs. Moore-Lawson should have chosen such songs as she did to make her debut before a very exacting Boston audience. This conscientious and admirable artist made a profound impression at Worcester during the late festival, but last night the combination of evident nervousness and two songs entirely unsuited to a chamber-music programme weighed heavily against her chances of adequate recognition. The song by Presser is a bad example of the offensive ballad type, and the song by Wolff is not only dilettante in the extreme, but hopelessly commonplace. Still, Mrs. Moore-Lawson sang the songs, such as they were, very well, excepting the first, in which her nervousness was with difficulty overcome. She will be heard to much better advantage in Cambridge on Thursday next, where she sings with the Symphony Orchestra. And she is really so charming and finished an artist, when at her best, that she will doubtless do away with any slightly unsatisfactory impression that she may have produced last night.

ARTHUR WELD.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In arranging a concert program too little attention is paid to the limited capacity of the human ear. Either the concert is so long drawn out, or the program so unskilfully arranged, that the hearer, after an hour, is unable to receive musical impressions and leaves the hall jaded and depressed. Not without reason did the Italians compose operas which do not take over two hours in the performing, although at the opera the attention is in a measure diverted from the music by the action, costumes and scenery.

The concerts of to-day are as a rule too long. The interest too often flags with each successive number. To make an impression at the very start, to deepen this impression, to dismiss the audience hungry for music—this is no slight task. In this respect Theodore Thomas is unrivaled.

Now where is the proper place for the symphony? Mr. Nikisch seems to think it should be at the end. After an hour or more of music, the audience must hear the work which demands the most serious attention. Is this reasonable or natural?

It depends a little upon the nature of the symphony. If it be such a one as the "Hafner" of Mozart or the Ninth of Haydn, full of melody and life, as a final number it may be effective as a contrast to what has gone before. If it be one by Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms, let it be heard earlier in the evening. Why should that which demands the most careful attention be reserved until the ear necessarily has lost much of its powers of discrimination and enjoyment?

Is it rash to say that the symphony should be the second or third number of the program?

Nor is it by any means a universal custom to reserve the symphony for the last place. The first concert of the Paris Conservatory took place in March, 1828, and opened with Beethoven's Third Symphony. Looking over the program of successive years, it is seen that the symphony as a rule comes first. And in many German cities there is no fixed rule in regard to its place upon the program. The program is often divided into three parts, the second of which is devoted to the symphony.

The program of the second Symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme, by Haydn
Goltermann..{Andante and Finale from Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Bach.....{.....Air
Schumann. } For 'cello.....{..Traumerei
Popper.....{....Papillon
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7

The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

Although the Brahms selection was admirably played, hearing it was not an unmixed pleasure. Brahms has shown in these variations technical ability, and his instrumentation is not so dry as in many of his more ambitious compositions. It is an exercise, a task which tries the skill of the performers and the patience of the hearers. There is not a spark of divine fire in the subject or variations. Not even the brilliant playing of the wood-wind could dispel the gloomy impression; and after ten minutes one could have exclaimed with Christopher Sly, "'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady; would't were done!"

The Mendelssohn overture was a delightful contrast to the labored lucubration of Brahms. Mr. Nikisch took the tempo at the start somewhat slower than is the custom, with full, free swing; and by it the overture gained in beauty. The delicate passages allotted to the wood-wind were played with rare distinctness. It is not to be denied that here and there closer attention could have been paid to details perhaps petty but indicated by the composer. The piano of the composer is sometimes the forte of Mr. Nikisch. It seems ungracious, however, to allude to this, when his reading of the overture as a whole was so noble, and at the same time so romantic. And what a work of art this same overture is! Here, there is no trace of that sentimentality which disfigures so much of Mendelssohn's work for the piano. We recognize in it the Mendelssohn of "The Walpurgis Night," the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Greek choruses.

What an amount of nonsense has been written about the Seventh Symphony. Victims of hysteria have claimed that it portrayed everything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, in the water under the earth. One man claims that it "paints" a low carousal; another sees in it a procession in the catacombs; while one honest German declares it to be an odalisque's dream of love!

As if music could express anything but musical ideas. As if two people were affected in precisely the same way by a composition. Walt Whitman comes nearer the truth when he says, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments, ... it is not the oboe nor the beating drums, nor the score of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, ... it is nearer and farther than they."

Is there not pleasure enough in "pure musical beauty, inherent in sounds and their combinations?" Is it necessary for complete enjoyment to say of music, "It means this, it means that?"

In his reading of the Symphony Mr. Nikisch did not differ materially from other conductors, except that perhaps he took the vivace of the first movement as well as the last movement at a slower pace. As the critic of the Post remarked with reason, conductors have too often run riot in Beethoven allegros and prestos. And on the other hand we often hear an andante drawled out as though it were an adagio. The few liberties taken by Mr. Nikisch were such as would recommend themselves to any musical nature. If any of the movements was a disappointment, it was the famous allegretto; here and there were rough passages, and there was an absence of that careful finish which has been hitherto the characteristic of our orchestra. The last movement was full of the coarse, rollicking fun of Rabelais, and the player of the kettledrums might well have been the curé of Meudon.

Mr. Hekking was warmly applauded. His tone is pure, though not so large and noble as that of others; his technique is sure. The andante of the Goltermann concerto became a little monotonous from the sameness of tone.

The "Bach air" and "Traumerei" were disarrangements which pleased the people; Popper's "Papillon" is a singular composition which might have been written at the request of a German amateur and proprietor of a small beer garden, who wished to distract the attention of his customers during the tapping of a fresh keg.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1889.

Mr. Nikisch's Third Offering in the Symphony Course.

Although Mr. Nikisch, in his programme making, still places the symphony last—an arrangement which was justly criticised when the orchestra was in another conductor's hands—he has such a happy knack of arrangement that not only is adverse criticism nugatory, but one is compelled to acknowledge that valuable effects are gained by this order of procedure. The person who does not enjoy the programmes that Mr. Nikisch has presented is surely no musician. As regards his judgment, one thing is certain—if any error is to be set down against him it is in his leaning towards popularity; the charge of heaviness cannot be laid to his door.

Great expectations were raised, and very properly so, by the admirable programme announced for the third concert. It was unfortunate that circumstances compelled a vital alteration in Mr. Nikisch's plans. The change from Schubert's unfinished symphony to a fantasia by Glinka was very great. No doubt the odd, bizarre and characteristic music of the Russian composer was interesting enough—perhaps even able—but as a substitute for that most inspirational and beautiful of Franz Schubert's orchestral works it produced, naturally enough, a feeling of disappointment among the many who have come to know that singular production.

The soloist yesterday was the ever-welcome Carl Baermann. We have come to know him so well—to love him, almost—here in Boston that it seems superfluous to pass commendation on his masterly and finished playing, especially so when he interprets a Beethoven concerto, which he always gives in that broad poetic, sympathetic way which distinguishes the thorough musician from the routine technician. One would think there must be close affiliation and sympathy between such a conductor as Nikisch and such a pianoforte virtuoso as Baermann. Their ideas of musical interpretation seem to run so exactly in the same line. The grand Beethoven concerto was played yesterday with the utmost finish as to details, and the utmost nobility as to the ensemble.

Certainly the special event of the concert so far as the purely orchestral portion of the programme is concerned was the performance of the famous "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn. It is all very well for critics who are fond of applying mathematics and the yardstick to the interpretation of music to carp at the "liberties" (?) which Mr. Nikisch takes with the works of this eminent classicist. But what thorough musician, free from traditional prejudice, can listen to either of the two great works of this composer with which Nikisch has thus far favored us without being delighted and charmed by the freedom and grace of the performance.

No fault could be found with the rapidity with which the tempo of the vivace movement was taken. Yet, notwithstanding the pace at which it was played, there was observable the finest shading—the utmost delicacy of touch. The performance was better, as a whole, than anything the orchestra has done this season. The usual enormous audience was in attendance, and there is no question but the organization has caught high popular favor. Indeed, every concert makes newly evident the absurdity of the insinuation that has been made that the patrons of these concerts merely attend because it is "the fashion." The personnel of the audiences, the breathless attention with which the vast majority follow the interpretation of the orchestra, present unimpeachable evidence that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Gericke, has most interested, sympathetic and interested hearers.

The programme this week is of especial interest, as introducing two new works by "home talent," and as giving opportunity for a singer of deserved repute. This is the order:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Lysiart's air from Euryanthe.....Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.).....Arthur Bird
a. Oriental scene.....
b. Intermezzo.....
First time in Boston.
Songs, with pianoforte.....
Symphony in B flat.....Volkman
Soloist, Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HERALD.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The first of the season's series of chamber music concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano, as soloist. The evening's selections were as follows: Quartet in E minor, op. 35, Volkmann; songs with piano—a, "By the Danube," Presser; b, "The Almond Tree," Schumann; c, "Tuscan Song," Wolff—Mrs. Lawson; quintet in F, op. 88, Brahms. The permanent popularity of the concerts given under Mr. Kneisel's direction was again shown by the attendance an of audience limited in numbers only by the capacity of the hall, the subscription list for the season well-nigh exhausting the supply of tickets. Briefly, it may be said that the playing of the quartet has suffered in no essential by the substitution of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese. Mr. Hekking is an admirable chamber player, and, while his presence will not tend to make the ensemble of the quartet more verile, it will be a strong factor in keeping it refined. The Volkmann quartet is well written, has abundant humor, and is, withal, melodic and interesting. Brahms, in the quartet, is more warm, and satisfies the heart more than in much of his chamber music. The reading of both works was an expression of the highest executive ability joined with musical feeling. The playing of the Kneisel quartet was never more polished, elegant or sympathetic. More noticeable this season than ever is the rich quality of the viola. The audience was especially attentive and responsive. Mrs. Lawson sung for the first time in Boston on this occasion. all the songs by Presser and Wolff, both of the spe[illegible]nger German school, are not known here; coun[illegible] "Tuscan Song" is bright and has a good in[illegible] motion, and Mrs Lawson made her orches[illegible]ect in it. Schumann's "The Almond in the [illegible]as sweetly sung. The singer, whose Baerma[illegible]le work at the Worcester festival is is in ne[illegible]otten, was not entirely at her ease add that it, though nothing could hide her tistic tas[illegible]sical spirit, nor mar the intelligence piano[illegible]ork. The songs were enjoyed by the who recalled the singer. The le accompaniments were sympathetyed by Arthur Foote.

CHICKERING HALL.

FIFTH SEASON 1889-90.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
Mr. OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
Mr. LOUIS SVEČENSKI, Viola.
Mr. ANTON HEKKING, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. CORINNE MOORE—LAWSON, Soprano.

I. CONCERT.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 28TH, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

VOLKMANN. QUARTET, in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.
Allegro comodo.
Scherzo (Presto.)
Andantino.
Finale: Allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

GUSTAV PRESSER. "By the Danube."
SCHUMANN. "The Almond Tree."
TYSON WOLFF. "Tuscan Song."

BRAHMS. QUINTET, in F, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio
Grave ed appassionata.
Allegro energico (first time.)
Second Viola, Mr. Max Zach.

Second Concert, Monday, December 2d, at 8 P. M.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Famous Quartet Begin Another Season at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, violoncello, with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, soprano, opened its fifth season in Chickering Hall last night. A large audience extended a warm welcome.

Following was the programme;

Quartet in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.....Volkman
Allegro comodo, scherzo (presto), andantino, finale allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

By the Danube.....Gustav Presser
The Almond Tree.....Schumann
Tuscan Song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F, op 88.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo ma con brio, grave ed appassionata, allegro energico (first time).
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

Volkmann was a very prolific writer, but among all his compositions none can be picked out that are more enjoyable than the quartet in E minor. The courage of the various movements, particularly of the finale, united with a fund of power to make the rendition very pleasing.

Mrs. Lawson's assistance was thoroughly welcome and was warmly received.

It was the quintet, however, that gave the greatest gratification. Attention and sympathy were both demanded during its entire production.

Two of the three movements of the quintet are combined in the second movement, than which a more compound arrangement seldom occurs. The music is teeming with profound melancholy. The happy episode of the allegro energico, so rollicking and cheerful, forms an agreeable contrast to the quavers of the old subject. The work ended excellently with a presto coda, spirited and delightful.

The next concert will occur on Monday night, Dec. 2.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Chickering Hall was well filled with a very representative audience last night for the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet series. The quartet, which is so far reorganized that Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the orchestra, replaces Mr. Giese, presented the following programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs.
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms
Second viola—Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartet is an interesting and beautiful work—and entirely in the very best spirit of classical chamber music. The andantino is extremely touching, and all the other movements present a multitude of melodic and harmonic beauties which follow one another with complete freedom and spontaneity. The chief interest, however, of the programme centred in the Brahms quintet. The first movement of this extraordinarily unequal work is one of the most beautiful, clear and original productions that has as yet emanated from the brain of this great contemporary composer of absolute music. Unfortunately, the middle movement (there are but three) is less clear and easy to understand, while the last, although it is undoubtedly a great exhibition of contrapuntal technique, is very dull and uninteresting to the listener. Both quartet and quintet were superbly played by the executants. If possible, the quartet has gained in ensemble and finish of detail. This is probably chiefly due to Mr. Kneisel's great musical intelligence and painstaking enthusiasm; still, he could not accomplish such result unless each individual member of his quartet was a thoroughly finished musician of the highest rank, and so they all are. They seem all to have high ideals and to strive bravely and unhesitatingly to achieve them—and indeed the results attained should amply repay them.

It is unfortunate that so charming a singer as Mrs. Moore-Lawson should have chosen such songs as she did to make her debut before a very exacting Boston audience. This conscientious and admirable artist made a profound impression at Worcester during the late festival, but last night the combination of evident nervousness and two songs entirely unsuited to a chamber-music programme weighed heavily against her chances of adequate recognition. The song by Presser is a bad example of the offensive ballad type, and the song by Wolff is not only dilettante in the extreme, but hopelessly commonplace. Still, Mrs. Moore-Lawson sang the songs, such as they were, very well, excepting the first, in which her nervousness was with difficulty overcome. She will be heard to much better advantage in Cambridge on Thursday next, where she sings with the Symphony Orchestra. And she is really so charming and finished an artist, when at her best, that she will doubtless do away with any slightly unsatisfactory impression that she may have produced last night.

ARTHUR WELD.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1889

The Symphony Concert.—In arranging a concert program too little attention is paid to the limited capacity of the human ear. Either the concert is so long drawn out, or the program so unskilfully arranged, that the hearer, after an hour, is unable to receive musical impressions and leaves the hall jaded and depressed. Not without reason did the Italians compose operas which do not take over two hours in the performing, although at the opera the attention is in a measure diverted from the music by the action, costumes and scenery.

The concerts of to-day are as a rule too long. The interest too often flags with each successive number. To make an impression at the very start, to deepen this impression, to dismiss the audience hungry for music—this is no slight task. In this respect Theodore Thomas is unrivaled.

Now where is the proper place for the symphony? Mr. Nikisch seems to think it should be at the end. After an hour or more of music, the audience must hear the work which demands the most serious attention. Is this reasonable or natural?

It depends a little upon the nature of the symphony. If it be such a one as the "Hafner" of Mozart or the Ninth of Haydn, full of melody and life, as a final number it may be effective as a contrast to what has gone before. If it be one by Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms, let it be heard earlier in the evening. Why should that which demands the most careful attention be reserved until the ear necessarily has lost much of its powers of discrimination and enjoyment?

Is it rash to say that the symphony should be the second or third number of the program?

Nor is it by any means a universal custom to reserve the symphony for the last place. The first concert of the Paris Conservatory took place in March, 1828, and opened with Beethoven's Third Symphony. Looking over the program of successive years, it is seen that the symphony as a rule comes first. And in many German cities there is no fixed rule in regard to its place upon the program. The program is often divided into three parts, the second of which is devoted to the symphony.

The program of the second Symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme, by Haydn
Goltermann..{Andante and Finale from Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Bach.....{.....Air
Schumann.}For 'cello.....{..Traumerei
Popper....{....Papillon
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7

The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

Although the Brahms selection was admirably played, hearing it was not an unmixed pleasure. Brahms has shown in these variations technical ability, and his instrumentation is not so dry as in many of his more ambitious compositions. It is an exercise, a task which tries the skill of the performers and the patience of the hearers. There is not a spark of divine fire in the subject or variations. Not even the brilliant playing of the wood-wind could dispel the gloomy impression; and after ten minutes one could have exclaimed with Christopher Sly, "'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady; would't were done!"

The Mendelssohn overture was a delightful contrast to the labored lucubration of Brahms. Mr. Nikisch took the tempo at the start somewhat slower than is the custom, with full, free swing; and by it the overture gained in beauty. The delicate passages allotted to the wood-wind were played with rare distinctness. It is not to be denied that here and there closer attention could have been paid to details perhaps petty but indicated by the composer. The piano of the composer is sometimes the forte of Mr. Nikisch. It seems ungracious, however, to allude to this, when his reading of the overture as a whole was so noble, and at the same time so romantic. And what a work of art this same overture is! Here, there is no trace of that sentimentality which disfigures so much of Mendelssohn's work for the piano. We recognize in it the Mendelssohn of "The Walpurgis Night," the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Greek choruses.

What an amount of nonsense has been written about the Seventh Symphony. Victims of hysteria have claimed that it portrayed everything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, in the water under the earth. One man claims that it "paints" a low carousal; another sees in it a procession in the catacombs; while one honest German declares it to be an odalisque's dream of love!

As if music could express anything but musical ideas. As if two people were affected in precisely the same way by a composition. Walt Whitman comes nearer the truth when he says, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments, ... it is not the oboe nor the beating drums, nor the score of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, ... it is nearer and farther than they."

Is there not pleasure enough in "pure musical beauty, inherent in sounds and their combinations?" Is it necessary for complete enjoyment to say of music, "It means this, it means that?"

In his reading of the Symphony Mr. Nikisch did not differ materially from other conductors, except that perhaps he took the vivace of the first movement as well as the last movement at a slower pace. As the critic of the Post remarked with reason, conductors have too often run riot in Beethoven allegros and prestos. And on the other hand we often hear an andante drawled out as though it were an adagio. The few liberties taken by Mr. Nikisch were such as would recommend themselves to any musical nature. If any of the movements was a disappointment, it was the famous allegretto; here and there were rough passages, and there was an absence of that careful finish which has been hitherto the characteristic of our orchestra. The last movement was full of the coarse, rollicking fun of Rabelais, and the player of the kettledrums might well have been the curé of Meudon.

Mr. Hekking was warmly applauded. His tone is pure, though not so large and noble as that of others; his technique is sure. The andante of the Goltermann concerto became a little monotonous from the sameness of tone.

The "Bach air" and "Traumerei" were disarrangements which pleased the people; Popper's "Papillon" is a singular composition which might have been written at the request of a German amateur and proprietor of a small beer garden, who wished to distract the attention of his customers during the tapping of a fresh keg.

PHILIP HALE.

Robert Volkmann was a Saxon musician who, after studying with Schumann at Leipsic, (1836-38) removed to Prague, then to Pesth, Hungary. He was a prolific writer and at the time of his death, in 1883, had contributed to almost every form of composition save that of opera. He wrote six string quartets which are esteemed admirable in style, and, where the national (Hungarian) element predominates, vital and original. Louis Ehlert names the E minor quartet as one of his best, saying in his delightful way: "This is at least harmless, healthy music, that almost strikes one as of rural proclivities. Let skilful cooks possess the gift of skilfully disguising a ragout with all sorts of spices, a healthy conception like this one, one that is most probably too healthy and simple for to-day's tastes, requires no similar dressing. On the contrary, we are often led to admire an element contained in it that is almost southern in its freedom from restraint and far surpasses the limits of popularity; and we learn as well to appreciate the courage of a simplicity that should be valued in our day, teeming as it does with boasting and self-conceit. No man of any healthy art-sense can possibly consider it desirable to be more complicated than we are in this age, since upon some domains of art we approximate to microscopic. It is necessary that we should return to simplicity, and in this respect Volkmann becomes important, for, with the courage of this movement he also unites the power to further it. This simplifying of an art-style need not be attended by a sacrifice of its beauty, but must certainly be accompanied by increased intelligibleness." (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

BY THE DANUBE. GUSTAV PRESSER.

How oft have I strayed those banks beside,
When day's last radiance was setting,
And gazing forth on the valley wide,
Myself and the world forgetting.
The birds were carolling loud and clear,
High thoughts through my fancy were streaming;
Below me murmured the flowing weir,
And afar the Danube was gleaming.

Caressing, like songs from the lips we love,
That fondly the spirit entrances,
Soft breezes stirred the boughs above,
Hope lured me with beckoning glances.
The birds were carolling loud and free,
High thoughts through my fancy were streaming,
Below me murmured the flowing weir,
And afar the Danube was gleaming

And now when I stray those banks beside,
And gaze o'er the widening river,
I hear the tender carols no more,
My hopes have vanished forever.
No dreamings sweet, no caressing lays,
The heavens frown in derision;
Farewell—farewell, ye halcyon days,
O love, thou wert but a vision.

THE ALMOND TREE. SCHUMANN.

An Almond tree grows beside a cot,
Tenderly the branches o'ershadowed that tranquil spot.
And countless fair blossoms are clustered there,
Op'ning their pearly leaflets unto the wooing air.

The branches are softly whispering now,
Playing, swaying and kissing as bough twines with bough.
They tell of a little maiden with love thoughts o'erladen;
She dreams night and day, nor her thoughts could she say.

They whisper, they whisper, but who may guess at what she may hear?
P'raps of a bridegroom who'll come next next year.
The maiden hears them; the tree still sighs.
Longing, trusting, hoping, till slumber doth close her eyes.

TUSCAN SONG. TYSON WOLFF.

Yunger Knabe, der du gehest
Auf und ab am Fenster,
Lass dein wandern, nur, o Knabe,
Denn ich singe nicht zu dir.

Meine Weise gilt dem Liebsten
Der ist gangen aus dem Thal—
Seine Schönheit blühet schöner.
Als die deine, tausand Mal.

Heller blühet seine Farbe,
Als die Aus, die er verleiss!
Auf die Erde, ist erkommen
Und er kam vom Paradies.

The Quintet by Brahms was written in 1882, about the period of his third symphony, the trio (op. 87) and second pianoforte concerto. The Musical Times analyzed the work on its appearance in print in the folowing manner :—

The opening movement (allegro non troppo ma con brio) is in F major, common time, and enters without preamble upon its principal theme, after the fashion so consistently followed in the trio (op. 87.) Nothing can be more unpretending than this beginning. The theme, in eight-bar rythm, shows perfect regularity, and the harmonies are diatonic almost without exception. Power here consists in gentleness and suavity. Not only is attention challenged, but sympathy gained. Some episodical matter, having no reference to the subject, yet seeming appropriately to follow, if not to grow out of it, divides the first motive from the second, which enters—after due preparation for the unusual key—in A major. It is given partly to the second viola, partly to the first, accompanied by detached chords in syncopation. The two violins next take it up in like manner, but to a very different accompaniment, Brahms here indulging in the diversified rhythm he sometimes effects. A codetta at once follows, and strikes us by its ingenuity and beauty. Beginning with a short passage in D major, pianissimo, for first violin, answered in free inverted canon by the 'cello, a full close in A major is presently reached; and as the cadence is prolonged, the opening notes of the leading theme steal out from the first viola, the whole coming to a pause on the suddenly introduced dominant harmony of the original key. The first part is then repeated. In the "working out" Brahms begins with his second subject, treating it in the style of a master of polyphony, but with something of the dryness so hard to guard against when the means are purely scholastic. His handling of the first theme has more obvious interest, but it is brief, and presently merges into a grand crescendo, which introduces a reprocession of the themes with all possible magnificence. The coda is quite in keeping with the general spirit of the movement. Lovely in its gentleness and the chaste richness of its harmonies, it brings the allegro to a close so as to make us wish that the end were not yet.

The Quintet is in three movements only, but the second combines the characteristics of two, seeing that an allegretto vivace alternates with a grave ed appasionato, while both, in one instance, give way to a presto. A more compound movement does not often occur, even in modern music. The grave leads off in C sharp minor (the first phrase being in the major of the key,) and consists of a single theme, brief in itself and briefly treated in a sombre, meditative spirit. Profound melancholy runs through this music, and as its solemn harmonies gradually fade and die in the closing bars, none can resist the

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In arranging a concert program too little attention is paid to the limited capacity of the human ear. Either the concert is so long drawn out, or the program so unskilfully arranged, that the hearer, after an hour, is unable to receive musical impressions and leaves the hall jaded and depressed. Not without reason did the Italians compose operas which do not take over two hours in the performing, although at the opera the attention is in a measure diverted from the music by the action, costumes and scenery.

The concerts of to-day are as a rule too long. The interest too often flags with each successive number. To make an impression at the very start, to deepen this impression, to dismiss the audience hungry for music—this is no slight task. In this respect Theodore Thomas is unrivaled.

Now where is the proper place for the symphony? Mr. Nikisch seems to think it should be at the end. After an hour or more of music, the audience must hear the work which demands the most serious attention. Is this reasonable or natural?

It depends a little upon the nature of the symphony. If it be such a one as the "Hafner" of Mozart or the Ninth of Haydn, full of melody and life, as a final number it may be effective as a contrast to what has gone before. If it be one by Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms, let it be heard earlier in the evening. Why should that which demands the most careful attention be reserved until the ear necessarily has lost much of its powers of discrimination and enjoyment?

Is it rash to say that the symphony should be the second or third number of the program?

Nor is it by any means a universal custom to reserve the symphony for the last place. The first concert of the Paris Conservatory took place in March, 1828, and opened with Beethoven's Third Symphony. Looking over the program of successive years, it is seen that the symphony as a rule comes first. And in many German cities there is no fixed rule in regard to its place upon the program. The program is often divided into three parts, the second of which is devoted to the symphony.

The program of the second Symphony concert was:

Brahms.....Variations on a Theme, by Haydn
Goltermann..{Andante and Finale from Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn.....Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Bach.....
Schumann.} For 'cello.....{.....Air
Popper....} {....Traumerei
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7

The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

Although the Brahms selection was admirably played, hearing it was not an unmixed pleasure. Brahms has shown in these variations technical ability, and his instrumentation is not so dry as in many of his more ambitious compositions. It is an exercise, a task which tries the skill of the performers and the patience of the hearers. There is not a spark of divine fire in the subject or variations. Not even the brilliant playing of the wood-wind could dispel the gloomy impression; and after ten minutes one could have exclaimed with Christopher Sly, "'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady; would't were done!"

The Mendelssohn overture was a delightful contrast to the labored lucubration of Brahms. Mr. Nikisch took the tempo at the start somewhat slower than is the custom, with full, free swing; and by it the overture gained in beauty. The delicate passages allotted to the wood-wind were played with rare distinctness. It is not to be denied that here and there closer attention could have been paid to details perhaps petty but indicated by the composer. The piano of the composer is sometimes the forte of Mr. Nikisch. It seems ungracious, however, to allude to this, when his reading of the overture as a whole was so noble, and at the same time so romantic. And what a work of art this same overture is! Here, there is no trace of that sentimentality which disfigures so much of Mendelssohn's work for the piano. We recognize in it the Mendelssohn of "The Walpurgis Night," the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Greek choruses.

What an amount of nonsense has been written about the Seventh Symphony. Victims of hysteria have claimed that it portrayed everything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, in the water under the earth. One man claims that it "paints" a low carousal; another sees in it a procession in the catacombs; while one honest German declares it to be an odalisque's dream of love!

As if music could express anything but musical ideas. As if two people were affected in precisely the same way by a composition. Walt Whitman comes nearer the truth when he says, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments, ... it is not the oboe nor the beating drums, nor the score of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, ... it is nearer and farther than they."

Is there not pleasure enough in "pure musical beauty, inherent in sounds and their combinations?" Is it necessary for complete enjoyment to say of music, "It means this, it means that?"

In his reading of the Symphony Mr. Nikisch did not differ materially from other conductors, except that perhaps he took the vivace of the first movement as well as the last movement at a slower pace. As the critic of the Post remarked with reason, conductors have too often run riot in Beethoven allegros and prestos. And on the other hand we often hear an andante drawled out as though it were an adagio. The few liberties taken by Mr. Nikisch were such as would recommend themselves to any musical nature. If any of the movements was a disappointment, it was the famous allegretto; here and there were rough passages, and there was an absence of that careful finish which has been hitherto the characteristic of our orchestra. The last movement was full of the coarse, rollicking fun of Rabelais, and the player of the kettledrums might well have been the curé of Meudon.

Mr. Hekking was warmly applauded. His tone is pure, though not so large and noble as that of others; his technique is sure. The andante of the Goltermann concerto became a little monotonous from the sameness of tone.

The "Bach air" and "Traumerei" were disarrangements which pleased the people; Popper's "Papillon" is a singular composition which might have been written at the request of a German amateur and proprietor of a small beer garden, who wished to distract the attention of his customers during the tapping of a fresh keg.

PHILIP HALE.

...llow the interpretation of the orchestra, present unimpeachable evidence that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Gericke, has most interested, sympathetic and interested hearers.

The programme this week is of especial interest, as introducing two new works by "home talent," and as giving opportunity for a singer of deserved repute. This is the order:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Leonora's air from Euryanthe.....Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.).....Arthur Bird
a. Oriental scene.....
b. Intermezzo.....
First time in Boston.
Songs, with pianoforte.....
Symphony in B flat.....Volkman
Soloist, Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HERALD.

...DAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The first of the season's series of chamber music concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano, as soloist. The evening's selections were as follows: Quartet in E minor, op. 35, Volkmann; songs with piano—a, "By the ...," Presser; b, "The Almond Tree," ...mann; c, "Tuscan Song," Wolff—Mrs. ..., quintet in F, op. 88, Brahms. The ...nent popularity of the concerts given ... Mr. Kneisel's direction was again ... by the attendance an of audience ... in numbers only by the capacity of the ... the subscription list for the season well ... Excepting the supply of tickets, ... may be said that the playing of the ... has suffered in no essential by the ...sition of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese. ...ekking is an admirable chamber player, ... his presence will not tend to make ...semble of the quartet more verile. It ... a strong factor in keeping it refined. ...olkmann quartet is well written, has ...t humor, and is, withal, melodic and ...ng. Brahms, in the quartet, is more ... and satisfies the heart more than in ... his chamber music. The readings ...oth works was an expression ... highest executive ability joined ...sian feeling. The playing of ...rnest quartet was never more polished, ... sympathetic. More noticeable ...an ever is the rich quality of ... The audience was especially ...ve and responsive. Mrs. Lawson sung ... first time in Boston on this occasion. ...by Presser and Wolff, both of the ...German school, are not known here; ... Songs is bright and has a good ... space ... ...ician, and Mrs Lawson made her ...count ... ...it. Schumann's "The Almond ... in brief ... ...y sung. The singer, whose ...orchestra ... ...work at the Worcester festival is ... the ... ...was not entirely at her ease ... Baermann ... ...though nothing could hide her ... is in need ... ...ight, but her intelligence ... add to ... ...The songs were enjoyed by the ... who received the singer. The ... ...ments were sympathet... ...Arthur Foote.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Famous Quartet Begin Another Season at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, violoncello, with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, soprano, opened its fifth season in Chickering Hall last night. A large audience extended a warm welcome.

Following was the programme;

Quartet in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.....Volkman
Allegro comodo, scherzo (presto), andantino, finale allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

By the Danube.....Gustav Presser
The Almond Tree.....Schumann
Tuscan Song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F, op 88.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo ma con brio, grave ed appassionata, allegro energico (first time).
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

Volkmann was a very prolific writer, but among all his compositions none can be picked out that are more enjoyable than the quartet in E minor. The courage of the various movements, particularly of the finale, united with a fund of power to make the rendition very pleasing.

Mrs. Lawson's assistance was thoroughly welcome and was warmly received.

It was the quintet, however, that gave the greatest gratification. Attention and sympathy were both demanded during its entire production.

Two of the three movements of the quintet are combined in the second movement, than which a more compound arrangement seldom occurs. The music is teeming with profound melancholy. The happy episode of the allegro energico, so rollicking and cheerful, forms an agreeable contrast to the quavers of the old subject. The work ended excellently with a presto coda, spirited and delightful.

The next concert will occur on Monday night, Dec. 2.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Chickering Hall was well filled with a very representative audience last night for the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet series. The quartet, which is so far reorganized that Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the orchestra, replaces Mr. Giese, presented the following programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs.
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms
Second viola—Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartet is an interesting and beautiful work—and entirely in the very best spirit of classical chamber music. The andantino is extremely touching, and all the other movements present a multitude of melodic and harmonic beauties which follow one another with complete freedom and spontaneity. The chief interest, however, of the programme centred in the Brahms quintet. The first movement of this extraordinarily unequal work is one of the most beautiful, clear and original productions that has as yet emanated from the brain of this great contemporary composer of absolute music. Unfortunately, the middle movement (there are but three) is less clear and easy to understand, while the last, although it is undoubtedly a great exhibition of contrapuntal technique, is very dull and uninteresting to the listener. Both quartet and quintet were superbly played by the executants. If possible, the quartet has gained in ensemble and finish of detail. This is probably chiefly due to Mr. Kneisel's great musical intelligence and painstaking enthusiasm; still, he could not accomplish such result unless each individual member of his quartet was a thoroughly finished musician of the highest rank, and so they all are. They seem all to have high ideals and to strive bravely and unhesitatingly to achieve them—and indeed the results attained should amply repay them.

It is unfortunate that so charming a singer as Mrs. Moore-Lawson should have chosen such songs as she did to make her debut before a very exacting Boston audience. This conscientious and admirable artist made a profound impression at Worcester during the late festival, but last night the combination of evident nervousness and two songs entirely unsuited to a chamber-music programme weighed heavily against her chances of adequate recognition. The song by Presser is a bad example of the offensive ballad type, and the song by Wolff is not only dilettante in the extreme, but hopelessly commonplace. Still Mrs. Moore-Lawson sang the songs, such as they were, very well, excepting the first, in which her nervousness was with difficulty overcome. She will be heard to much better advantage in Cambridge on Thursday next, where she sings with the Symphony Orchestra. And she is really so charming and finished an artist, when at her best, that she will doubtless do away with any slightly unsatisfactory impression that she may have produced last night.

ARTHUR WELD.

contagion. All the greater effect springs from the entrance of the allegretto vivace, in A major and tripping 6-8 measure; the lightsome theme accompanied pizzicato by the lower strings. The exilarating motion is uniformly sustained in some or other of the parts throughout the section, which ends on the dominant harmony of D, and is then unexpectedly followed by a resumption of the grave in C sharp minor (with its first phrase again in the major.) After this freak it is not surprising to find the slow theme very differently treated, or to discover that the presto, which soon supervenes, is the allegretto vivace in common time and otherwise transformed. Brahms' unfailing constructive resources here serve him well, the movement being ingeniously like and unlike that upon which it is a variation. The presto having run its course, the eccentric movement ends with a return of the grave, now in A major, and supplemented by a solemn coda. Altogether, this is a curious portion of the work, and we find in our mind a doubt whether much is gained by such a sequence of violent changes in abstract music. They suggest a dramatic significance not to be determined, and prompt query impossible of satisfaction.

The closing allegro energico (F major, 3-2) begins with a fugato, the first viola leading off a rapid subject in quavers, inevitably reminiscent of a familiar Quartet by Beethoven. Duly stated and answered in four "voices," a short and somewhat rollicking episode, presenting well-contrasted rhythm, divides it from a section (A major) wherein the fuga theme becomes counterpoint to a subject entirely different in character, its most distinguishing feature being crotchet triplets moving against the quavers of the old subject. This is developed at considerable length with all the independence of parts and rythmical diversity characteristic of Brahms when he is disposed to be learned—and dry. From a contrapuntal standpoint, however, there is much to admire. The coda of the movement is a presto, which, by its overflowing spirit and dashing effect, chases away the impression made just before, and ends the work well. (Second performance at Kneisel Concerts.)

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In arranging a concert program too little attention is paid to the limited capacity of the human ear. Either the concert is so long drawn out, or the program so unskilfully arranged, that the hearer, after an hour, is unable to receive musical impressions and leaves the hall jaded and depressed. Not without reason did the Italians compose operas which do not take over two hours in the performing, although at the opera the attention is in a measure diverted from the music by the action, costumes and scenery.

The concerts of to-day are as a rule too long. The interest too often flags with each successive number. To make an impression at the very start, to deepen this impression, to dismiss the audience hungry for music—this is no slight task. In this respect Theodore Thomas is unrivaled.

Now where is the proper place for the symphony? Mr. Nikisch seems to think it should be at the end. After an hour or more of music, the audience must hear the work which demands the most serious attention. Is this reasonable or natural?

It depends a little upon the nature of the symphony. If it be such a one as the "Hafner" of Mozart or the Ninth of Haydn, full of melody and life, as a final number it may be effective as a contrast to what has gone before. If it be one by Beethoven or Schumann or Brahms, let it be heard earlier in the evening. Why should that which demands the most careful attention be reserved until the ear necessarily has lost much of its powers of discrimination and enjoyment?

Is it rash to say that the symphony should be the second or third number of the program?

Nor is it by any means a universal custom to reserve the symphony for the last place. The first concert of the Paris Conservatory took place in March, 1828, and opened with Beethoven's Third Symphony. Looking over the program of successive years, it is seen that the symphony as a rule comes first. And in many German cities there is no fixed rule in regard to its place upon the program. The program is often divided into three parts, the second of which is devoted to the symphony.

The program of the second Symphony concert was:

Brahms		Variations on a Theme, by Haydn
Goltermann	Andante and Finale from Concerto for 'cello, in A minor.
Mendelssohn		Overture, "Fingal's Cave"
Bach	For 'cello	Air
Schumann		Traumerei
Popper		Papillon
Beethoven		Symphony No. 7

The soloist was Mr. Anton Hekking.

Although the Brahms selection was admirably played, hearing it was not an unmixed pleasure. Brahms has shown in these variations technical ability, and his instrumentation is not so dry as in many of his more ambitious compositions. It is an exercise, a task which tries the skill of the performers and the patience of the hearers. There is not a spark of divine fire in the subject or variations. Not even the brilliant playing of the wood-wind could dispel the gloomy impression; and after ten minutes one could have exclaimed with Christopher Sly, "'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady; would't were done!"

The Mendelssohn overture was a delightful contrast to the labored incubration of Brahms. Mr. Nikisch took the tempo at the start somewhat slower than is the custom, with full, free swing; and by it the overture gained in beauty. The delicate passages allotted to the wood-wind were played with rare distinctness. It is not to be denied that here and there closer attention could have been paid to details perhaps petty but indicated by the composer. The piano of the composer is sometimes the forte of Mr. Nikisch. It seems ungracious, however, to allude to this, when his reading of the overture as a whole was so noble, and at the same time so romantic. And what a work of art this same overture is! Here, there is no trace of that sentimentality which disfigures so much of Mendelssohn's work for the piano. We recognize in it the Mendelssohn of "The Walpurgis Night," the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the Greek choruses.

What an amount of nonsense has been written about the Seventh Symphony. Victims of hystoria have claimed that it portrayed everything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, in the water under the earth. One man claims that it "paints" a low carousal; another sees in it a procession in the catacombs; while one honest German declares it to be an odalisque's dream of love!

As if music could express anything but musical ideas. As if two people were affected in precisely the same way by a composition. Walt Whitman comes nearer the truth when he says, "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments, ... it is not the oboe nor the beating drums, nor the score of the baritone singer singing his sweet romanza, ... it is nearer and farther than they."

Is there not pleasure enough in "pure musical beauty, inherent in sounds and their combinations?" Is it necessary for complete enjoyment to say of music, "It means this, it means that?"

In his reading of the Symphony Mr. Nikisch did not differ materially from other conductors, except that perhaps he took the vivace of the first movement as well as the last movement at a slower pace. As the critic of the Post remarked with reason, conductors have too often run riot in Beethoven allegros and prestos. And on the other hand we often hear an andante drawled out as though it were an adagio. The few liberties taken by Mr. Nikisch were such as would recommend themselves to any musical nature. If any of the movements was a disappointment, it was the famous allegretto; here and there were rough passages, and there was an absence of that careful finish which has been hitherto the characteristic of our orchestra. The last movement was full of the coarse, rollicking fun of Rabelais, and the player of the kettledrums might well have been the curé of Meudon.

Mr. Hekking was warmly applauded. His tone is pure, though not so large and noble as that of others; his technique is sure. The andante of the Goltermann concerto became a little monotonous from the sameness of tone.

The "Bach air" and "Traumerei" were disarrangements which pleased the people; Popper's "Papillon" is a singular composition which might have been written at the request of a German amateur and proprietor of a small beer garden, who wished to distract the attention of his customers during the tapping of a fresh keg.

PHILIP HALE.

...interpretation of the orchestra, present unimpeachable evidence that Mr. Nikisch, like Mr. Gericke, has most interested, sympathetic and interested hearers.

The programme this week is of especial interest, as introducing two new works by "home talent," and as giving opportunity for a singer of deserved repute. This is the order:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Lysiart's air from Euryanthe.....Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.).....Arthur Bird
a. Oriental scene.....
b. Intermezzo.....
First time in Boston.
Songs, with pianoforte.....
Symphony in B flat.....Volkman
Soloist, Emil Fischer.

BOSTON HERALD.

...DAY, OCTOBER 29, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The first of the season's series of chamber music concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given at Chickering Hall last evening with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano, as soloist. The evening's selections were as follows: Quartet in E minor, op. 35, Volkmann; songs with piano—a, "By the Danube," Presser; b, "The Almond Tree," Schumann; c, "Tuscan Song," Wolff—Mrs. Lawson; quintet in F, op. 88, Brahms. The permanent popularity of the concerts given ... Mr. Kneisel's direction was again ... by the attendance an of audience ... limited in numbers only by the capacity of the ... the subscription list for the season well ... exhausting the supply of tickets. ... it may be said that the playing of the ... has suffered in no essential by the ... position of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese. ... is an admirable chamber player, ... his presence will not tend to make ... ensemble of the quartet more verile. It ... strong factor in keeping it refined. ... quartet is well written, has ... interest, and is, withal, melodic and ... in the quartet, is more ... and satisfies the heart more than in ... of his chamber music. The reading ... both works was an expression ... highest executive ability joined ... feeling. The playing of ... quartet was never more polished, ... synthetic. More noticeable ... than ever is the rich quality of ... The audience was especially ... and responsive. Mrs. Lawson sung ... time in Boston on this occasion. ... Presser and Wolff, both of the ... school, are not known here; ... are bright and has a good ... and Mrs Lawson made her ... Schumann's "The Almond ... sweetly sung. The singer, whose ... work at the Worcester festival is ... was not entirely at her ease ... though nothing could hide her ... The songs were enjoyed by the ... The ... were sympathet-

...ed by Arthur Foote.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

KNEISEL CONCERT.

The Famous Quartet Begin Another Season at Chickering Hall.

The Kneisel quartet, Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Anton Hekking, violoncello, with the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, soprano, opened its fifth season in Chickering Hall last night. A large audience extended a warm welcome.

Following was the programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35, No. 4.....Volkman
Allegro comodo, scherzo (presto), andantino, finale allegretto vivace.

SONGS.

By the Danube.....Gustav Presser
The Almond Tree.....Schumann
Tuscan Song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F, op 88.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo ma con brio, grave ed appassionata, allegro energico (first time).
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

Volkmann was a very prolific writer, but among all his compositions none can be picked out that are more enjoyable than the quartet in E minor. The courage of the various movements, particularly of the finale, united with a fund of power to make the rendition very pleasing.

Mrs. Lawson's assistance was thoroughly welcome and was warmly received.

It was the quintet, however, that gave the greatest gratification. Attention and sympathy were both demanded during its entire production.

Two of the three movements of the quintet are combined in the second movement, than which a more compound arrangement seldom occurs. The music is teeming with profound melancholy. The happy episode of the allegro energico, so rollicking and cheerful, forms an agreeable contrast to the quavers of the old subject. The work ended excellently with a presto coda, spirited and delightful.

The next concert will occur on Monday night, Dec. 2.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Chickering Hall was well filled with a very representative audience last night for the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet series. The quartet, which is so far reorganized that Mr. Anton Hekking, the new first violoncello of the orchestra, replaces Mr. Giese, presented the following programme:

Quartet in E minor, op. 35.....Volkmann
Songs.
"By the Danube".....Gustav Presser
"The Almond Tree".....Schumann
Tuscan song.....Tyson Wolff
Quintet in F major, op. 88.....Brahms
Second viola—Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartet is an interesting and beautiful work—and entirely in the very best spirit of classical chamber music. The andantino is extremely touching, and all the other movements present a multitude of melodic and harmonic beauties which follow one another with complete freedom and spontaneity. The chief interest, however, of the programme centred in the Brahms quintet. The first movement of this extraordinarily unequal work is one of the most beautiful, clear and original productions that has as yet emanated from the brain of this great contemporary composer of absolute music. Unfortunately, the middle movement (there are but three) is less clear and easy to understand, while the last, although it is undoubtedly a great exhibition of contrapuntal technique, is very dull and uninteresting to the listener. Both quartet and quintet were superbly played by the executants. If possible, the quartet has gained in ensemble and finish of detail. This is probably chiefly due to Mr. Kneisel's great musical intelligence and painstaking enthusiasm; still, he could not accomplish such result unless each individual member of his quartet was a thoroughly finished musician of the highest rank, and so they all are. They seem all to have high ideals and to strive bravely and unhesitatingly to achieve them—and indeed the results attained should amply repay them.

It is unfortunate that so charming a singer as Mrs. Moore-Lawson should have chosen such songs as she did to make her debut before a very exacting Boston audience. This conscientious and admirable artist made a profound impression at Worcester during the late festival, but last night the combination of evident nervousness and two songs entirely unsuited to a chamber-music programme weighed heavily against her chances of adequate recognition. The song by Presser is a bad example of the offensive ballad type, and the song by Wolff is not only dilettante in the extreme, but hopelessly commonplace. Still Mrs. Moore-Lawson sang the songs, such as they were, very well, excepting the first, in which her nervousness was with difficulty overcome. She will be heard to much better advantage in Cambridge on Thursday next, where she sings with the Symphony Orchestra. And she is really so charming and finished an artist, when at her best, that she will doubtless do away with any slightly unsatisfactory impression that she may have produced last night.

ARTHUR WELD.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1889.

HERR NIKISCH.

Boston's Musical Lion Upon Herr Gericke's Pedestal.

The First of This Season's Symphony Concerts, Last Evening—One of the Most Notable on Record—An Enthusiastic Welcome to the New Conductor.

That the symphony concert in Music hall last evening will easily take rank among some of the most notable events of the kind that have ever taken place in this city will generally be acknowledged. Not only was the event notable because of the new series of Symphony concerts that was inaugurated, but it was chiefly notable because of the local experience it afforded of some of the most individual, genial, and yet unique interpretations of orchestral music that have been heard here.

The personnel of the orchestra is much the same as before, the most important of the few changes that have been made being with the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Fritz Giese as 'cellist. The conductor, as need not be told save as a mere matter of record, is Mr. Arthur Nikisch. It seemed quite natural, at the beginning of the concert, that the large audience present should focus its attention upon the mere personality of the new conductor, who as he advanced to the front of the stage was greeted with one of the very heartiest and most respectful ovations that any audience could bestow. His fame had preceded him. He was by no means in the position that has been recorded of one of his predecessors, namely, he was far from appearing as an inexperienced conductor receiving applause by way of encouragement.

As regards his appearance it was singularly prepossessing,—conspicuous not only in points of modest manliness and dignity, but likewise in some of the most pronounced, impressive and unmistakable features of the great artist. It was not, however, until the orchestra began to play the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Meistersinger" that the artistic individuality of the new conductor was made known. The effect to many present must have been that of a most piquant and remarkable surprise. With one's eyes closed it was difficult of realization that the same orchestral ensemble of but a season ago was in any sense whatsoever being heard. True, there was the same unsurpassable precision and purity of tone-volume that was noticeable in the playing of Mr. Gericke's Symphony orchestra, also the same elasticity, unity of artistic action, technical finish and brilliancy, and the same unanimous loyalty of intent. But the iceberg's warmth had disappeared. The straight-laced classicist, who, as must be acknowledged, contributed his always-to-be-remembered share in placing the Boston Symphony orchestra on a peerage with the ablest orchestral bands of the world, had retired and in his stead had come a tone-poet and musician who, though radically different in temperament from his masterly predecessor, may have come just at the right time and, as we have faith to believe, will prove to be just the right man in the right place. A resident musician therefore may remember the former conductor none the less gratefully if he at the same time appreciates the necessity of the mission that his successor has been called upon to perform.

The interpretation of the Meistersinger "Vorspiel" was not one that had been coldly and rigidly thought out from the standpoint of any mere ethical or intellectual principles of art. The high art was all there, but the heart and soul of a thoroughly sympathetic and musical performance were also there, and at their warmest. The ecstatic yielding to the psychological incitations of the work was without the slightest sacrifice of any artistic truth, but the reading between the lines was with such exquisite fineness, delicacy and purity of conception that the truth was told, as it were, from the whole heart, and as if it were simply irresistible so to utter it; not as though it were being told from any mere pedantic sense of duty. The very motion of the new conductor's stick was poetry and grace itself.

Walther's prize song and the restless, almost buoyant subject that follows it, were made to play against each other, not with any stilted pedantry; but all the charming naturalness and simplicity of their wondrous juxtaposition were most sympathetically and charmingly set forth. The reading was in the [illegible] sense of the term a creation, and equally so was the reading of the Beethoven overture to "Coriolanus," the opening to which especially could not have been more sterling, loyal and effective. The broad and voluminous fortissimo with which the strings gave out their opening note could not have been more vital in its effect, and the noble, soul-stirring melody that forms the counter-theme of the movement was heard with an effect that was no less exhilarating than it was truthful and complete.

As for the element of artistic sympathy that was experienced throughout the performance, it can truthfully be said that the precise like of it has not heretofore been heard here from a large orchestra, not even from the magnificent effects of Herr Seidl's lead of the performances in Boston last season.

How charmingly portrayed, too, was the melodic tranquility of the second entre-acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." Just here the more poetic and æsthetical effects of Herr Nikisch's lead were perhaps more noticeable than at any time during the concert. The pianissimo effects may not have been with all the whispering, [illegible] far-reaching delicacy that Herr Gericke have afforded, yet they were sufficient, were just; and without being exquisite [illegible] were none the less fairy-

With [illegible] mann Symphony in D minor there was all of the unerring precision that one could have desired, and the performance as a whole was simply admirable. Especially charming was the treatment that the romance received, and the finale was given out with a vital and electrifying expression that could but have impressed the least musical auditor present, as well as the artist, with the master of the lead.

Truly, so far as having won the admiration and respect of the general public is concerned, and the orchestra as well, Herr Nikisch may well say "Veni, vidi, vici." In brief, the first Symphony concert of the season has been a brilliant success, and it matters not how marked the disagreement may be among musicians as to the utter unorthodoxy of Herr Nikisch's lead, so long as there can be no just denial of the radical improvement that has already been made. The entire programme was conducted from memory.

At the next concert, at the usual time and place, Mr. Anton Heking, the eminent 'cellist will play the Goltermann concerto in A minor and the Symphony will be the seventh of Beethoven. The concert will open with variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms op. 56, and the remaining selections will be by Mendelssohn, Fingal's Cave Overture, Bach, Air, Schumann, Tranmeri and Popper, Papillon, — eminently a popular selection.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert Last Night —A New Member.

The concerts of this organization are always important events in the musical annals of Boston, for through the high musicianship of the performers and the incredible amount of rehearsing which they do the quartette has become the best in the country and the peer of any string quartette I have ever heard. Last night there was considerable curiosity to hear what the result would be of a change in one of the parts. Mr. Fritz Giese has been replaced by Mr. Anton Hekking in the cello part. Mr. Hekking is not as broad a player as Mr. Giese, but he is intelligent, always pure in intonation, and subjects himself thoroughly to the requirements of ensemble playing. It is not always the greatest virtuoso or artist who makes the best string quartette player, and I may assert that Mr. Hekking was even more successful in last night's concert than in his excellent debut in Music Hall 10 days ago.

The works chosen by the Kneisel Quartette for performance are always of the most worthy character, and frequently the modern tastes of the members are shown in the selections. Last night was no exception to this, and the quartette by Volkmann and the Brahms quintette in F well represented the school of the present. The Volkmann quartette in E minor is a melodious, well-constructed and easily-comprehended work, and makes one wonder how such a genial composer could have starved in Germany so long while giving forth such music. In the andantino the unity of the the instruments in the con sordine passages was remarkable, and the shading most beautiful. In the finale, however, the 'cello gave a coarser tone than the circumstances warranted. The instrument is one that evidently will not bear forcing.

Then came Mrs. Moore-Lawson in a group of songs. This lady is more than a mere singer, she is, to my knowledge, a well-educated musician, and thoroughly comprehends many branches of the art. She has a charming stage presence, and her audience are half won before she utters a note. In her first song, however, the debutante was a trifle nervous, and the result was a rather rough shading, audible breathing and irregular intonation. These defects passed away almost immediately, and in Schumann's "Almond Tree" the singer made a success, giving true sentiment and commendable shading to the expressive lied. The whole breadth and power of her noble voice were shown in Tyson Wolff's "Tuscan Song," in which the warbling refrain was given with much brio.

In Brahm's quintette Mr. Max Zach was added to the violas. All the players deserve commendation in this noble work. The quintette is an uneven composition, attaining its highest power in the central movement, although the first movement is also a remarkable one. Brahms' only needs the chastening influence of a little adversity and sorrow to move his phlegm to become a real Beethoven. The club played the movements with great success. They are becoming broader and more energetic without losing any of their refinement. Among the special excellences of the second movement, a very varied one, I must speak of the shading of the important cello passages, and of the rich tone of Mr. Zach's one prominent phrase. But it seems invidious to Messrs. Kneisel, Roth and Luecenski, to praise any single phrases, where all was well done.

The finale was not quite so well done, many parts being vehement rather than powerful, but the movement itself is the least interesting of the work, although its most learned portion. "A little learning is a dangerous thing," says the proverb, but in music a good deal of it frequently is quite as dangerous. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE MORNING MAIL.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A musical event of great importance will take place on November 7 at the Opera House, the appearance for one night only of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor. The full orchestra will be present, with the assistance of a prominent soprano, to be announced. It will be without doubt the concert of the season. The advertisement gives prices and particulars.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1889.

"NEMO" ON NIKISCH.—Mr. Arthur Nikisch already promises to achieve more personal popularity than was attained by either of his predecessors. He has a decided charm of manner and is possessed of almost as much personal magnetism as Georg Henschel was blessed with. His heart and soul are given up to music and his work, and it is doubtful whether he will allow himself to be lured away by the fascinations of society. Had Mr. Gericke not emulated the American habit of burning the candle at both ends he would in all likelihood be at present at the head of our orchestra. It is impossible for any man of average strength to give out so much of himself in his work as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra necessarily does, and yet be able to fritter away his nights at fashionable semi-Bohemian parties. It is said that Mr. Gericke wasted his health and injured his constitution by attempting to lead a fashionable and a working life at one and the same time. He by no means accepted a tenth of the invitations showered upon him, but he allowed himself to drift into the habit of going to a few houses, and, unfortunately, those were the very houses where the late hours helped to sap his constitution. Mr. Nikisch is an enthusiastic musician and has already made himself popular with the members of his orchestra as well as at the Tavern Club, where he has naturally stepped into his predecessor's position. Although he spoke little, if any, English before his arrival, he has already mastered the language sufficiently for ordinary conversation. It is pleasant to find that he is liberal enough to give the modern composers a hearing. Mr. Gericke was obliged to go outside the narrow limits he first laid down in answer to general demand; and if Mr. Nikisch fulfills his promises Boston will have little cause to complain of the Symphony programs. Perhaps the most noticeable thing about the new conductor is his hands. These are exceedingly beautiful, being white as marble, small and well shaped. There is no doubt that he realizes this fact, for he takes exceptional care of them, almost always wearing gloves, even often at the private rehearsals. The Boston girls have already begun to rave over these hands, especially when one is used to smooth his back hair. It is well for the susceptible girls to remember that there is a Mrs. Nikisch on the other side of the ocean, and therefore it ought to be impossible for them to work up a sentiment for a married man. Unfortunately they have taken too many lessons from their married sisters and realize that marital chains are often no impediment to a flirtation. In this case, as in that of the last conductor, they will find their sentiment and flirtations quite unreciprocated and will have to content themselves with surreptitious glances at the first and second violins.—Boston "Gazette."

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., Nov. 2, 1889.

Another fine programme was offered to the symphony concert patrons last Saturday evening. The symphony was that of [illegible]delsshon's known as the "Italian." In one way the performance of this work may be considered the greatest success of the season, so far, for critics of all shades of opinion can but unite in recognizing its excellence. The orchestra played with great spirit and one might well imagine that this was one of the occasions of which Mendelsshon speaks with such satisfaction in his letters. A fantasie on two Russian folk-songs, by Glinka, took the place of Schubert's unfinished symphony announced the week before. The fantasie is a sufficiently interesting composition, though not of the highest order, and was thoroughly well played. Two Beethoven numbers was given, the overture to "Egmont" and the fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat. Mr. Baermann played the concerto in unusually brilliant style. The only thing that marred the effect of the whole was a slight difference of opinion between the conductor and the pianist on the question of tempo, which was evident in one or two places. The rendering of the overture was less marked in its departure from generally received ideas, than the previous efforts of Mr. Nikisch with the same composer. The imperfections were of the same nature as those noticed in the other concerts. They all arose from over-anxiety on the part of the conductor to make the performance impressive. It is not simply a matter of regularity or irregularity in tempo. Mr. Baermann plays with as much variation in the rate of movement as Mr. Nikisch, yet it would be hard to conceive of a more consistent, harmonious, more thoroughly "Beethovenish" rendering than what Mr. Baermann habitually gives us. Mr. Nikisch simply yields to the tendency which is a constant danger to the modern school: wishing to make everything forcible, he sometimes produces an exaggerated effect, and fails to preserve the balance and proportion which are the most necessary characteristics of true art, because he fails to realize that in simplicity lies the greatest power. B. C. H.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31ST, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL "Die Meistersinger."
MOZART.	ARIA "Il re pastore."
SCHUBERT.	ENTR' ACTE "Rosamunde."
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
GRIEG.	a) "SUNSHINE SONG."
RUBINSTEIN.	b) "YEARNINGS."
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120. Introduction (Adagio non troppo).— Allegro.— Romance (Adagio non troppo).— Scherzo.— Finale (Allegro).—

SOLOIST:

MRS. CORINNE MOORE-LAWSON.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1889.

HERR NIKISCH.

Boston's Musical Lion Upon Herr Gericke's Pedestal.

The First of This Season's Symphony Concerts, Last Evening—One of the Most Notable on Record—An Enthusiastic Welcome to the New Conductor.

That the symphony concert in Music hall last evening will easily take rank among some of the most notable events of the kind that have ever taken place in this city will generally be acknowledged. Not only was the event notable because of the new series of Symphony concerts that was inaugurated, but it was chiefly notable because of the local experience it afforded of some of the most individual, genial, and yet unique interpretations of orchestral music that have been heard here.

The personnel of the orchestra is much the same as before, the most important of the few changes that have been made being with the substitution of Mr. Anton Hekking for Mr. Fritz Giese as 'cellist. The conductor, as need not be told save as a mere matter of record, is Mr. Arthur Nikisch. It seemed quite natural, at the beginning of the concert, that the large audience present should focus its attention upon the mere personality of the new conductor, who as he advanced to the front of the stage was greeted with one of the very heartiest and most respectful ovations that any audience could bestow. His fame had preceded him. He was by no means in the position that has been recorded of one of his predecessors, namely, he was far from appearing as an inexperienced conductor receiving applause by way of encouragement.

As regards his appearance it was singularly prepossessing,—conspicuous not only in points of modest manliness and dignity, but likewise in some of the most pronounced, impressive and unmistakable features of the great artist. It was not, however, until the orchestra began to play the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Meistersinger" that the artistic individuality of the new conductor was made known. The effect to many present must have been that of a most piquant and remarkable surprise. With one's eyes closed it was difficult of realization that the same orchestral ensemble of but a season ago was in any sense whatsoever being heard. True, there was the same unsurpassable precision and purity of tone-volume that was noticeable in the playing of Mr. Gericke's Symphony orchestra, also the same elasticity, unity of artistic action, technical finish and brilliancy, and the same unanimous loyalty of intent. But the iceberg's warmth had disappeared. The straight-laced classicist, who, as must be acknowledged, contributed his always-to-be-remembered share in placing the Boston Symphony orchestra on a peerage with the ablest orchestral bands of the world, had retired and in his stead had come a tone-poet and musician who, though radically different in temperament from his masterly predecessor, may have come just at the right time and, as we have faith to believe, will prove to be just the right man in the right place. A resident musician therefore may remember the former conductor none the less gratefully if he at the same time appreciates the necessity of the mission that his successor has been called upon to perform.

The interpretation of the Meistersinger "Vorspiel" was not one that had been coldly and rigidly thought out from the standpoint of any mere ethical or intellectual principles of art. The high art was all there, but the heart and soul of a thoroughly sympathetic and musical performance were also there, and at their warmest. The ecstatic yielding to the psychological incitations of the work was without the slightest sacrifice of any artistic truth, but the reading between the lines was with such exquisite fineness, delicacy and purity of conception that the truth was told, as it were, from the whole heart, and as if it were simply irresistible so to utter it; not as though it were being told from any mere pedantic sense of duty. The very motion of the new conductor's stick was poetry and grace itself.

Walther's prize song and the restless, almost buoyant subject that follows it, were made to play against each other, not with any stilted pedantry; but all the charming naturalness and simplicity of their wondrous juxtaposition were most sympathetically and charmingly set forth. The reading was in the [illegible] sense of the term a creation, and equally so was the reading of the Beethoven overture to "Coriolanus," the opening to which especially could not have been more sterling, loyal and effective. The broad and voluminous fortissimo with which the strings gave out their opening note could not have been more vital in its effect, and the noble, soul-stirring melody that forms the counter-theme of the movement was heard with an effect that was no less exhilarating than it was truthful and complete.

As for the element of artistic sympathy that was experienced throughout the performance, it can truthfully be said that the precise like of it has not heretofore been heard here from a large orchestra, not even from the magnificent effects of Herr Seidl's lead of the performances in Boston last season.

How charmingly portrayed, too, was the melodic tranquility of the second entre-acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." Just here the more poetic and æsthetical effects of Herr Nikisch's lead were perhaps more noticeable than at any time during the concert. The pianissimo effects may not have been with all the whispering, clear and far-reaching delicacy that Herr Gericke would have afforded, yet they were sufficient; they were just; and without being extravagantly forceless were none the less fairy-like and etherial.

With the [illegible] movement of the Schumann Symphony in D minor there was all of the unerring precision that one could have desired, and the performance as a whole was simply admirable. Especially charming was the treatment that the romance received, and the finale was given out with a vital and electrifying expression that could but have impressed the least musical auditor present, as well as the artist, with the master of the lead.

Truly, so far as having won the admiration and respect of the general public is concerned, and the orchestra as well, Herr Nikisch may well say "Veni, vidi, vici." In brief, the first Symphony concert of the season has been a brilliant success, and it matters not how marked the disagreement may be among musicians as to the utter unorthodoxy of Herr Nikisch's lead, so long as there can be no just denial of the radical improvement that has already been made. The entire programme was conducted from memory.

At the next concert, at the usual time and place, Mr. Anton Heking, the eminent 'cellist will play the Goltermann concerto in A minor and the Symphony will be the seventh of Beethoven. The concert will open with variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms op. 56, and the remaining selections will be by Mendelssohn, Fingal's Cave Overture, Bach, Air, Schumann, Tranmeri and Popper, Papillon, — eminently a popular selection.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

TUESDAY MORNING, OCT. 29, 1889.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert Last Night —A New Member.

The concerts of this organization are always important events in the musical annals of Boston, for through the high musicianship of the performers and the incredible amount of rehearsing which they do the quartette has become the best in the country and the peer of any string quartette I have ever heard. Last night there was considerable curiosity to hear what the result would be of a change in one of the parts. Mr. Fritz Giese has been replaced by Mr. Anton Hekking in the cello part. Mr. Hekking is not as broad a player as Mr. Giese, but he is intelligent, always pure in intonation, and subjects himself thoroughly to the requirements of ensemble playing. It is not always the greatest virtuoso or artist who makes the best string quartette player, and I may assert that Mr. Hekking was even more successful in last night's concert than in his excellent debut in Music Hall 10 days ago.

The works chosen by the Kneisel Quartette for performance are always of the most worthy character, and frequently the modern tastes of the members are shown in the selections. Last night was no exception to this, and the quartette by Volkmann and the Brahms quintette in F well represented the school of the present. The Volkmann quartette in E minor is a melodious, well-constructed and easily-comprehended work, and makes one wonder how such a genial composer could have starved in Germany so long while giving forth such music. In the andantino the unity of the the instruments in the con sordine passages was remarkable, and the shading most beautiful. In the finale, however, the 'cello gave a coarser tone than the circumstances warranted. The instrument is one that evidently will not bear forcing.

Then came Mrs. Moore-Lawson in a group of songs. This lady is more than a mere singer, she is, to my knowledge, a well-educated musician, and thoroughly comprehends many branches of the art. She has a charming stage presence, and her audience are half won before she utters a note. In her first song, however, the debutante was a trifle nervous, and the result was a rather rough shading, audible breathing and irregular intonation. These defects passed away almost immediately, and in Schumann's "Almond Tree" the singer made a success, giving true sentiment and commendable shading to the expressive lied. The whole breadth and power of her noble voice were shown in Tyson Wolff's "Tuscan Song," in which the warbling refrain was given with much brio.

In Brahm's quintette Mr. Max Zach was added to the violas. All the players deserve commendation in this noble work. The quintette is an uneven composition, attaining its highest power in the central movement, although the first movement is also a remarkable one. Brahms' only needs the chastening influence of a little adversity and sorrow to move his phlegm to become a real Beethoven. The club played the movements with great success. They are becoming broader and more energetic without losing any of their refinement. Among the special excellences of the second movement, a very varied one, I must speak of the shading of the important cello passages, and of the rich tone of Mr. Zach's one prominent phrase. But it seems invidious to Messrs. Kneisel, Roth and Luecenski, to praise any single phrases, where all was well done.

The finale was not quite so well done, many parts being vehement rather than powerful, but the movement itself is the least interesting of the work, although its most learned portion. "A little learning is a dangerous thing," says the proverb, but in music a good deal of it frequently is quite as dangerous. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE MORNING MAIL.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1889.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A musical event of great importance will take place on November 7 at the Opera House, the appearance for one night only of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor. The full orchestra will be present, with the assistance of a prominent soprano, to be announced. It will be without doubt the concert of the season. The advertisement gives prices and particulars.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1889.

"NEMO" ON NIKISCH.—Mr. Arthur Nikisch already promises to achieve more personal popularity than was attained by either of his predecessors. He has a decided charm of manner and is possessed of almost as much personal magnetism as Georg Henschel was blessed with. His heart and soul are given up to music and his work, and it is doubtful whether he will allow himself to be lured away by the fascinations of society. Had Mr. Gericke not emulated the American habit of burning the candle at both ends he would in all likelihood be at present at the head of our orchestra. It is impossible for any man of average strength to give out so much of himself in his work as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra necessarily does, and yet be able to fritter away his nights at fashionable semi-Bohemian parties. It is said that Mr. Gericke wasted his health and injured his constitution by attempting to lead a fashionable and a working life at one and the same time. He by no means accepted a tenth of the invitations showered upon him, but he allowed himself to drift into the habit of going to a few houses, and, unfortunately, those were the very houses where the late hours helped to sap his constitution. Mr. Nikisch is an enthusiastic musician and has already made himself popular with the members of his orchestra as well as at the Tavern Club, where he has naturally stepped into his predecessor's position. Although he spoke little, if any, English before his arrival, he has already mastered the language sufficiently for ordinary conversation. It is pleasant to find that he is liberal enough to give the modern composers a hearing. Mr. Gericke was obliged to go outside the narrow limits he first laid down in answer to general demand; and if Mr. Nikisch fulfills his promises Boston will have little cause to complain of the Symphony programs. Perhaps the most noticeable thing about the new conductor is his hands. These are exceedingly beautiful, being white as marble, small and well shaped. There is no doubt that he realizes this fact, for he takes exceptional care of them, almost always wearing gloves, even often at the private rehearsals. The Boston girls have already begun to rave over these hands, especially when one is used to smooth his back hair. It is well for the susceptible girls to remember that there is a Mrs. Nikisch on the other side of the ocean, and therefore it ought to be impossible for them to work up a sentiment for a married man. Unfortunately they have taken too many lessons from their married sisters and realize that marital chains are often no impediment to a flirtation. In this case, as in that of the last conductor, they will find their sentiment and flirtations quite unreciprocated and will have to content themselves with surreptitious glances at the first and second violins.—Boston "Gazette."

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., NOV. 2, 1889.

Another fine programme was offered to the symphony concert patrons last Saturday evening. The symphony was that of Mendelssohn's known as the "Italian." In one way the performance of this work may be considered the greatest success of the season, so far, for critics of all shades of opinion can but unite in recognizing its excellence. The orchestra played with great spirit and one might well imagine that this was one of the occasions of which Mendelsshon speaks with such satisfaction in his letters. A fantasie on two Russian folk-songs, by Glinka, took the place of Schubert's unfinished symphony announced the week before. The fantasie is a sufficiently interesting composition, though not of the highest order, and was thoroughly well played. Two Beethoven numbers was given, the overture to "Egmont" and the fifth pianoforte concerto in E flat. Mr. Baermann played the concerto in unusually brilliant style. The only thing that marred the effect of the whole was a slight difference of opinion between the conductor and the pianist on the question of tempo, which was evident in one or two places. The rendering of the overture was less marked in its departure from generally received ideas, than the previous efforts of Mr. Nikisch with the same composer. The imperfections were of the same nature as those noticed in the other concerts. They all arose from over-anxiety on the part of the conductor to make the performance impressive. It is not simply a matter of regularity or irregularity in tempo. Mr. Baermann plays with as much variation in the rate of movement as Mr. Nikisch, yet it would be hard to conceive of a more consistent, harmonious, more thoroughly "Beethovenish" rendering than what Mr. Baermann habitually gives us. Mr. Nikisch simply yields to the tendency which is a constant danger to the modern school: wishing to make everything forcible, he sometimes produces an exaggerated effect, and fails to preserve the balance and proportion which are the most necessary characteristics of true art, because he fails to realize that in simplicity lies the greatest power.

B. C. H.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1889-90.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31ST, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL "Die Meistersinger."
MOZART.	ARIA "Il re pastore."
SCHUBERT.	ENTR' ACTE "Rosamunde."
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
GRIEG.	a) "SUNSHINE SONG."
RUBINSTEIN.	b) "YEARNINGS."
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120. Introduction (Adagio non troppo).— Allegro.— Romance (Adagio non troppo).— Scherzo.— Finale (Allegro).—

SOLOIST:

MRS. CORINNE MOORE-LAWSON.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Lowell Opera House.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90.

Soloist:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

TICKETS, with reserved seats, 75 cents and $1.00. Sale opens at the Box Office, Monday, November 4th.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Before going on to our sketch of yesterday afternoon's rehearsal, the prophetic prologue of what is to be expected from the Symphony concert of this evening, we must revert for one moment to the concert of a week ago, and say something in regard to the performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, for which we could not wait on last Friday afternoon. In that performance the highest achievement of the orchestra thus far was added, while the interpretation—governed by the same principles and proceeding along the same lines as Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann and Beethoven—was approved even by those who had set themselves most decidedly against the originality of treatment and individuality of feeling which he had shown in those other works. Whether it was that Mendelssohn's music be regarded by them as less sacred, whether their objections have begun to yield a little in spite of themselves, or whether this symphony, being more fanciful and less emotional, did not tempt the conductor to so full and variable a use of his most ductile and obedient band, it would not be easy to say; perhaps all these three conditions were invited. Be this as it may and judging only by what the listeners felt, this piece of symphony playing might, without extravagance, be set down as perfection, and its gradual development from the bright beginning, through the romance and poetry of its central movements to the irrepressible and bounding gayety of the finale, charged with the spirit of sun and life and dance, was splendid in itself and exhilerating to the listeners. It was a bright ideal made brilliantly real.

The rehearsal of yesterday, beginning with a standard overture, that to Weber's "Euryanthe," and ending with the b flat symphony of Volkmann included between these three numbers of minor massivenessand weight, to which, nevertheless a general and deserved interest attached. These were the first performances in America of two MSS. compositions by Mr. Arthur Bird, and the singing by Mr. Emil Fischer of the great air of Lysiart in "Euryanthe," which appropriately followed the overture, and of the two songs with pianoforte accompaniment. The instrumental selections showed that Mr. Nikisch was already as good as his word in giving place to new American work, while the vocal numbers indicated a recognition of the general desire to hear men as well as women for vocalists in these concerts—a desire to which Mr. Gericke made too few concessions. Mr. Bird entitles his compositions "Episodes for Orchestra," probably on account of their brevity, naming the first "An Oriental Scene," while the second is an "Intermezzo and Trio." Each is a delicious bit of writing, scholarly and yet fanciful,—the first, indeed, being almost fantastic, uniting German solidity of texture to something of French delicacy and finesse. In the second the orchestra is of normal proportion, but in the first the woodwind is increased, and the harp, drum, cymbals and glockenspiel are added, the former of these playing an important and illuminating part throughout. The second has a light and dancing accent, the trio bringing in a calmer contrast; but the first, cast mainly into a dreamful mood, with the harp rippling like a fountain, has within a secondary movement as picturesque and gay as it is odd and piquant. Each was warmly applauded, having evidently greatly pleased. Mr. Fischer was in fine voice and sang with that clear perception and appropriate style which make him not only a strong dramatic singer but also a polished vocalist. The overture had a splendid rendering. Being the introduction to a drama whose personages would have a right to interpret their music as well as sing its notes, there can probably be no fault with Mr. Nikisch for making all its phases, based as they are on themes from the work, instinct with the quality of their scenes. The opening was nobly energetic, the mystery of the muted string passages was deep and soft, the long airs were almost sung by the instruments, and the smaller episodes, each characteristic of some marked Weber trait, were individualized distinctly.

The Sanders Theatre concert of Thursday evening began the Cambridge season auspiciously. The orchestra, a little reduced in strings and brass, as suits the smaller room, always appears to the finest advantage in this most favorable room, and the presentment of works already heard in Boston was at all points adequate and welcome. Mrs. Moore-Lawson was wholly just to herself and satisfactory to her hearers in her chief air, but her songs with piano were not well chosen and gave her lovely voice and cultured style no fair showing.

The programme for this night week is an extraordinary one, its beginning, middle and end being a symphony, their order being Haydn in G, Mozart in G-minor, Beethoven (the fifth) in C-minor.

The first Young People's Popular will be given on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 13th instant, according to a programme and with a soloist yet to be announced.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The attendance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been phenomenal. At every performance thus far given hundreds have been turned away unable to obtain admission. So great has become the demand for additional concerts that the management have arranged a special matinee to be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13. Mr. Nikisch will present on this occasion a programme of light music and a soloist, yet to be announced will appear. Reserved seats for this matinee go on sale at Music Hall this morning. An exceedingly reasonable scale of prices has been adopted.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.—The two compositions played by the Kneisel quartet last Monday at the first concert of the season were Volkmann's Quartet in E minor and Brahms' Quintet in F, the part of second viola being played by Mr. Max Zach.

The quartet by Volkmann is a thoroughly delightful work, simple, melodious, and well put together. Hanslick objects to the tempo of the Scherzo and the continuous use of the mutes in the third movement, but it is difficult to see the reasonableness of this criticism. The quartet is an excellent example of Volkmann at his best.

The Quintet of Brahms is, in certain respects, an exasperating composition. The first movement is well nigh perfect. The themes are "frank" and beautiful, and the treatment of them is clear, and at the same time masterly so far as technique is concerned. The second movement with its sudden and inconsequential changes of tempo is not without charm, but the final allegro is dry and confused, a jumble of sounds, a woful misuse of the resources of counterpoint.

Although there were a few signs of nervousness, the playing of the accomplished musicians was most excellent. There was the due subordination of self which is so essential in true ensemble playing; there was the delightful purity of tone and controlled musical feeling which one naturally expects from such artists; and there was a decided gain in swing, a stronger sense of rhythm.

The singing of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson was a disappointment. Whether it was due to the selection of songs, or to physical indisposition, or nervousness—at least this is true: she did not make a favorable impression. Her voice is warm and full of color; but she does not have it under control. This was seen in tones which should have been firmly sustained; in her inability to use with effect the crescendo and diminuendo; and in the third selection there was a suspicion of doubtful intonation. Nor was her phrasing to be praised. In other words, it would seem as though she were as yet an unripe singer. Her first song, Presser's "By the Danube," is a worthless composition. Schumann's "Almond Tree" gave the audience an opportunity of hearing Mr. Arthur Foote play exquisitely the accompaniment. The "Tuscan Song" of Tyson Wolff is not without originality and merit.

The concert lasted an hour and thirty minutes; that is, it was of the right length.

"Young People's Popular."

So great is the demand for additional performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra that the management have decided to give occasional extra matinees, similar to those which found such favor with the public last season. The first of these matinees will be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, when Mr. Nikisch will present a popular programme, and a soloist not yet announced will appear. Reserved seats for this performance at reasonable prices go on sale at the box office this morning.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1889

[13]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The program of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture "Egmont."
Beethoven.....Fifth Concerto for pianoforte.
Glinka.....Kamarinskaja.
Mendelssohn.....Symphony in A (Italian).

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and his playing was marked by breadth and dignity, a quiet appreciation of musical detail, subordination of self. There were passages which were not clear, which were, in fact, confused; for instance, the passages in contrary motion in the first movement, which are, it is true, of excessive difficulty. At times there seemed to be a lack of rhythm; nor was Mr. Baermann's trill, the trill of a virtuoso. It seems ungracious to speak of these petty things; for, as a whole, his interpretation was an admirable one.

An eminent critic can find no beauty in the Egmont overture as it was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. And to support his position he goes back to the time of Sebastian Bach and shows what a difference there should be in the treatment of a Bach suite and a Liszt symphonic poem. In speaking of Bach, he says, "As far as the emotional element was concerned he may be said to have expressed himself fully in his scores, leaving little, or nothing, of the expressive sort to be read between the lines by the performer." Now, is this the fact? Take his works for the organ; we find, as a rule, no directions for the player. We do not know whether Bach wished this fugue to be played with full organ or that prelude with soft stops. The tempo preferred by the composer is often left in doubt. That was the custom of the time. We find these omissions before Bach in the works of Frescobaldi, George Muffat, and Buxtehude; we find them in the delightful compositions of Padre Martini. And when directions are found, their meaning is not wholly plain to us. Organo pleno, for instance; there is a dispute in Germany to-day as to whether this expression means "an organ complete in all its parts," or "full organ" in the modern sense. And so we find the leading organists of Europe treating the same composition in divers ways. One will play the first part of the triple fugue in E flat of Bach fortissimo, another will use only delicate string stops. No one knows how Bach himself played it; no one knows whether he played it twice in the same manner. "Play the music (Bach) as it is written, with appropriate sentiment and musicianly phrasing, and you do it full justice." But what is the "appropriate sentiment"; is there but one "phrasing" possible to the musician? Do not the sentiment and phrasing depend in large measure upon the nature of the performer? And would any two sensitive, emotional musicians agree as to the "treatment" of certain passages? There are certain rules regarding the proper performance of the ornaments of that period which we find clearly written out by Couperin, and Emanuel Bach; these should certainly be regarded; and so a sarabande should be played as a sarabande and not as a corrente. But there is no rule of three applicable to sentiment or phrasing.

This gentleman complains in an exceedingly well-written paragraph of the performance of the overture; but, "to come down to concrete examples," just where and how did Mr. Nikisch sin? I, personally, did not like the manner in which the first seven measures of the allegro in F were played, and for this reason: there was an absence of rhythm, the phrases given to the first violins were not clearly defined, and the crescendo from pp to ff was a sudden jump. But this very passage may have delighted another.

Then, again, the "rendering" of a passage in the trio of the third movement of the symphony was obnoxious to this gentleman. Now how would he have played it? It is practically a four part song, given to the horns and bassoons, is it not? It should be sung; would four singers sing it in absolutely strict time?

Glinka wrote his Kamarinskaja, a fantasia on two Russian folk songs, in the year 1847. Seven years before, he began a piece of the same name for "piano for three hands," and it was not finished. It would be interesting to compare the two. The orchestral piece is cunningly constructed, subtly written, so that although founded on two simple airs it perhaps appeals more to the musician than to the public. Even in the second of the songs, "the dance," is seen the peculiar melancholy which seems to be a part of the Russian nature. As Glinka says in his Memoirs, "We, people of the north, can not have the sentimento brillante of the Italians. We either have no impressions or such impressions as go to the bottom of our souls; then we feel unspeakable joy or infinite bitterness. For us, love is tinged with sadness."

Glinka, born in 1804, can hardly be called "the earliest Russian composer of note." Bortnianisky (1751–1825), director of the Imperial Chapel at St. Petersburg, was certainly a musician of rare endowments and European fame. His greatest work is his setting of forty-five psalms for four and eight voices. Berlioz, who heard his works performed at St. Petersburg, speaks of his religious sentiment, rare skill in grouping of voices, mastery of expression, license in arranging parts, and sovereign contempt for rules observed by both predecessors and contemporaries.

Bortnianisky founded many of his works upon the plain song of the Russian Church; and the "tonality" of this plain song is to be seen not only in the melodies of the Russian people, but even in the writings of the most radical of the modern Russian school of composers. (He who wishes to examine this interesting subject, can consult with profit the first part of "Histoire de la Musique en Russie" by the Prince Youssoupoff, Paris 1862).

But Glinka was undeniably so far as the music of his country is concerned an epoch-maker. He was the forerunner of Seéroff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Dargomijsky, Borodine, Cui and Stcherbatcheff. His influence is seen in the works of Tschaikowsky. And no one can deny that there is a Russian school, a school of marked originality; the radical members of which, to quote Gustave Bertrand, are not content merely with a style peculiar to themselves; they must have a separate musical tongue. "They are so afraid of the charge of imitation that they pretend to repudiate even the Italian-French-German scale and the whole system of "tonality" and modulation which has been considered for so long a time the basis of all musical civilization."

However this may be, it would be interesting to hear the compositions of these men. Let us hope that during the engagement of Mr. Nikisch, neither this remarkable school nor the modern French composers will be lazily neglected or contemptuously passed by.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The first of the extra matinees by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which proved so popular last season, will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13. Mr. Nikisch will present a programme of light music, and a soloist yet to be announced will appear. Reserved seats for this concert go on sale at Music Hall this morning.

Lowell Opera House.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90.

Soloist:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

TICKETS, with reserved seats, 75 cents and $1.00. Sale opens at the Box Office, Monday, November 4th.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Before going on to our sketch of yesterday afternoon's rehearsal, the prophetic prologue of what is to be expected from the Symphony concert of this evening, we must revert for one moment to the concert of a week ago and say something in regard to the performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, for which we could not wait on last Friday afternoon. In that performance the highest achievement of the orchestra thus far was added, while the interpretation—governed by the same principles and proceeding along the same lines as Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann and Beethoven—was approved even by those who had set themselves most decidedly against the originality of treatment and individuality of feeling which he had shown in those other works. Whether it was that Mendelssohn's music be regarded by them as less sacred, whether their objections have begun to yield a little in spite of themselves, or whether this symphony, being more fanciful and less emotional, did not tempt the conductor to so full and variable a use of his most ductile and obedient band, it would not be easy to say; perhaps all these three conditions were invited. Be this as it may and judging only by what the listeners felt, this piece of symphony playing might, without extravagance, be set down as perfection, and its gradual development from the bright beginning, through the romance and poetry of its central movements to the irrepressible and bounding gayety of the finale, charged with the spirit of sun and life and dance, was splendid in itself and exhilerating to the listeners. It was a bright ideal made brilliantly real.

The rehearsal of yesterday, beginning with a standard overture, that to Weber's "Euryanthe," and ending with the b flat symphony of Volkmann included between these three numbers of minor massivenessand weight, to which, nevertheless a general and deserved interest attached. These were the first performances in America of two MSS. compositions by Mr. Arthur Bird, and the singing by Mr. Emil Fischer of the great air of Lysiart in "Euryanthe," which appropriately followed the overture, and of the two songs with pianoforte accompaniment. The instrumental selections showed that Mr. Nikisch was already as good as his word in giving place to new American work, while the vocal numbers indicated a recognition of the general desire to hear men as well as women for vocalists in these concerts—a desire to which Mr. Gericke made too few concessions. Mr. Bird entitles his compositions "Episodes for Orchestra," probably on account of their brevity, naming the first "An Oriental Scene," while the second is an "Intermezzo and Trio." Each is a delicious bit of writing, scholarly and yet fanciful,—the first, indeed, being almost fantastic, uniting German solidity of texture to something of French delicacy and finesse. In the second the orchestra is of normal proportion, but in the first the wood-wind is increased, and the harp, drum, cymbals and glockenspiel are added, the former of these playing an important and illuminating part throughout. The second has a light and dancing accent, the trio bringing in a calmer contrast; but the first, cast mainly into a dreamful mood, with the harp rippling like a fountain, has within a secondary movement as picturesque and gay as it is odd and piquant. Each was warmly applauded, having evidently greatly pleased. Mr. Fischer was in fine voice and sang with that clear perception and appropriate style which make him not only a strong dramatic singer but also a polished vocalist. The overture had a splendid rendering. Being the introduction to a drama whose personages would have a right to interpret their music as well as sing its notes, there can probably be no fault with Mr. Nikisch for making all its phases, based as they are on themes from the work, instinct with the quality of their scenes. The opening was nobly energetic, the mystery of the muted string passages was deep and soft, the long airs were almost sung by the instruments, and the smaller episodes, each characteristic of some marked Weber trait, were individualized distinctly.

The Sanders Theatre concert of Thursday evening began the Cambridge season auspiciously. The orchestra, a little reduced in strings and brass, as suits the smaller room, always appears to the finest advantage in this most favorable room, and the presentment of works already heard in Boston was at all points adequate and welcome. Mrs. Moore-Lawson was wholly just to herself and satisfactory to her hearers in her chief air, but her songs with piano were not well chosen and gave her lovely voice and cultured style no fair showing.

The programme for this night week is an extraordinary one, its beginning, middle and end being a symphony, their order being Haydn in G, Mozart in G-minor, Beethoven (the fifth) in C-minor.

The first Young People's Popular will be given on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 13th instant, according to a programme and with a soloist yet to be announced.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The attendance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been phenomenal. At every performance thus far given hundreds have been turned away unable to obtain admission. So great has become the demand for additional concerts that the management have arranged a special matinee to be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13. Mr. Nikisch will present on this occasion a programme of light music and a soloist, yet to be announced will appear. Reserved seats for this matinee go on sale at Music Hall this morning. An exceedingly reasonable scale of prices has been adopted.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.—The two compositions played by the Kneisel quartet last Monday at the first concert of the season were Volkmann's Quartet in E minor and Brahms' Quintet in F, the part of second viola being played by Mr. Max Zach.

The quartet by Volkmann is a thoroughly delightful work, simple, melodious, and well put together. Hanslick objects to the tempo of the Scherzo and the continuous use of the mutes in the third movement, but it is difficult to see the reasonableness of this criticism. The quartet is an excellent example of Volkmann at his best.

The Quintet of Brahms is, in certain respects, an exasperating composition. The first movement is well nigh perfect. The themes are "frank" and beautiful, and the treatment of them is clear, and at the same time masterly so far as technique is concerned. The second movement with its sudden and inconsequential changes of tempo is not without charm, but the final allegro is dry and confused, a jumble of sounds, a woful misuse of the resources of counterpoint.

Although there were a few signs of nervousness, the playing of the accomplished musicians was most excellent. There was the due subordination of self which is so essential in true ensemble playing; there was the delightful purity of tone and controlled musical feeling which one naturally expects from such artists; and there was a decided gain in swing, a stronger sense of rhythm.

The singing of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson was a disappointment. Whether it was due to the selection of songs, or to physical indisposition, or nervousness—at least this is true: she did not make a favorable impression. Her voice is warm and full of color; but she does not have it under control. This was seen in tones which should have been firmly sustained; in her inability to use with effect the crescendo and diminuendo; and in the third selection there was a suspicion of doubtful intonation. Nor was her phrasing to be praised. In other words, it would seem as though she were as yet an unripe singer. Her first song, Presser's "By the Danube," is a worthless composition. Schumann's "Almond Tree" gave the audience an opportunity of hearing Mr. Arthur Foote play exquisitely the accompaniment. The "Tuscan Song" of Tyson Wolff is not without originality and merit.

The concert lasted an hour and thirty minutes; that is, it was of the right length.

"Young People's Popular."

So great is the demand for additional performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra that the management have decided to give occasional extra matinees, similar to those which found such favor with the public last season. The first of these matinees will be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, when Mr. Nikisch will present a popular programme, and a soloist not yet announced will appear. Reserved seats for this performance at reasonable prices go on sale at the box office this morning.

HOME JOURNAL.

[13]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The program of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven.....Overture "Egmont."
Beethoven.....Fifth Concerto for pianoforte.
Glinka.....Kamarinskaja.
Mendelssohn.....Symphony in A (Italian).

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and his playing was marked by breadth and dignity, a quiet appreciation of musical detail, subordination of self. There were passages which were not clear, which were, in fact, confused; for instance, the passages in contrary motion in the first movement, which are, it is true, of excessive difficulty. At times there seemed to be a lack of rhythm; nor was Mr. Baermann's trill, the trill of a virtuoso. It seems ungracious to speak of these petty things; for, as a whole, his interpretation was an admirable one.

An eminent critic can find no beauty in the Egmont overture as it was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch. And to support his position he goes back to the time of Sebastian Bach and shows what a difference there should be in the treatment of a Bach suite and a Liszt symphonic poem. In speaking of Bach, he says, "As far as the emotional element was concerned he may be said to have expressed himself fully in his scores, leaving little, or nothing, of the expressive sort to be read between the lines by the performer." Now, is this the fact? Take his works for the organ; we find, as a rule, no directions for the player. We do not know whether Bach wished this fugue to be played with full organ or that prelude with soft stops. The tempo preferred by the composer is often left in doubt. That was the custom of the time. We find these omissions before Bach in the works of Frescobaldi, George Muffat, and Buxtehude; we find them in the delightful compositions of Padre Martini. And when directions are found, their meaning is not wholly plain to us. Organo pleno, for instance; there is a dispute in Germany to-day as to whether this expression means "an organ complete in all its parts," or "full organ" in the modern sense. And so we find the leading organists of Europe treating the same composition in divers ways. One will play the first part of the triple fugue in E flat of Bach fortissimo, another will use only delicate string stops. No one knows how Bach himself played it; no one knows whether he played it twice in the same manner. "Play the music (Bach) as it is written, with appropriate sentiment and musicianly phrasing, and you do it full justice." But what is the "appropriate sentiment"; is there but one "phrasing" possible to the musician? Do not the sentiment and phrasing depend in large measure upon the nature of the performer? And would any two sensitive, emotional musicians agree as to the "treatment" of certain passages? There are certain rules regarding the proper performance of the ornaments of that period which we find clearly written out by Couperin, and Emanuel Bach; these should certainly be regarded; and so a sarabande should be played as a sarabande and not as a corrente. But there is no rule of three applicable to sentiment or phrasing.

This gentleman complains in an exceedingly well-written paragraph of the performance of the overture; but, "to come down to concrete examples," just where and how did Mr. Nikisch sin? I, personally, did not like the manner in which the first seven measures of the allegro in F were played, and for this reason: there was an absence of rhythm, the phrases given to the first violins were not clearly defined, and the crescendo from pp. to ff was a sudden jump. But this very passage may have delighted another.

Then, again, the "rendering" of a passage in the trio of the third movement of the symphony was obnoxious to this gentleman. Now how would he have played it? It is practically a four part song, given to the horns and bassoons, is it not? It should be sung; would four singers sing it in absolutely strict time?

Glinka wrote his Kamarinskaja, a fantasia on two Russian folk songs, in the year 1847. Seven years before, he began a piece of the same name for "piano for three hands," and it was not finished. It would be interesting to compare the two. The orchestral piece is cunningly constructed, subtly written, so that although founded on two simple airs it perhaps appeals more to the musician than to the public. Even in the second of the songs, "the dance," is seen the peculiar melancholy which seems to be a part of the Russian nature. As Glinka says in his Memoirs, "We, people of the north, can not have the sentimento brillante of the Italians. We either have no impressions or such impressions as go to the bottom of our souls; then we feel unspeakable joy or infinite bitterness. For us, love is tinged with sadness."

Glinka, born in 1804, can hardly be called "the earliest Russian composer of note." Bortnlansky (1751–1825), director of the Imperial Chapel at St. Petersburg, was certainly a musician of rare endowments and European fame. His greatest work is his setting of forty-five psalms for four and eight voices. Berlioz, who heard his works performed at St. Petersburg, speaks of his religious sentiment, rare skill in grouping of voices, mastery of expression, license in arranging parts, and sovereign contempt for rules observed by both predecessors and contemporaries.

Bortnlansky founded many of his works upon the plain song of the Russian Church; and the "tonality" of this plain song is to be seen not only in the melodies of the Russian people, but even in the writings of the most radical of the modern Russian school of composers. (He who wishes to examine this interesting subject, can consult with profit the first part of "Histoire de la Musique en Russie" by the Prince Youssoupoff, Paris 1862).

But Glinka was undeniably so far as the music of his country is concerned an epoch-maker. He was the forerunner of Seéroff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Dargomijsky, Borodine, Cui and Stcherbatcheff. His influence is seen in the works of Tschaikowsky. And no one can deny that there is a Russian school, a school of marked originality; the radical members of which, to quote Gustave Bertrand, are not content merely with a style peculiar to themselves; they must have a separate musical tongue. "They are so afraid of the charge of imitation that they pretend to repudiate even the Italian-French-German scale and the whole system of "tonality" and modulation which has been considered for so long a time the basis of all musical civilization."

However this may be, it would be interesting to hear the compositions of these men. Let us hope that during the engagement of Mr. Nikisch, neither this remarkable school nor the modern French composers will be lazily neglected or contemptuously passed by.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The first of the extra matinees by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which proved so popular last season, will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13. Mr. Nikisch will present a programme of light music, and a soloist yet to be announced will appear. Reserved seats for this concert go on sale at Music Hall this morning.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Conductor, is the only permanent Orchestra to appear in this city during the season, organized and maintained exclusively for concert purposes and the daily interpretation of music of the highest class.

LOWELL OPERA HOUSE,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Euryanthe." . . . . . WEBER

ARIA. . . . . .

MISS FINLAYSON.

KOMARINSKAJA. FANTASIE for ORCHESTRA on two Russian Folk Songs. . . . . GLINKA

BRIDAL SONG.
DANCE.

SONGS with PIANO.

MISS FINLAYSON.

SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) . . . MENDELSSOHN

Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.—
Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Before going on to our sketch of yesterday afternoon's rehearsal, the prophetic prologue of what is to be expected from the Symphony concert of this evening, we must revert for one moment to the concert of a week ago, and say something in regard to the performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, for which we could not wait on last Friday afternoon. In that performance the highest achievement of the orchestra thus far was added, while the interpretation—governed by the same principles and proceeding along the same lines as Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann and Beethoven—was approved even by those who had set themselves most decidedly against the originality of treatment and individuality of feeling which he had shown in those other works. Whether it was that Mendelssohn's music be regarded by them as less sacred, whether their objections have begun to yield a little in spite of themselves, or whether this symphony, being more fanciful and less emotional, did not tempt the conductor to so full and variable a use of his most ductile and obedient band, it would not be easy to say; perhaps all these three conditions were invited. Be this as it may and judging only by what the listeners felt, this piece of symphony playing might, without extravagance, be set down as perfection, and its gradual development from the bright beginning, through the romance and poetry of its central movements to the irrepressible and bounding gayety of the finale, charged with the spirit of sun and life and dance, was splendid in itself and exhilerating to the listeners. It was a bright ideal made brilliantly real.

The rehearsal of yesterday, beginning with a standard overture, that to Weber's "Euryanthe," and ending with the b flat symphony of Volkmann included between these three numbers of minor massivenessand weight, to which, nevertheless a general and deserved interest attached. These were the first performances in America of two MSS. compositions by Mr. Arthur Bird, and the singing by Mr. Emil Fischer of the great air of Lysiart in "Euryanthe," which appropriately followed the overture, and of the two songs with pianoforte accompaniment. The instrumental selections showed that Mr. Nikisch was already as good as his word in giving place to new American work, while the vocal numbers indicated a recognition of the general desire to hear men as well as women for vocalists in these concerts—a desire to which Mr. Gericke made too few concessions. Mr. Bird entitles his compositions "Episodes for Orchestra," probably on account of their brevity, naming the first "An Oriental Scene," while the second is an "Intermezzo and Trio." Each is a delicious bit of writing, scholarly and yet fanciful,—the first, indeed, being almost fantastic, uniting German solidity of texture to something of French delicacy and finesse. In the second the orchestra is of normal proportion, but in the first the wood-wind is increased, and the harp, drum, cymbals and glockenspiel are added, the former of these playing an important and illuminating part throughout. The second has a light and dancing accent, the trio bringing in a calmer contrast; but the first, cast mainly into a dreamful mood, with the harp rippling like a fountain, has within a secondary movement as picturesque and gay as it is odd and piquant. Each was warmly applauded, having evidently greatly pleased. Mr. Fischer was in fine voice and sang with that clear perception and appropriate style which make him not only a strong dramatic singer but also a polished vocalist. The overture had a splendid rendering. Being the introduction to a drama whose personages would have a right to interpret their music as well as sing its notes, there can probably be no fault with Mr. Nikisch for making all its phases, based as they are on themes from the work, instinct with the quality of their scenes. The opening was nobly energetic, the mystery of the muted string passages was deep and soft, the long airs were almost sung by the instruments, and the smaller episodes, each characteristic of some marked Weber trait, were individualized distinctly.

The Sanders Theatre concert of Thursday evening began the Cambridge season auspiciously. The orchestra, a little reduced in strings and brass, as suits the smaller room, always appears to the finest advantage in this most favorable room, and the presentment of works already heard in Boston was at all points adequate and welcome. Mrs. Moore-Lawson was wholly just to herself and satisfactory to her hearers in her chief air, but her songs with piano were not well chosen and gave her lovely voice and cultured style no fair showing.

The programme for this night week is an extraordinary one, its beginning, middle and end being a symphony, their order being Haydn in G, Mozart in G-minor, Beethoven (the fifth) in C-minor.

The first Young People's Popular will be given on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 13th instant, according to a programme and with a soloist yet to be announced.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The attendance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been phenomenal. At every performance thus far given hundreds have been turned away unable to obtain admission. So great has become the demand for additional concerts that the management have arranged a special matinee to be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13. Mr. Nikisch will present on this occasion a programme of light music and a soloist, yet to be announced will appear. Reserved seats for this matinee go on sale at Music Hall this morning. An exceedingly reasonable scale of prices has been adopted.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.—The two compositions played by the Kneisel quartet last Monday at the first concert of the season were Volkmann's Quartet in E minor and Brahms' Quintet in F, the part of second viola being played by Mr. Max Zach.

The quartet by Volkmann is a thoroughly delightful work, simple, melodious, and well put together. Hanslick objects to the tempo of the Scherzo and the continuous use of the mutes in the third movement, but it is difficult to see the reasonableness of this criticism. The quartet is an excellent example of Volkmann at his best.

The Quintet of Brahms is, in certain respects, an exasperating composition. The first movement is well nigh perfect. The themes are "frank" and beautiful, and the treatment of them is clear, and at the same time masterly so far as technique is concerned. The second movement with its sudden and inconsequential changes of tempo is not without charm, but the final allegro is dry and confused, a jumble of sounds, a woful misuse of the resources of counterpoint.

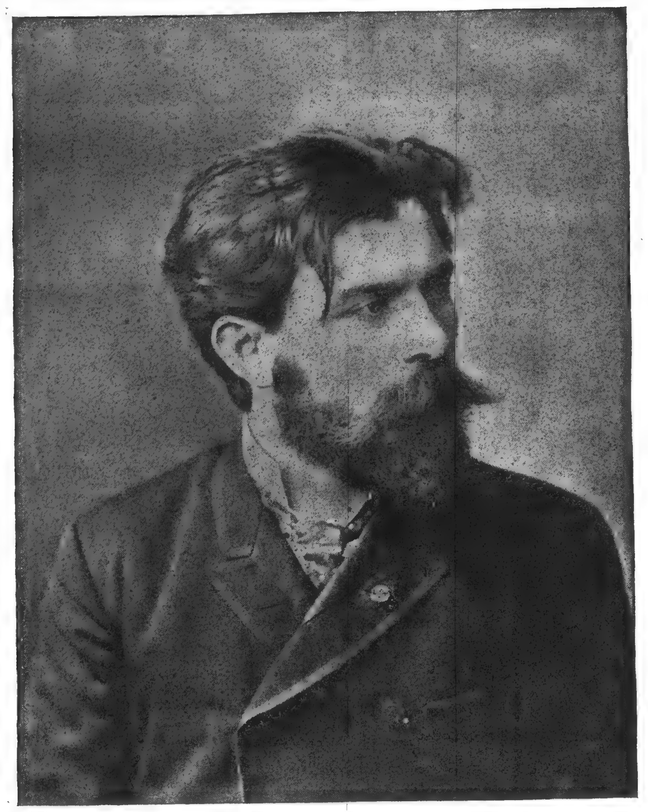
Although there were a few signs of nervousness, the playing of the accomplished musicians was most excellent. There was the due subordination of self which is so essential in true ensemble playing; there was the delightful purity of tone and controlled musical feeling which one naturally expects from such artists; and there was a decided gain in swing, a stronger sense of rhythm.

The singing of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson was a disappointment. Whether it was due to the selection of songs, or to physical indisposition, or nervousness—at least this is true: she did not make a favorable impression. Her voice is warm and full of color; but she does not have it under control. This was seen in tones which should have been firmly sustained; in her inability to use with effect the crescendo and diminuendo; and in the third selection there was a suspicion of doubtful intonation. Nor was her phrasing to be praised. In other words, it would seem as though she were as yet an unripe singer. Her first song, Presser's "By the Danube," is a worthless composition. Schumann's "Almond Tree" gave the audience an opportunity of hearing Mr. Arthur Foote play exquisitely the accompaniment. The "Tuscan Song" of Tyson Wolff is not without originality and merit.

The concert lasted an hour and thirty minutes; that is, it was of the right length.

"Young People's Popular."

So great is the demand for additional performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra that the management have decided to give occasional extra matinees, similar to those which found such favor with the public last season. The first of these matinees will be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, when Mr. Nikisch will present a popular programme, and a soloist not yet announced will appear. Reserved seats for this performance at reasonable prices go on sale at the box office this morning.



The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Before going on to our sketch of yesterday afternoon's rehearsal, the prophetic prologue of what is to be expected from the Symphony concert of this evening, we must revert for one moment to the concert of a week ago, and say something in regard to the performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, for which we could not wait on last Friday afternoon. In that performance the highest achievement of the orchestra thus far was added, while the interpretation—governed by the same principles and proceeding along the same lines as Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann and Beethoven—was approved even by those who had set themselves most decidedly against the originality of treatment and individuality of feeling which he had shown in those other works. Whether it was that Mendelssohn's music be regarded by them as less sacred, whether their objections have begun to yield a little in spite of themselves, or whether this symphony, being more fanciful and less emotional, did not tempt the conductor to so full and variable a use of his most ductile and obedient band, it would not be easy to say; perhaps all these three conditions were invited. Be this as it may and judging only by what the listeners felt, this piece of symphony playing might, without extravagance, be set down as perfection, and its gradual development from the bright beginning, through the romance and poetry of its central movements to the irrepressible and bounding gayety of the finale, charged with the spirit of sun and life and dance, was splendid in itself and exhilerating to the listeners. It was a bright ideal made brilliantly real.

The rehearsal of yesterday, beginning with a standard overture, that to Weber's "Euryanthe," and ending with the b flat symphony of Volkmann included between these three numbers of minor massivenessand weight, to which, nevertheless a general and deserved interest attached. These were the first performances in America of two MSS. compositions by Mr. Arthur Bird, and the singing by Mr. Emil Fischer of the great air of Lysiart in "Euryanthe," which appropriately followed the overture, and of the two songs with pianoforte accompaniment. The instrumental selections showed that Mr. Nikisch was already as good as his word in giving place to new American work, while the vocal numbers indicated a recognition of the general desire to hear men as well as women for vocalists in these concerts—a desire to which Mr. Gericke made too few concessions. Mr. Bird entitles his compositions "Episodes for Orchestra," probably on account of their brevity, naming the first "An Oriental Scene," while the second is an "Intermezzo and Trio." Each is a delicious bit of writing, scholarly and yet fanciful,—the first, indeed, being almost fantastic, uniting German solidity of texture to something of French delicacy and finesse. In the second the orchestra is of normal proportion, but in the first the wood-wind is increased, and the harp, drum, cymbals and glockenspiel are added, the former of these playing an important and illuminating part throughout. The second has a light and dancing accent, the trio bringing in a calmer contrast; but the first, cast mainly into a dreamful mood, with the harp rippling like a fountain, has within a secondary movement as picturesque and gay as it is odd and piquant. Each was warmly applauded, having evidently greatly pleased. Mr. Fischer was in fine voice and sang with that clear perception and appropriate style which make him not only a strong dramatic singer but also a polished vocalist. The overture had a splendid rendering. Being the introduction to a drama whose personages would have a right to interpret their music as well as sing its notes, there can probably be no fault with Mr. Nikisch for making all its phases, based as they are on themes from the work, instinct with the quality of their scenes. The opening was nobly energetic, the mystery of the muted string passages was deep and soft, the long airs were almost sung by the instruments, and the smaller episodes, each characteristic of some marked Weber trait, were individualized distinctly.

The Sanders Theatre concert of Thursday evening began the Cambridge season auspiciously. The orchestra, a little reduced in strings and brass, as suits the smaller room, always appears to the finest advantage in this most favorable room, and the presentment of works already heard in Boston was at all points adequate and welcome. Mrs. Moore-Lawson was wholly just to herself and satisfactory to her hearers in her chief air, but her songs with piano were not well chosen and gave her lovely voice and cultured style no fair showing.

The programme for this night week is an extraordinary one, its beginning, middle and end being a symphony, their order being Haydn in G, Mozart in G minor, Beethoven (the fifth) in C minor.

The first Young People's Popular will be given on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 13th instant, according to a programme and with a soloist yet to be announced.

"YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR."

The attendance at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season has been phenomenal. At every performance thus far given hundreds have been turned away unable to obtain admission. So great has become the demand for additional concerts that the management have arranged a special matinee to be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13. Mr. Nikisch will present on this occasion a programme of light music and a soloist, yet to be announced will appear. Reserved seats for this matinee go on sale at Music Hall this morning. An exceedingly reasonable scale of prices has been adopted.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1889

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.— The two compositions played by the Kneisel quartet last Monday at the first concert of the season were Volkmann's Quartet in E minor and Brahms' Quintet in F, the part of second viola being played by Mr. Max Zach.

The quartet by Volkmann is a thoroughly delightful work, simple, melodious, and well put together. Hanslick objects to the tempo of the Scherzo and the continuous use of the mutes in the third movement, but it is difficult to see the reasonableness of this criticism. The quartet is an excellent example of Volkmann at his best.

The Quintet of Brahms is, in certain respects, an exasperating composition. The first movement is well nigh perfect. The themes are "frank" and beautiful, and the treatment of them is clear, and at the same time masterly so far as technique is concerned. The second movement with its sudden and inconsequential changes of tempo is not without charm, but the final allegro is dry and confused, a jumble of sounds, a woful misuse of the resources of counterpoint.

Although there were a few signs of nervousness, the playing of the accomplished musicians was most excellent. There was the due subordination of self which is so essential in true ensemble playing; there was the delightful purity of tone and controlled musical feeling which one naturally expects from such artists; and there was a decided gain in swing, a stronger sense of rhythm.

The singing of Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson was a disappointment. Whether it was due to the selection of songs, or to physical indisposition, or nervousness—at least this is true: she did not make a favorable impression. Her voice is warm and full of color; but she does not have it under control. This was seen in tones which should have been firmly sustained; in her inability to use with effect the crescendo and diminuendo; and in the third selection there was a suspicion of doubtful intonation. Nor was her phrasing to be praised. In other words, it would seem as though she were as yet an unripe singer. Her first song, Presser's "By the Danube," is a worthless composition. Schumann's "Almond Tree" gave the audience an opportunity of hearing Mr. Arthur Foote play exquisitely the accompaniment. The "Tuscan Song" of Tyson Wolff is not without originality and merit.

The concert lasted an hour and thirty minutes; that is, it was of the right length.

"Young People's Popular."

So great is the demand for additional performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra that the management have decided to give occasional extra matinees, similar to those which found such favor with the public last season. The first of these matinees will be given at Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, when Mr. Nikisch will present a popular programme, and a soloist not yet announced will appear. Reserved seats for this performance at reasonable prices go on sale at the box office this morning.

HOME J
SATURDAY, NO
THE SYMPHONY CON
the third Symphony con Beethoven.....
Beethoven.....Fif Glinka.....
Mendelssohn.....
Mr. Carl Baermann playing was marked by quiet appreciation of mu tion of self. There we not clear, which were, in stance, the passages in first movement, which ar difficulty. At times ther rhythm; nor was Mr. B of a virtuoso. It seems these petty things; for, a tation was an admirable
An eminent critic ca
Egmont overture as it w rection of Mr. Nikisch.
sition he goes back to Bach and shows what a be in the treatment of a symphonic poem. In sp
"As far as the emotional he may be said to have in his scores, leaving litt pressive sort to be read performer." Now, is th works for the organ; w rections for the player.
Bach wished this fugue organ or that prelude wit preferred by the compos
That was the custom of t omissions before Bach cobaldi, George Muffat, a them in the delightful Martini. And when di meaning is not wholly pleno, for instance; ther many to-day as to w means "an organ comp
"full organ" in the mod find the leading organists same composition in dive the first part of the triple fortissimo, another will stops. No one knows ho it; no one knows whet
the same manner. "Pla is written, with appropri cianly phrasing, and y
But what is the "appr
there but one "phrasing" cian? Do not the sent pend in large measure performer? And would tional musicians agree a certain passages? Ther garding the proper perfor
of that period which we by Couperin, and Eman certainly be regarded;
should be played as a corrente. But there is ble to sentiment or phras
This gentleman compl well-written paragraph o overture; but, "to come ples," just where and ho
I, personally, did not fi
the first seven measures played, and for this reaso of rhythm, the phrases were not clearly defined,
pp. to ff was a sudden ju sage may have delighted Then, again, the "ren
the trio of the third mov was obnoxious to this would he have played four part song, given to is it not? It should be ers sing it in absolutely s Glinka wrote his Kam two Russian folk songs, years before, he began a for "piano for three han ished. It would be int
two. The orchestral p structed, subtly writt founded on two simple more to the musician th in the second of the son the peculiar melancholy part of the Russian nat his Memoirs, "We, peop have the sentimento br
We either have no impr sions as go to the botto feel unspeakable joy or us, love is tinged with sa Glinka, born in 1804, c earliest Russian compo sky (1751–1825), director at St. Petersburg, was rare endowments and greatest work is his sett for four and eight voi his works performed at S his religious sentiment, of voices, mastery of ex ranging parts, and sover observed by both pred raries.
Bortniansky founded the plain song of the R
"tonality" of this plain only in the melodies of even in the writings of modern Russian school wishes to examine this consult with profit the fi la Musique en Russie" poff, Paris 1862).
But Glinka was under of his country is conc
He was the forerunner sakoff, Dargomijsky, Bo batcheff. His influence Tschaikowsky. And no is a Russian school, a se ity; the radical memb Gustave Bertrand, are n style peculiar to thems separate musical tongu of the charge of imitatio repudiate even the Itali and the whole system o lation which has been time the basis of all mus
However this may be,
to hear the compositio hope that during the eng neither this remarkable French composers will b temptuously passed by.
"YOUNG PEO
The first of the extra
Symphony Orchestra
last season, will be gi day afternoon, Nov. 1 sent a programme yet to be announce seats for this concert this morning.

[14]

BROOKLINE CHRONICLE
NOVEMBER 2,

The season of chamber concerts was auspiciously opened in Chickering Hall last Monday evening, by the Kneisel Quartet, assisted Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson. The change in the personnel of the quartet becomes apparent with the first few measures. Mr. Hekking, who takes Mr. Giese's place, is less assertive of the solo qualities of his instrument, while yet remaining a more prominent factor than either the second violin or viola. Whether the change is to be beneficial to the quartet as a whole is a question impossible of solution until by constant association the men grow into that perfect sympathy of intention which characterized the old organization. The opening number was a quartet in E minor, by Volkmann, a bright sparkling work as far removed from the frivolous as from the pedantic. The first movement is admirably conceived, the themes are easily intelligible, well developed and always impart interesting information. The scherzo is very bright and pleasing, and so short as but to enhance the contrast between the first and third movement, which latter is a beautifully lyrical bit of legato playing, with muted strings and effects of the most delicate character. The finale is a clean, crisp, staccato movement, never still a moment, but relieved by smooth legato melodies given to the first violin and 'cello, alternately above and below the accompaniment which is a veritable perpetual motion. The entire quartette was played with remarkable smoothness and accuracy. Mrs. Lawson sang songs by Presser, Schumann and Wolff. Her lower tones are weak and the upper approach a brilliancy not incompatible with hardness, but in the middle register her voice is rich and beautiful. The timbre is peculiar and may perhaps be best described by imagining the tones of a flute imbued with warmth and resonance. Her method is excellent, she has a perfect legato and very distinct enunciation. All that she does has more of polish than of dramatic intensity, but that may be imputed to the character of her songs, which were idyllic rather than passionate. Mr. Arthur Foote accompanied her in his usual artistic manner. The concert closed with a performance of the quintet op. 88, by Brahms, Mr. Max Zach playing the second viola. This work is much less obscure than some of this composer's compositions; the themes are clear and distinct, and each was given due prominence upon its appearance. Extended comment is superfluous, but we cannot but speak of the magnificent crescendo in the first movement, working up to an impressive climax and subsiding into a gentle and subdued coda. The second concert will be given Dec. 2d.

A. F. C.

Boston Commonwealth.

NOVEMBER 2, 1889.

The musical season definitely and charmingly opened with the Kneisel Quartette Concert, on Monday evening. The change in the personnel of the quartette, in the substitution of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese as the 'cellist, is evidently no change for the worse; which is saying much, considering the immense popularity of the former artist. The audience on Monday was one which almost completely filled the hall; and its reception of the programme offered was always appreciative, and at moments most enthusiastic. The programme was as follows:

Volkmann—quartette, in E minor, op. 35, No. 4; allegro con modo; scherzo (presto); andantino; finale; allegretto vivace.
SONGS.—Gustav Presser—"By the Danube"; Schumann;—"The Almond Tree"; Tyson Wolff;—"Tuscan Song." Brahms;—quintette, in F, op. 88; allegro non troppo ma con brio; grave ed appassionata; allegro energico (first time.)
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartette was played with the delicacy and the repose suited to its fresh, flowing and simple style. The andantino movement was especially delightful. Mrs. Lawson's singing was much enjoyed. Her voice is flexible and of good compass, though with a perceptible cloudiness in the lower register, often observable in voices which lack sound Italian training. Her enunciation is commendably good, and her last song was given with contagious dramatic feeling. Mr. Arthur Foote was her accompanist.

The Brahms quintette was nobly given; its beautiful allegro opening movement receiving the most cordial applause of the evening.

The concert as a whole was delightful, both as performance and as promise. The series—of which the second is promised for Monday evening, Dec. 2, will doubtless be, as ever, popular in the best sense of the word, and with the best classes of our music loving public.

The Morning Times
LOWELL, MASS.
SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 2.

The announcement of the performance to be given in the opera house by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch, will be hailed with delight by every music lover. The Boston orchestra is now the leading musical organization of the country, and its concerts not only in Boston but in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and other large cities have been [illegible]

NOVEMBER 3,

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTH CONCERT.

The programme rendered by the Symphony Orchestra last evening was: Weber,—Overture, (Euryanthe); Weber,—Air, "Wo berg, ich mich?" from Euryanthe; Arthur Bird,—Oriental Scene, and Intermezzo and Trio (first time in Boston); songs with pianoforte. Littolf,—"Resignation." Schumann,—Romanza from "Spanish Liebeslieder," op. 138; Volkmann,—Symphony in B flat.

The episodes by Arthur Bird are charmingly reminiscent of the composer's thoughts, without being in any mocking bird sense of the term plagiaristic. The composer's treatment of the orchestra is that of a masterly musician.

Mr. Emil Fischer has a remarkably pliant and voluminous bass voice, but his habits of vocalism are unmistakeably teutonic and at times so spasmodic as to be anything but agreeable. His rendering of the Weber aria was most commendable for his fluent mastery of its difficult roulades and the songs by Schumann and Littolf were well interpreted.

The orchestral selections were rendered with all the fidelity that one could desire.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The First of the Season's Concerts in Chickering Hall Last Monday Evening.

The general sincerity of the large and attentive audience that listened to the interpretations by the Kneisel quartette in Chickering hall Monday evening may possibly be questioned. In fact, the average sincerity of large and fashionable audiences on such occasions is almost invariably questioned. But why? Some sapient yet well-meaning musician may reply that the actual limitations of musical enjoyment are necessarily confined to the intellectual scope of the hearer's appreciation. Sic? It would be almost as absurd to affirm that the mere animal who is pleasurably affected by the concord of sweet sounds can to any extent appreciate their inherent or artistic meaning. This being the case, it is logically true, considering the question from a higher standpoint, that there is many an untrained amateur who can intensely enjoy the most classical music without the slightest genuine appreciation mingling with the crude and purely emotional kind of enjoyment he derives from it. It is simply from a higher standpoint that the musical expert enjoys. He not only feels what he hears, but he listens to music with the well-founded consciousness that to him and his peers it is a very high order of language.

To the educated in music as well as the uneducated fancy there may have been very much in common as regards the musical effect of the Kneisel quertette's first programme for the season. Especially is this true of the quartette by Volkmann with which the concert opened. Here was a composition of the very best quality; not only classical both in spirit and in truth, but also so clear and melodious in all its details as to be well nigh ear-catching. Its technical structure is upon well-worn principles,—such for example as good father Haydn would have been foremost in endorsing; but it is none the less welcome on this account; the genuine inspiration of the work and its artistic character as well are thoroughly impressive.

How different the Brahms quintette with which the concert ended; and yet, with the opening allegro of this selection, there was much that might properly be described as both genial and melodious. The second movement is unaccountably affirmed by the composer to be grave et appassionata. It is more properly speaking a grave et scherzando, the music of the first as well as the concluding portions of the movement being very illustrative of the composer's profoundest melancholy, while interspersing the same, and with piquant contrast, is an allegretto vivace of the most pronounced type. The closing allegro energico is a very artistic example of fugatal writing, and is in a musical sense both effective and exhilarating.

The best playing by Mr. Kneisel and his associates was with the Volkmann selection. The finale of the Brahms quintette was also rendered with admirable effect. Mr. Hekking is an invaluable acquisition to the quartette, as, unlike his virtuosal predecessor, he seems thoroughly capable of forgetting that he is a virtuoso, and is even more masterly when playing ensemble than as a soloist.

The instrumental music of the programme was interspersed with a group of songs which, excepting "The Almond Tree" by Schumann, was unworthily at variance with the artistic character of the concert. The singer was Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, who has a very agreeable voice, but whose admirable expression is well-nigh exclusively confined to her charming stage presence. The Schumann song was mainly rendered artistic by the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Arthur Foote. Mrs. Lawson's share in the performance was, to a very considerable extent, both amateurish and inexpressive.

The second concert by the Quartette will take place on Monday evening, Dec. 2.

C. L. CAPEN.

WASHINGTON
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON GIVES HIM A WELCOME

Various Comments on His Work—The Programmes of the Choral Society Promise Some Entertaining Musical Events—The Georgetown Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, the Leipsic conductor, who succeeded Mr. Gericke in the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has apparently conquered Boston. The opening concert some nights ago was attended by an audience which filled every seat and every available inch of standing room in the spacious Music Hall, and, which became, as the programme progressed, wildly enthusiastic. The numbers selected were well-known, and were as follows:

Vorspiel—"Meistersinger" ..... Wagner
"Coriolanus"—Overture ..... Beethoven
"Rosamunde"—Extracts ..... Schubert
Fourth Symphony—D minor ..... Schumann

If concurrent testimony has any weight the concert must have been a memorable occasion. The critics vied with each other in the selection of complimentary expressions. Mr. Krehbiel, of the New York Tribune, thought that Boston was to be envied the possession of such an orchestra, and doubly the possession of such a conductor. The critic of the New York Times said of the Meistersinger Vorspiel that never had that immortal prelude been played so well in America. The Boston critics were equally effusive. More than this, the Boston Herald, having interviewed the best known musicians of that city for their opinion of the new conductor, obtained from such men as Carl Zerrahn, Prof. J. K. Paine, George L. Osgood, and Bernhard Listemann only words of praise. If these musicians are to be credited with a cool, impartial judgement, this country has secured a conductor whose work is likely to be a revelation to musical people.

The characteristics of Mr. Nikisch, who, by the way, is a Hungarian and only thirty-five years old, seem to be a perfect freedom, a masterly control of his players, and an original, not to say sensational, style of interpreting well-known works. In his first concert it was noticed that he gave a prominence to the brass instruments which was almost Seidl-like, and which was in direct contrast to the ideas inculcated by Mr. Gericke. While this departure was admired by some, it nevertheless created some regret, because it weakened the beautiful string effects for which the orchestra has been so famous, and it raises a doubt as to the continuance of that wonderful precision and perfect tune which was so admirably shown in a work like Volkmann's serenade for strings. Mr. Nikisch, too, created a mild sensation by appearing before his orchestra with neither music-stand or score and directing throughout the whole evening by memory alone. This fact seems to have appealed to the Boston critics with a peculiar and unusual force. Theodore Thomas could have done the same thing and Mr. Gericke, although he was always a close follower of a score, must be equally as familiar with the numbers as Mr. Nikisch. It was, however, a feat that appealed to the audience and which gave the impression of perfect confidence and thorough knowledge.

Amid the chorus of universal praise a few still, small voices have been heard. These have pointed out that Mr. Nikisch has not yet proven himself superior to his predecessors, and a great deal of his success as a conductor must be credited to the fact that his orchestra is one upon which he has complete reliance. With such players, each one an artist, accustomed to play together and to observe closely the markings of the score, perfection of work is almost certain, no matter who wields the baton. Time must elapse, therefore, before we can see whether the standard of the orchestra is really raised, and whether this idol-worship is really deserved. If it is, no audiences will be more swift to grant Mr. Nikisch his full meed of praise than those which assemble here to listen to the five concerts which will be given at the new Music Hall by the orchestra during the coming winter.

* * *

The Morning Times
LOWELL
THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 7.

Amusement Notes.

The concert to-night at the new opera house by the Boston Symphony orchestra will surely be an event of great interest to every lover of good music. Never have the notices preceding the arrival of a foreign artist been more flattering and never more fully justified by performance than in the case of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor, who seems to have fairly captured the musical public of New England. The Boston concerts of the Symphony orchestra have been attended by enormous audiences and hundreds have been turned away from every performance unable to obtain admission. The concert to-night will be in all respects equal to those given in Boston. Miss Finlayson will be the soloist and Mr. Nikisch will offer a fine programme. A very large house is already assured. Intending purchasers of tickets will do well to secure seats early at the box office.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1889.

MUSIC.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In spite of the bad weather Saturday evening, Music Hall was crowded for the fourth concert of the Symphony series, for which the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Air, "Wo berg ich mich," from "Euryanthe" .... Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.) ..... Arthur Bird
First time in Boston.
Songs with pianoforte.
"Resignation," ..... Litolff
Romance from "Spanish Love Songs," op. 138. ..... Schumann
Symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 53 ..... Volkmann
Soloist, Mr. Emil Fischer.

It must be confessed that, as a whole, the concert was disappointing, for which feeling neither the orchestra nor Mr Nikisch is to be blamed, as the fault lay in the programme itself, so that the conductor was only indirectly responsible for the lack of enthusiasm and interest. The overture was finely played, and was even more effective than recently in the Providence concert. Mr. Nikisch shows the same freedom in its interpretation which has characterized all his classical readings as yet, but here again the result attained is thoroughly satisfactory, and the unusually slow tempo which he took at the appearance of the second theme—in the score there is no indication whatever of a change in time—certainly adds greatly to the musical interest and picturesque romanticism of the work. The air from "Euryanthe" is also a fine number and it was excellently sung by Mr. Fischer, who is always at his best in operatic selections, especially those of the more distinctly dramatic tendency. To such of the listeners as were unfamiliar with the whole opera it was doubtless a surprise to perceive a marked similarity between the general coloring of this air and a great deal of the music in "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin." On hearing the opera complete, however, this is noticeable in a thousand different ways and places, and it only corroborates Wagner's own statements as to the very profound influence which Weber's later works made upon his own dramatically musical tendencies. It is not that Wagner can be justly accused of plagiarism; but the feeling and coloring and general harmonic basis of "Lohengrin" is undeniably very closely related to that of "Euryanthe." With this number ended the chief musical interest of the concert, as the other numbers most evidently exercised a saddening and depressing effect upon the audience.

Mr. Arthur Bird is an exceedingly clever young musician, who, although born in Cambridge, has selected Berlin as a place of residence, where he has now lived for many years. There is no doubt as to his ability; in short, his skill in composition is so certain that it was to some extent an injustice to select the two numbers played on Saturday as a means of introducing him to his fellow-countrymen in this city. To begin with, they are both compositions of a class which have their place, if at all, in a composer's sketch-book, but certainly not in the concert room, and still more certainly not on the programme of a Symphony concert. Their only merit is the great skill in instrumentation of which they give the most undeniable proof. The first, "Scene Orientale," is incomprehensible in form, and in substance recalls Bizet with extraordinary vividity. A curious effect is obtained at the beginning by scales on the harp in D minor, with C natural instead of C sharp. The instrumentation is exceedingly full and rich, and the constantly recurring minor second in the wood-wind is very clever, but by no means to be considered as Mr. Bird's invention or exclusive property. The "intermezzo" is a composition of which it is difficult to speak very seriously. Mr. Bird is said to be an especially intimate friend of Moskowski's, and indeed it would appear that the friendly relations between them have been extended to the point where Mr. Bird feels himself at liberty to use his comrade's ideas wherever he sees fit. The "trio" of the "intermezzo" is a most impertinent plagiarism from the Moskowski "Suite" heard here last year, and the whole work is far from original. If it is indeed the carelessness of friendship to which this is due, it would be interesting to know whether Moskowski makes inroads upon Mr. Bird's compositions in the same youthfully enthusiastic manner. The fact is that these slight sketches, as indicated above, do not belong to the concert room at all, and as Mr. Bird has written a really fine "Symphony in A," and a very clever "Suite," it is to be regretted that he was not represented by one of these more complete compositions. Mr. Nikisch, in keeping with his custom of conducting from memory, went to the trouble of learning the two compositions of Mr. Bird by heart, and conducted them also without the score. His memory is certainly marvellous, and he doubtless is able to attain results in this way which are difficult if not impossible to the conductor who is dependent on the score.

The two songs were also out of place on a Symphony programme; the Litolff composition instills almost any feeling but that of "resignation," and the Schumann romance is anything but Spanish. Mr. Fischer, moreover, sang them both in an uninteresting and bored manner. The pianoforte accompaniments were very artistically played by Mr. Max Zach. The Volkmann composition would seem to be more properly a suite than a symphony. It is also dangerously near the borders of the dreary desert land of "capellmeister-musik." The first movement is clear and comprehensive, and it exhibits this composer's well-known contrapuntal skill in a marked degree, but it is not interesting. It is followed by a nondescript allegretto which savors strongly of ballet music, and a mournful andantino which contains a wholly unnecessary canon between horn and oboe. The polyphonic forms of imitation, canon and fugue, all very beautiful when properly used as a means to an end, but when they appear, as the Germans say, "dragged in by the hair," as a sort of advertisement of personal technical ability, they can hardly be considered as fulfilling their just destiny. The latter part of the symphony is a jumble of notes which is doubtless very difficult to play, but still more difficult to listen to, with, however, a distinctly redeeming touch to the brilliant coda which closes the work

There are a number of works which have not been heard in Boston at all, or not for a year or so, which it would greatly interest a large number of people to hear during the present season—as such might be mentioned: Overture to "Genovera," Schumann; overture to the "Barbier von Bagdad," Peter Cornelius (this was played last year); the Dante symphony, with chorus, Liszt; the C minor symphony, Brahms; the suite "Roma," Bizet, and a score of others. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch will see his way to incorporating some of the above into his plan of programmes. For next Saturday the announcement is as follows:

Symphony in G ..... Haydn
Symphony in G minor ..... Mozart
Symphony in C minor ..... Beethoven

The concert-goer must not be appalled or frightened by the array of symphonies. The experiment has been tried—(I believe always with these same three symphonies)—in a number of German cities, and with great success and satisfaction to the listeners; even in light-hearted Paris, where the musical enthusiast usually demands "quelquechose de gai" to establish a contrast in a classical programme, it was listened to most earnestly. Such a programme is not only very interesting, but it is bound to be immensely instructive.

ARTHUR WELD.

[14]

BROOKLINE CHRONICLE, NOVEMBER 2,

The season of chamber concerts was auspiciously opened in Chickering Hall last Monday evening, by the Kneisel Quartet, assisted Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson. The change in the personnel of the quartet becomes apparent with the first few measures. Mr. Hekking, who takes Mr. Giese's place, is less assertive of the solo qualities of his instrument, while yet remaining a more prominent factor than either the second violin or viola. Whether the change is to be beneficial to the quartet as a whole is a question impossible of solution until by constant association the men grow into that perfect sympathy of intention which characterized the old organization. The opening number was a quartet in E minor, by Volkmann, a bright sparkling work as far removed from the frivolous as from the pedantic. The first movement is admirably conceived, the themes are easily intelligible, well developed and always impart interesting information. The scherzo is very bright and pleasing, and so short as but to enhance the contrast between the first and third movement, which latter is a beautifully lyrical bit of legato playing, with muted strings and effects of the most delicate character. The finale is a clean, crisp, staccato movement, never still a moment, but relieved by smooth legato melodies given to the first violin and 'cello, alternately above and below the accompaniment which is a veritable perpetual motion. The entire quartette was played with remarkable smoothness and accuracy. Mrs. Lawson sang songs by Presser, Schumann and Wolff. Her lower tones are weak and the upper approach a brilliancy not incompatible with hardness, but in the middle register her voice is rich and beautiful. The timbre is peculiar and may perhaps be best described by imagining the tones of a flute imbued with warmth and resonance. Her method is excellent, she has a perfect legato and very distinct enunciation. All that she does has more of polish than of dramatic intensity, but that may be imputed to the character of her songs, which were idyllic rather than passionate. Mr. Arthur Foote accompanied her in his usual artistic manner. The concert closed with a performance of the quintet op. 88, by Brahms, Mr. Max Zach playing the second viola. This work is much less obscure than some of this composer's compositions; the themes are clear and distinct, and each was given due prominence upon its appearance. Extended comment is superfluous, but we cannot but speak of the magnificent crescendo in the first movement, working up to an impressive climax and subsiding into a gentle and subdued coda. The second concert will be given Dec. 2d.

A. F. C.

Boston Commonwealth.

NOVEMBER 2, 1889.

The musical season definitely and charmingly opened with the Kneisel Quartette Concert, on Monday evening. The change in the personnel of the quartette, in the substitution of Mr. Hekking for Mr. Giese as the 'cellist, is evidently no change for the worse; which is saying much, considering the immense popularity of the former artist. The audience on Monday was one which almost completely filled the hall; and its reception of the programme offered was always appreciative, and at moments most enthusiastic. The programme was as follows:

Volkmann—quartette, in E minor, op. 35, No. 4; allegro con modo; scherzo (presto); andantino; finale; allegretto vivace.

SONGS.—Gustav Presser—"By the Danube"; Schumann;—"The Almond Tree"; Tyson Wolff;—"Tuscan Song." Brahms;—quintette, in F, op. 88; allegro non troppo ma con brio; grave ed appassionata; allegro energico (first time.)

Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

The Volkmann quartette was played with the delicacy and the repose suited to its fresh, flowing and simple style. The andantino movement was especially delightful. Mrs. Lawson's singing was much enjoyed. Her voice is flexible and of good compass, though with a perceptible cloudiness in the lower register, often observable in voices which lack sound Italian training. Her enunciation is commendably good, and her last song was given with contagious dramatic feeling. Mr. Arthur Foote was her accompanist.

The Brahms quintette was nobly given; its beautiful allegro opening movement receiving the most cordial applause of the evening.

The concert as a whole was delightful, both as performance and as promise. The series—of which the second is promised for Monday evening, Dec. 2, will doubtless be, as ever, popular in the best sense of the word, and with the best classes of our music loving public.

The Morning Times

LOWELL, MASS.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 2.

The announcement of the performance to be given in the opera house by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch, will be hailed with delight by every music lover. The Boston orchestra is now the leading musical organization of the country, and its concerts not only in Boston but in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and other large cities have become important events of the musical season

BOSTON [illegible], NOVEMBER 3,

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTH CONCERT.

The programme rendered by the Symphony Orchestra last evening was: Weber,—Overture, (Euryanthe); Weber,—Air, "Wo berg, ich mich?" from Euryanthe; Arthur Bird,—Oriental Scene, and Intermezzo and Trio (first time in Boston); songs with pianoforte. Littolf,—"Resignation." Schumann,—Romanza from "Spanish Liebeslieder," op. 138; Volkmann,—Symphony in B flat.

The episodes by Arthur Bird are charmingly reminiscent of the composer's thoughts, without being in any mocking bird sense of the term plagiaristic. The composer's treatment of the orchestra is that of a masterly musician.

Mr. Emil Fischer has a remarkably pliant and voluminous bass voice, but his habits of vocalism are unmistakeably teutonic and at times so spasmodic as to be anything but agreeable. His rendering of the Weber aria was most commendable for his fluent mastery of its difficult roulades and the songs by Schumann and Littolf were well interpreted.

The orchestral selections were rendered with all the fidelity that one could desire.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1889.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The First of the Season's Concerts in Chickering Hall Last Monday Evening.

The general sincerity of the large and attentive audience that listened to the interpretations by the Kneisel quartette in Chickering hall Monday evening may possibly be questioned. In fact, the average sincerity of large and fashionable audiences on such occasions is almost invariably questioned. But why? Some sapient yet well-meaning musician may reply that the actual limitations of musical enjoyment are necessarily confined to the intellectual scope of the hearer's appreciation. Sic? It would be almost as absurd to affirm that the mere animal who is pleasurably affected by the concord of sweet sounds can to any extent appreciate their inherent or artistic meaning. This being the case, it is logically true, considering the question from a higher standpoint, that there is many an untrained amateur who can intensely enjoy the most classical music without the slightest genuine appreciation mingling with the crude and purely emotional kind of enjoyment he derives from it. It is simply from a higher standpoint that the musical expert enjoys. He not only feels what he hears, but he listens to music with the well-founded consciousness that to him and his peers it is a very high order of language.

To the educated in music as well as the uneducated fancy there may have been very much in common as regards the musical effect of the Kneisel quertette's first programme for the season. Especially is this true of the quartette by Volkmann with which the concert opened. Here was a composition of the very best quality; not only classical both in spirit and in truth, but also so clear and melodious in all its details as to be well nigh ear-catching. Its technical structure is upon well-worn principles,—such for example as good father Haydn would have been foremost in endorsing; but it is none the less welcome on this account; the genuine inspiration of the work and its artistic character as well are thoroughly impressive.

How different the Brahms quintette with which the concert ended; and yet, with the opening allegro of this selection, there was much that might properly be described as both genial and melodious. The second movement is unaccountably affirmed by the composer to be grave et appassionata. It is more properly speaking a grave et scherzando, the music of the first as well as the concluding portions of the movement being very illustrative of the composer's profoundest melancholy, while interspersing the same, and with piquant contrast, is an allegretto vivace of the most pronounced type. The closing allegro energico is a very artistic example of fugatal writing, and is in a musical sense both effective and exhilarating.

The best playing by Mr. Kneisel and his associates was with the Volkmann selection. The finale of the Brahms quintette was also rendered with admirable effect. Mr. Hekking is an invaluable acquisition to the quartette, as, unlike his virtuosal predecessor, he seems thoroughly capable of forgetting that he is a virtuoso, and is even more masterly when playing ensemble than as a soloist.

The instrumental music of the programme was interspersed with a group of songs which, excepting "The Almond Tree" by Schumann, was unworthily at variance with the artistic character of the concert. The singer was Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, who has a very agreeable voice, but whose admirable expression is well-nigh exclusively confined to her charming stage presence. The Schumann song was mainly rendered artistic by the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Arthur Foote. Mrs. Lawson's share in the performance was, to a very considerable extent, both amateurish and inexpressive.

The second concert by the Quartette will take place on Monday evening, Dec. 2.

C. L. CAPEN.

THE WASHINGTON POST, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27,

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON GIVES HIM A WELCOME

Various Comments on His Work—The Programmes of the Choral Society Promise Some Entertaining Musical Events—The Georgetown Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, the Leipsic conductor, who succeeded Mr. Gericke in the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has apparently conquered Boston. The opening concert some nights ago was attended by an audience which filled every seat and every available inch of standing room in the spacious Music Hall, and, which became, as the programme progressed, wildly enthusiastic. The numbers selected were well-known, and were as follows:

Vorspiel—"Meistersinger".....Wagner
"Coriolanus"—Overture.....Beethoven
"Rosamunde"—Extracts.....Schubert
Fourth Symphony—D minor.....Schumann

If concurrent testimony has any weight the concert must have been a memorable occasion. The critics vied with each other in the selection of complimentary expressions. Mr. Krehbiel, of the New York Tribune, thought that Boston was to be envied the possession of such an orchestra, and doubly the possession of such a conductor. The critic of the New York Times said of the Meistersinger Vorspiel that never had that immortal prelude been played so well in America. The Boston critics were equally effusive. More than this, the Boston Herald, having interviewed the best known musicians of that city for their opinion of the new conductor, obtained from such men as Carl Zerrahn, Prof. J. K. Paine, George L. Osgood, and Bernhard Listemann only words of praise. If these musicians are to be credited with a cool, impartial judgement, this country has secured a conductor whose work is likely to be a revelation to musical people.

The characteristics of Mr. Nikisch, who, by the way, is a Hungarian and only thirty-five years old, seem to be a perfect freedom, a masterly control of his players, and an original, not to say sensational, style of interpreting well-known works. In his first concert it was noticed that he gave a prominence to the brass instruments which was almost Seidl-like, and which was in direct contrast to the ideas inculcated by Mr. Gericke. While this departure was admired by some, it nevertheless created some regret, because it weakened the beautiful string effects for which the orchestra has been so famous, and it raises a doubt as to the continuance of that wonderful precision and perfect tune which was so admirably shown in a work like Volkmann's serenade for strings. Mr. Nikisch, too, created a mild sensation by appearing before his orchestra with neither music-stand or score and directing throughout the whole evening by memory alone. This fact seems to have appealed to the Boston critics with a peculiar and unusual force. Theodore Thomas could have done the same thing and Mr. Gericke, although he was always a close follower of a score, must be equally as familiar with the numbers as Mr. Nikisch. It was, however, a feat that appealed to the audience and which gave the impression of perfect confidence and thorough knowledge.

Amid the chorus of universal praise a few still, small voices have been heard. These have pointed out that Mr. Nikisch has not yet proven himself superior to his predecessors, and a great deal of his success as a conductor must be credited to the fact that his orchestra is one upon which he has complete reliance. With such players, each one an artist, accustomed to play together and to observe closely the markings of the score, perfection of work is almost certain, no matter who wields the baton. Time must elapse, therefore, before we can see whether the standard of the orchestra is really raised, and whether this idol-worship is really deserved. If it is, no audiences will be more swift to grant Mr. Nikisch his full meed of praise than those which assemble here to listen to the five concerts which will be given at the new Music Hall by the orchestra during the coming winter.

* * *

The Morning Times

LOWELL

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 7.

Amusement Notes.

The concert to-night at the new opera house by the Boston Symphony orchestra will surely be an event of great interest to every lover of good music. Never have the notices preceding the arrival of a foreign artist been more flattering and never more fully justified by performance than in the case of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor, who seems to have fairly captured the musical public of New England. The Boston concerts of the Symphony orchestra have been attended by enormous audiences and hundreds have been turned away from every performance unable to obtain admission. The concert to-night will be in all respects equal to those given in Boston. Miss Finlayson will be the soloist and Mr. Nikisch will offer a fine programme. A very large house is already assured. Intending purchasers of tickets will do well to secure seats early at the box office.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1889

MUSIC.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In spite of the bad weather Saturday evening, Music Hall was crowded for the fourth concert of the Symphony series, for which the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Air, "Wo berg ich mich," from "Euryanthe"....Weber
Two episodes for orchestra (MS.).....Arthur Bird
First time in Boston.
Songs with pianoforte.
"Resignation,".....Litolff
Romance from "Spanish Love Songs," op. 138.....Schumann
Symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 53.....Volkmann
Soloist, Mr. Emil Fischer.

It must be confessed that, as a whole, the concert was disappointing, for which feeling neither the orchestra nor Mr Nikisch is to be blamed, as the fault lay in the programme itself, so that the conductor was only indirectly responsible for the lack of enthusiasm and interest. The overture was finely played, and was even more effective than recently in the Providence concert. Mr. Nikisch shows the same freedom in its interpretation which has characterized all his classical readings as yet, but here again the result attained is thoroughly satisfactory; and the unusually slow tempo which he took at the appearance of the second theme—in the score there is no indication whatever of a change in time—certainly adds greatly to the musical interest and picturesque romanticism of the work. The air from "Euryanthe" is also a fine number and it was excellently sung by Mr. Fischer, who is always at his best in operatic selections, especially those of the more distinctly dramatic tendency. To such of the listeners as were unfamiliar with the whole opera it was doubtless a surprise to perceive a marked similarity between the general coloring of this air and a great deal of the music in "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin." On hearing the opera complete, however, this is noticeable in a thousand different ways and places, and it only corroborates Wagner's own statements as to the very profound influence which Weber's later works made upon his own dramatically musical tendencies. It is not that Wagner can be justly accused of plagiarism; but the feeling and coloring and general harmonic basis of "Lohengrin" is undeniably very closely related to that of "Euryanthe." With this number ended the chief musical interest of the concert, as the other numbers most evidently exercised a saddening and depressing effect upon the audience.

Mr. Arthur Bird is an exceedingly clever young musician, who, although born in Cambridge, has selected Berlin as a place of residence, where he has now lived for many years. There is no doubt as to his ability; in short, his skill in composition is so certain that it was to some extent an injustice to select the two numbers played on Saturday as a means of introducing him to his fellow-countrymen in this city. To begin with, they are both compositions of a class which have their place, if at all, in a composer's sketch-book, but certainly not in the concert room, and still more certainly not on the programme of a Symphony concert. Their only merit is the great skill in instrumentation of which they give the most undeniable proof. The first, "Scene Orientale," is incomprehensible in form, and in substance recalls Bizet with extraordinary vividity. A curious effect is obtained at the beginning by scales on the harp in D minor, with C natural instead of C sharp. The instrumentation is exceedingly full and rich, and the constantly recurring minor second in the wood-wind is very clever, but by no means to be considered as Mr. Bird's invention or exclusive property. The "intermezzo" is a composition of which it is difficult to speak very seriously. Mr. Bird is said to be an especially intimate friend of Moskowski's, and indeed it would appear that the friendly relations between them have been extended to the point where Mr. Bird feels himself at liberty to use his comrade's ideas wherever he sees fit. The "trio" of the "intermezzo" is a most impertinent plagiarism from the Moskowski "Suite" heard here last year, and the whole work is far from original. If it is indeed the carelessness of friendship to which this is due, it would be interesting to know whether Moskowski makes inroads upon Mr. Bird's compositions in the same youthfully enthusiastic manner. The fact is that these slight sketches, as indicated above, do not belong to the concert room at all, and as Mr. Bird has written a really fine "Symphony in A," and a very clever "Suite," it is to be regretted that he was not represented by one of these more complete compositions. Mr. Nikisch, in keeping with his custom of conducting from memory, went to the trouble of learning the two compositions of Mr. Bird by heart, and conducted them also without the score. His memory is certainly marvellous, and he doubtless is able to attain results in this way which are difficult if not impossible to the conductor who is dependent on the score.

The two songs were also out of place on a Symphony programme; the Litolff composition instills almost any feeling but that of "resignation," and the Schumann romance is anything but Spanish. Mr. Fischer, moreover, sang them both in an uninteresting and bored manner. The pianoforte accompaniments were very artistically played by Mr. Max Zach. The Volkmann composition would seem to be more properly a suite than a symphony. It is also dangerously near the borders of the dreary desert land of "capellmeister-musik." The first movement is clear and comprehensive, and it exhibits this composer's well-known contrapuntal skill in a marked degree, but it is not interesting. It is followed by a nondescript allegretto which savors strongly of ballet music, and a mournful andantino which contains a wholly unnecessary canon between horn and oboe. The polyphonic forms of imitation, canon and fugue, all very beautiful when properly used as a means to an end, but when they appear, as the Germans say, "dragged in by the hair," as a sort of advertisement of personal technical ability, they can hardly be considered as fulfilling their just destiny. The latter part of the symphony is a jumble of notes which is doubtless very difficult to play, but still more difficult to listen to, with, however, a distinctly redeeming touch to the brilliant coda which closes the work

There are a number of works which have not been heard in Boston at all, or not for a year or so, which it would greatly interest a large number of people to hear during the present season—as such might be mentioned: Overture to "Genovera," Schumann; overture to the "Barbier von Bagdad," Peter Cornelius (this was played last year); the Dante symphony, with chorus, Liszt; the C minor symphony, Brahms; the suite "Roma," Bizet, and a score of others. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch will see his way to incorporating some of the above into his plan of programmes. For next Saturday the announcement is as follows:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony in C minor.....Beethoven

The concert-goer must not be appalled or frightened by the array of symphonies. The experiment has been tried—(I believe always with these same three symphonies)—in a number of German cities, and with great success and satisfaction to the listeners; even in light-hearted Paris, where the musical enthusiast usually demands "quelquechose de gai" to establish a contrast in a classical programme, it was listened to most earnestly. Such a programme is not only very interesting, but it is bound to be immensely instructive.

ARTHUR WELD.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Good, But Not Great, Programme—Mr. Fischer the Soloist.

Nothing was extremely great, but everything was agreeable and worthy, in the make-up of the programme of Saturday night. It began with the overture to "Euryanthe." Weber's overtures fill a niche of their own in the musical repertoire, for various reasons. Firstly, their construction is unique. Mozart was the first who thoroughly applied the sonata form to the overture, and his overtures to "The Magic Flute," "The Marriage of Figaro," etc., are models of symmetry. Beethoven discarded this form in most of his overtures in favor of the so-called "dramatic overture," but Weber continued it; only, in order to give a closer connection with the opera it preceded, he formed his overture upon themes taken from the work itself, presenting them as regular "chief," "secondary," and "closing" themes, and developing them in sonata style. That he was able to do this without producing a "patch-work" effect is forever a proof of his musicianship. Another marvel is the romantic effect with which he invested these works. Mr. Nikisch certainly allowed his sentiment free play both in shading and tempo at this concert, and yet in a Weber work this is a virtue rather than a fault, for both in piano and orchestral numbers, the works of this master permit liberties to be taken which would be out of place in a Beethoven composition. When did Weber ever write a work in which he did not give the horns a chance to display themselves. Our hornplayers are excellently balanced, and it is not to Mr. Reiter alone that credit must be given, for all the brasses blended perfectly. The kettledrummer has emerged from obscurity with alarming suddenness under Mr. Nikisch's régime; in every concert he gives some fortissimo effects that would have sent his former conductor into agonies of repressive gestures. In the overture, as in the Volkmann symphony, the effect was a little overdone, and one feared for the safety of the drum heads.

Mr. Emil Fischer sang at his very best in this concert. Lysiart's aria, "Wo berg 'ich mich?" was given with great dramatic power, and had the additional advantage of being in line with the overture of the opera whence it was taken, "Euryanthe." Mr. Fischer attains a cantabile which is not usual with bassi profundi, and is able to bring forth some excellent contrasts by its judicious use. His deepest tones also have a resonance and purity possessed by few basses. Flexibility, however, is lacking in some degree, and the Vivace feroce which ended the aria was not quite as effective as the parts which preceded it. In two songs in the later part of the programme, the singer won a success, but I scarcely rank the sentimental work in strophe form, by Litolff, as quite up to the standard of these concerts. From such works down to Curschmann, then to Abt, and finally to Gumbert, would be only a few steps.

It was very significant to find already in the fourth concert of the series a couple of American compositions, and the fact augurs well for the protection of the American muse at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. The works in question were a couple of orchestral episodes by Arthur Bird. The first was the best. It was an "Oriental scene," and admirably presented the Eastern vein of music. It must be borne in mind that in this field Mozart, Beethoven and others have led us astray by using an amount of percussion that seems to intimate that the lazy Orientals are fearfully energetic in their music. The very term "Turkish music" (in German "Janitscharen musik") as applied to the percussive instruments of the orchestra is a misnomer; "Chinese music" would be much nearer the mark, for this nation, almost alone of all those of the Orient, delights in constant clatter. True the Turks, Arabs and Moors have percussive instruments, but they only use them lightly mark the rhythm, and they her add to than detract from the weird, monotonous sadness of the music. The forcible counter theme, then, in Mr. Bird's "Oriental scene," and the sudden and startling clash of the cymbals are not Eastern, although quite permissible for the sake of contrast; but the chief theme is thoroughly characteristic and fitting in its wailing melody, odd progressions and well established rhythm. The harp had plenty of work to do, and it is unnecessary to say that in Mr. Schuecker's hands all was well done. The violins were exquisite in their work, and the bass clarinet also deserves a word of praise. The reading of the work again from memory (what a mnemonical fiend our new conductor is!) was most worthy, both in the strange chief theme, and in the languor of the close. The second work was entitled Intermezzo and Trio. It is built in the shape with which Brahms has replaced the Beethoven Scherzo. It represents the body of a scherzo, then a trio in contrast, then instead of repeating the entire scherzo (and these repetitions are contrary to the musical spirit of our age), it goes at once to a coda founded chiefly upon the scherzo, Mr. Bird's intermezzo possessed a beautiful theme for violins and some effective wind work, both excellently performed, the former instruments being used in very high positions and in harmonics. It did not impress me, however, as being so entirely original as the "Oriental Scene," and the first theme was somewhat reminiscent of another work.

The concert closed with Volkmann's symphony in B flat, a very genial and happy work. At the very first the bold, picturesque style of the chief theme showed that the reading was to be a virile one. The development of this symphony has its dissonances quite a la Schumann, and affords a fine contrast to the melody of the themes. The march-like second movement was given with ineffable daintiness, and the quaint effects of horns combined with oboes, the coquettish reappearance of the [illegible] theme pizzicato upon the [illegible] and the fragmentary close were all

The third movement gave the woodwind (and horns) some golden opportunities which were not neglected. The oboe is the most prominent instrument here, and M. Sautet played splendidly. The horn seconded the theme with most refined shading, and clarinets and flutes were equally excellent in their less important phrases. The transformation of the simple and tender melody of this movement into the rollicking theme of the finale was executed by the orchestra to perfection, and Mr. Nikisch gave the gradual accelerando and crescendo just the right reading.

The finale was full of genial humor and animal spirits, and the power of the timpani may perhaps be condoned. The concert was interesting from first to last, and is to be succeeded next Friday and Saturday by one of yet greater interest, for in three symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the orchestra will portray the rise, progress and culmination of the symphonic form, a shape that developed to its culmination more rapidly than any other in the history of music. LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 3, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The Bostonians' Home Season with the First Week's Repertoire—Otto Hegner's Second Appearance in This City—Other Concert Events of the Week—News, Notes, Comment.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra appears to have a conviction that the American composer has a right to a hearing by his countrymen, and his action in giving a place on last evening's programe to Arthur Bird's "Episodes for Orchestra," styled "Oriental Scene" and "Intermezzo," is to be highly commended by all friends of native musical talent. These two compositions have been well chosen by Mr. Nikisch from the many presented for his examination, and all who heard them must have had cause for new faith in the musical possibilities of the native American. The "Oriental Scene" is aptly named, for, aided by the fancy of the musician, it gives a wonderfully true picture of oriental life; all the quaint themes are treated with rare grace and skill in the score. Its contrasts are admirably calculated to add to the interest of the composition, and, all in all, it is one of the brightest evidences of the composer's right to a place among the honored names of the musical world of today. The "Intermezzo" is another most enjoyable number, with themes of great beauty, which are most happily treated in their elaboration. Both compositions were played with faultless care and skill under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and the applause which rewarded the composer and his work was richly merited. The "Euryanthe" overture opened the programme, and its reading by the new conductor brought out its familiar beauties with superb effect, the sharp contrasts of the composition being judiciously heightened. Volkmann's symphony in B flat completed the list of orchestral numbers, and made a brilliant ending to the programme, the charming andantino being made a source of great delight by the graceful reading given it. The symphony had its first hearing here under Mr. Henschel, and many other works of that regime might be reproduced with good results in these concerts. Mr. Emil Fischer, the basso of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, sang the air, "Wo berg ich mich?" from "Euryanthe" with orchestral accompaniment and the "Resignation" by Litolff and Schumann's romance from "Spanish Liebeslieder." Op. 138 with piano, gaining his greatest success in the Weber air, in which his good points as a singer were most successfully displayed. He won the favor of his audience as in former appearances here. Next Saturday's programme is as follows: Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its fifth season in Chickering Hall, on Monday night, before a large and notably critical audience. Volkmann's Quartet in E-minor, op. 35, and Brahms's Quintet, op. 88, were performed. The Volkmann quartet, which was heard on this occasion for the second time at these concerts, is a delightfully genial work, melodious, gracefully learned, easy of comprehension, and charming in its flow and freshness. It is music pure and simple, characterized always by fine artistic taste, and, though not especially soaring in its aspirations, wholly pleasurable in the hearing. It was interpreted and played with a full appreciation of its delicacy of sentiment and its quiet tenderness of style; and, for the first time at these concerts, the 'cello fell into its proper place, and blended sympathetically with the other instruments, instead of outruding itself. The Brahms quintet has much of beauty, but it also has long stretches of dry and wearisome pedantry that no excellence in the playing can render interesting or pleasing. It was given in its completeness for the first time by these artists, who, it need scarcely be said, did it full justice as far as conscientious care and admirably playing could do so. Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson assisted in a group of songs, "By the Danube," by Gustav Presser; "The Almond Tree," by Schumann, and a "Tuscan Song," by Tyson Wolff. The selections were scarcely suited to the atmosphere of such a concert, and, with the exception of the Schumann song, were an unfortunate mistake. It would, perhaps, be unfair to judge Mrs. Lawson by her performances at this concert, especially as she was manifestly nervous, and probably was not heard at her best. Her voice seems to be fresh and musical in quality, and some of its tones are very sweet and pure; but we shall await another opportunity to hear her before venturing upon an opinion of her powers and her talents.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1889.

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The announcement of a popular matinee by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, will be welcomed by many who were unable to secure seats for the regular series, and by all who enjoy a somewhat lighter programme than is usually offered. The lively demand for seats and the great favor with which similar performances were received last summer give promise of a very large attendance. Reserved [illegible] on sale at Music Hall.

SUNDAY, NOV. 3, 1889.

American Music Interpreted Under Nikisch's Baton.

The Fourth Symphony Programme—Hegner Matinee on Saturday.

"Young People's" Popular — Various Harmonic Happenings.

By way of showing his interest in the worthy music of American composers, Mr. Nikisch introduced two episodes for orchestra in his programme last week. Mr. Arthur Bird, the fortunate young gentleman whose work was thus honored, is a native of Cambridge, but this is the first time any of his important works have been heard in Boston, though Mr. Walter Damrosch presented, two seasons ago, in New York, a symphony from his hand, while his carnival scene and suite for orchestra have also found metropolitan interpretation. There is something not altogether creditable to Boston enterprise in the fact that Mr. Bird should have waited so long for a home hearing, particularly as the "episodes" are very agreeable compositions. They were first given last summer in Wiesbaden. The young composer's "Scene Orientale" in the free unconventional use of orchestral resources for the development of its characteristic theme, is assuredly well worth a place of honor in a Boston symphony programme. The intermezzo, too, is bright and skilfully scored. Mr. Nikisch seemed to take especial pleasure in bringing out the full effect of the "episodes"; indeed, nothing could surpass the delicacy of expression, the smoothness and evenness of tone and rhythmic charm that marked the interpretation. The audiences, both at the rehearsal and the concert, received Mr. Bird's works with great favor.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is familiar enough, yet new beauties were revealed in the interpretation. The Volkmann symphony, which has had but one previous hearing in Boston, was performed with delightful effect, the andantino being wholly charming. Perhaps some in the audience would have preferred another work, but the performance could not have proved otherwise than enjoyable to any one with a soul for music."

Mr. Emil Fischer, a singer who is well established in popular regard here, was the soloist. He gave, with much breadth of style and expression, the "Euryanthe" aria, "Wo Berg Ich Mich" and was also heard—somewhat to less advantage, but acceptable nevertheless—in the Litolff's "Resignation" and a romance from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs." These were sung to pianoforte accompaniment.

This week's programme is nothing if not substantial. Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, is the offering. It will be indeed a "symphony" concert next Saturday!

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, opened with a richly colored reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. Of course, it must be taken for granted that Mr. Nikisch gave a severe blow to the conventionalities again, and flew directly in the face of tradition; but the effect was remarkably impressive, and the work bore the new coloring very well, and without any especial loss in its general meaning. The second motive was taken much slower than usual, and the fugato was subjected to the same treatment, and it is hardly necessary to say that there were one or two of the now familiar ritardandos, which, if Mr. Nikisch is not a little more sparing of them, will become as conventional as are the customary readings to which he seems to have so much objection. However, the overture was very impressive in its new aspect, and its more fiery passages were given with splendid force and brilliancy. It would seem though, that if Weber had wanted his work read as Mr. Nikisch read it, he would have marked it so, but as he failed to give any such indications, we may look upon it as a very interesting and remarkably effective Weber-Nikisch transcription. The novelty of the programme were two episodes for orchestra by Mr. Arthur Bird, which were heard for the first time here, and initiated Mr. Nikisch's recognition of native composers. One of these episodes is a "Scène Orientale," and the other an Intermezzo and Trio. Both are fresh and free in theme and in orchestral color, the first being the most original. The wood-wind instruments were used with fine skill and taste, and in the "Scène" a very striking and ingenious effect is made by the persistent reiteration of a minor second which forms an accompaniment to the principal subject. There are some fine contrasts in tone painting, and the whole is thoroughly artistic in feeling and shows the taste of a refined musician. The Intermezzo is gracefully and delicately instrumented, and has a delightful vivacity, but it suggests the finale of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and some parts of Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" Overture. Both episodes were well worth the hearing, and fairly earned the hearty and appreciative applause that rewarded them. The symphony was Volkmann's in B-flat, which had been heard at an earlier concert by this orchestra, and which well deserved the repetition accorded it. It is wholly modern in style and treatment, but it differs from most modern symphonies in that its composer was not ashamed or afraid to indulge in clear and graceful melody in which the work abounds The first movement is somewhat rugged, but is very strong, and is striking in its large force and freedom. The allegretto is charming in its naive piquancy and its pretty instrumentation, while learning discreetly used is not lacking. In fact the symphony abounds in clever contrapuntal devices which, however, do not obtrude themselves as the be all and end all of the work, but which fall into their due places as illustrative episodes subordinate to the general idea. A strong and deeply interesting individuality marks the symphony as a whole and shows the composer if not as a genius of the highest powers, as an original and self-reliant master of his art and science. The playing of the orchestra could scarcely have been bettered through the entire concert, and it must be conceded that by this time Mr. Nikisch has given ample evidence that he is a conductor who is entitled to great respect. The soloist was M. Emil Fischer, who has such a noble voice that its lack of variety in tone color is almost a misfortune. He sang the great bass aria from "Euryanthe" with true musicianly taste and feeling, but in a somewhat uninteresting manner. In fact, Mr. Fischer's style is hardly adapted to the concert room, where the methods of opera are apt to seem heavy and unrefined. At the conclusion of his singing of the aria he was vigorously applauded and as vigorously recalled. Later in the evening he sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, "Resignation," a flat and insipid song by Littolf, which was quite out of place in such a concert, and the romanza from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs," which is not an interesting example of the composer, and, moreover, has nothing of Spanish color about it. Mr. Fischer again sang earnestly, but heavily, and was again recalled. For the next concert we are to have a Haydn Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, and Beethoven's C-minor Symphony. Three symphonies are certainly a novelty in Boston concert programmes, and it remains to be seen if such a generous allowance of symphony will agree with the musical stomach of the symphony audience. Such a programme is hard on the ticket speculators; but it serves them right.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin, D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MISS MARY E. OBRION,

MR. W. J. WINCH,

MR. ELIOT HUBBARD,

AND MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

On MONDAY EVENINGS, November 18th, December 9th, 1889, and January 6th, 1890.

SEASON TICKETS with Reserved Seats for the Series, Three Dollars, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY at the Box Office Music Hall, Monday, November 11th, at 9 A. M.

Subscription List now open at Music Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Good, But Not Great, Programme—Mr. Fischer the Soloist.

Nothing was extremely great, but everything was agreeable and worthy, in the make-up of the programme of Saturday night. It began with the overture to "Euryanthe." Weber's overtures fill a niche of their own in the musical repertoire, for various reasons. Firstly, their construction is unique. Mozart was the first who thoroughly applied the sonata form to the overture, and his overtures to "The Magic Flute," "The Marriage of Figaro," etc., are models of symmetry. Beethoven discarded this form in most of his overtures in favor of the so-called "dramatic overture,"—but Weber continued it; only, in order to give a closer connection with the opera it preceded, he formed his overture upon themes taken from the work itself, presenting them as regular "chief," "secondary," and "closing" themes, and developing them in sonata style. That he was able to do this without producing a "patch-work" effect is forever a proof of his musicianship. Another marvel is the romantic effect with which he invested these works. Mr. Nikisch certainly allowed his sentiment free play both in shading and tempo at this concert, and yet in a Weber work this is a virtue rather than a fault, for both in piano and orchestral numbers, the works of this master permit liberties to be taken which would be out of place in a Beethoven composition. When did Weber ever write a work in which he did not give the horns a chance to display themselves. Our hornplayers are excellently balanced, and it is not to Mr. Reiter alone that credit must be given, for all the brasses blended perfectly. The kettledrummer has emerged from obscurity with alarming suddenness under Mr. Nikisch's régime; in every concert he gives some fortissimo effects that would have sent his former conductor into agonies of repressive gestures. In the overture, as in the Volkmann symphony, the effect was a little overdone, and one feared for the safety of the drum heads.

Mr. Emil Fischer sang at his very best in this concert. Lysiart's aria, "Wo berg 'Ich mich?" was given with great dramatic power, and had the additional advantage of being in line with the overture of the opera whence it was taken, "Euryanthe." Mr. Fischer attains a cantabile which is not usual with bassi profundi, and is able to bring forth some excellent contrasts by its judicious use. His deepest tones also have a resonance and purity possessed by few basses. Flexibility, however, is lacking in some degree, and the Vivace feroce which ended the aria was not quite as effective as the parts which preceded it. In two songs in the later part of the programme, the singer won a success, but I scarcely rank the sentimental work in strophe form, by Litolff, as quite up to the standard of these concerts. From such works down to Curschmann, then to Abt, and finally to Gumbert, would be only a few steps.

It was very significant to find already in the fourth concert of the series a couple of American compositions, and the fact augurs well for the protection of the American muse at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. The works in question were a couple of orchestral episodes by Arthur Bird. The first was the best. It was an "Oriental scene," and admirably presented the Eastern vein of music. It must be borne in mind that in this field Mozart, Beethoven and others have led us astray by using an amount of percussion that seems to intimate that the lazy Orientals are fearfully energetic in their music. The very term "Turkish music" (in German "Janitscharen musik") as applied to the percussive instruments of the orchestra is a misnomer; "Chinese music" would be much nearer the mark, for this nation, almost alone of all those of the Orient, delights in constant clatter. True the Turks, Arabs and Moors have percussive instruments, but they only use them lightly mark the rhythm, and they her add to than detract from the weird, monotonous sadness of the music. The forcible counter theme, then, in Mr. Bird's "Oriental scene," and the sudden and startling clash of the cymbals are not Eastern, although quite permissible for the sake of contrast; but the chief theme is thoroughly characteristic and fitting in its wailing melody, odd progressions and well established rhythm. The harp had plenty of work to do, and it is unnecessary to say that in Mr. Schuecker's hands all was well done. The violins were exquisite in their work, and the bass clarinet also deserves a word of praise. The reading of the work again from memory (what a mnemonical fiend our new conductor is!) was most worthy, both in the strange chief theme, and in the languor of the close. The second work was entitled Intermezzo and Trio. It is built in the shape with which Brahms has replaced the Beethoven Scherzo. It represents the body of a scherzo, then a trio in contrast, then instead of repeating the entire scherzo (and these repetitions are contrary to the musical spirit of our age), it goes at once to a coda founded chiefly upon the scherzo, Mr. Bird's intermezzo possessed a beautiful theme for violins and some effective oboe work, both excellently performed, the former instruments being used in very high positions and in harmonics. It did not impress me, however, as being so entirely original as the "Oriental Scene," and the first theme was somewhat reminiscent of another work.

The concert closed with Volkmann's symphony in B flat, a very genial and shapely work. At the very first the bold, brusque style of the chief theme showed that the reading was to be a virile one. The development of this symphony has its dissonances quite a la Schumann, and affords a fine contrast to the melody of the themes. The march-like second movement was given with ineffable daintiness, and the quaint effects of horns combined with oboes, the coquettish reappearance of the chief theme pizzicato upon the strings and the fragmentary close were all

The third movement gave the woodwind (and horn) some golden opportunities which were not neglected. The oboe is the most prominent instrument here, and M. Sautet played splendidly. The horn seconded the theme with most refined shading, and clarinets and flutes were equally excellent in their less important phrases. The transformation of the simple and tender melody of this movement into the rollicking theme of the finale was executed by the orchestra to perfection, and Mr. Nikisch gave the gradual accelerando and crescendo just the right reading.

The finale was full of genial humor and animal spirits, and the power of the timpani may perhaps be condoned. The concert was interesting from first to last, and is to be succeeded next Friday and Saturday by one of yet greater interest, for in three symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the orchestra will portray the rise, progress and culmination of the symphonic form, a shape that developed to its culmination more rapidly than any other in the history of music. LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 3, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The Bostonians' Home Season with the First Week's Repertoire—Otto Hegner's Second Appearance in This City—Other Concert Events of the Week—News, Notes, Comment.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra appears to have a conviction that the American composer has a right to a hearing by his countrymen, and his action in giving a place on last evening's programe to Arthur Bird's "Episodes for Orchestra," styled "Oriental Scene" and "Intermezza," is to be highly commended by all friends of native musical talent. These two compositions have been well chosen by Mr. Nikisch from the many presented for his examination, and all who heard them must have had cause for new faith in the musical possibilities of the native American. The "Oriental Scene" is aptly named, for, aided by the fancy of the musician, it gives a wonderfully true picture of oriental life; all the quaint themes are treated with rare grace and skill in the score. Its contrasts are admirably calculated to add to the interest of the composition, and, all in all, it is one of the brightest evidences of the composer's right to a place among the honored names of the musical world of today. The "Intermezzo" is another most enjoyable number, with themes of great beauty, which are most happily treated in their elaboration. Both compositions were played with faultless care and skill under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and the applause which rewarded the composer and his work was richly merited. The "Euryanthe" overture opened the programme, and its reading by the new conductor brought out its familiar beauties with superb effect, the sharp contrasts of the composition being judiciously heightened. Volkmann's symphony in B flat completed the list of orchestral numbers, and made a brilliant ending to the programme, the charming andantino being made a source of great delight by the graceful reading given it. The symphony had its first hearing here under Mr. Henschel, and many other works of that regime might be reproduced with good results in these concerts. Mr. Emil Fischer, the basso of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, sang the air, "Wo berg ich mich?" from "Euryanthe" with orchestral accompaniment and the "Resignation" by Litolff and Schumann's romance from "Spanish Liebeslieder." Op. 138 with piano, gaining his greatest success in the Weber air, in which his good points as a singer were most successfully displayed. He won the favor of his audience as in former appearances here. Next Saturday's programme is as follows: Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its fifth season in Chickering Hall, on Monday night, before a large and notably critical audience. Volkmann's Quartet in E-minor, op. 35, and Brahms's Quintet, op. 83, were performed. The Volkmann quartet, which was heard on this occasion for the second time at these concerts, is a delightfully genial work, melodious, gracefully learned, easy of comprehension, and charming in its flow and freshness. It is music pure and simple, characterized always by fine artistic taste, and, though not especially soaring in its aspirations, wholly pleasurable in the hearing. It was interpreted and played with a full appreciation of its delicacy of sentiment and its quiet tenderness of style; and, for the first time at these concerts, the 'cello fell into its proper place, and blended sympathetically with the other instruments, instead of obtruding itself. The Brahms quintet has much of beauty, but it also has long stretches of dry and wearisome pedantry that no excellence in the playing can render interesting or pleasing. It was given in its completeness for the first time by these artists, who, it need scarcely be said, did it full justice as far as conscientious care and admirably playing could do so. Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson assisted in a group of songs, "By the Danube," by Gustav Presser; "The Almond Tree," by Schumann, and a "Tuscan Song," by Tyson Wolff. The selections were scarcely suited to the atmosphere of such a concert, and, with the exception of the Schumann song, were an unfortunate mistake. It would, perhaps, be unfair to judge Mrs. Lawson by her performances at this concert, especially as she was manifestly nervous, and probably was not heard at her best. Her voice seems to be fresh and musical in quality, and some of its tones are very sweet and pure; but we shall await another opportunity to hear her before venturing upon an opinion of her powers and her talents.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1889.

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The announcement of a popular matinee by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, will be welcomed by many who were unable to secure seats for the regular series, and by all who enjoy a somewhat lighter programme than is usually offered. The lively demand for seats and the great favor with which similar performances were received last summer give promise of a very large attendance. Reserved seats are now on sale at Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 3, 1889.

American Music Interpreted Under Nikisch's Baton.

The Fourth Symphony Programme—Hegner Matinee on Saturday.

"Young People's" Popular—Various Harmonic Happenings.

By way of showing his interest in the worthy music of American composers, Mr. Nikisch introduced two episodes for orchestra in his programme last week. Mr. Arthur Bird, the fortunate young gentleman whose work was thus honored, is a native of Cambridge, but this is the first time any of his important works have been heard in Boston, though Mr. Walter Damrosch presented, two seasons ago, in New York, a symphony from his hand, while his carnival scene and suite for orchestra have also found metropolitan interpretation. There is something not altogether creditable to Boston enterprise in the fact that Mr. Bird should have waited so long for a home hearing, particularly as the "episodes" are very agreeable compositions. They were first given last summer in Wiesbaden. The young composer's "Scene Orientale" in the free unconventional use of orchestral resources for the development of its characteristic theme, is assuredly well worth a place of honor in a Boston symphony programme. The intermezzo, too, is bright and skilfully scored. Mr. Nikisch seemed to take especial pleasure in bringing out the full effect of the "episodes"; indeed, nothing could surpass the delicacy of expression, the smoothness and evenness of tone and rhythmic charm that marked the interpretation. The audiences, both at the rehearsal and the concert, received Mr. Bird's works with great favor.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is familiar enough, yet new beauties were revealed in the interpretation. The Volkmann symphony, which has had but one previous hearing in Boston, was performed with delightful effect, the andantino being wholly charming. Perhaps some in the audience would have preferred another work, but the performance could not have proved otherwise than enjoyable to any one with a soul for music."

Mr. Emil Fischer, a singer who is well established in popular regard here, was the soloist. He gave, with much breadth of style and expression, the "Euryanthe" aria, "Wo Berg Ich Mich" and was also heard—somewhat to less advantage, but acceptable nevertheless—in the Litolff's "Resignation" and a romance from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs." These were sung to pianoforte accompaniment.

This week's programme is nothing if not substantial. Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, is the offering. It will be indeed a "symphony" concert next Saturday!

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, opened with a richly colored reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. Of course, it must be taken for granted that Mr. Nikisch gave a severe blow to the conventionalities again, and flew directly in the face of tradition; but the effect was remarkably impressive, and the work bore the new coloring very well, and without any especial loss in its general meaning. The second motive was taken much slower than usual, and the fugato was subjected to the same treatment, and it is hardly necessary to say that there were one or two of the now familiar ritardandos, which, if Mr. Nikisch is not a little more sparing of them, will become as conventional as are the customary readings to which he seems to have so much objection. However, the overture was very impressive in its new aspect, and its more fiery passages were given with splendid force and brilliancy. It would seem though, that if Weber had wanted his work read as Mr. Nikisch read it, he would have marked it so, but as he failed to give any such indications, we may look upon it as a very interesting and remarkably effective Weber-Nikisch transcription. The novelty of the programme were two episodes for orchestra by Mr. Arthur Bird, which were heard for the first time here, and initiated Mr. Nikisch's recognition of native composers. One of these episodes is a "Scène Orientale," and the other an Intermezzo and Trio. Both are fresh and free in theme and in orchestral color, the first being the most original. The wood-wind instruments were used with fine skill and taste, and in the "Scène' a very striking and ingenious effect is made by the persistent reiteration of a minor second which forms an accompaniment to the principal subject. There are some fine contrasts in tone painting, and the whole is thoroughly artistic in feeling and shows the taste of a refined musician. The Intermezzo is gracefully and delicately instrumented, and has a delightful vivacity, but it suggests the finale of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and some parts of Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" Overture. Both episodes were well worth the hearing, and fairly earned the hearty and appreciative applause that rewarded them. The symphony was Volkmann's in B-flat, which had been heard at an earlier concert by this orchestra, and which well deserved the repetition accorded it. It is wholly modern in style and treatment, but it differs from most modern symphonies in that its composer was not ashamed or afraid to indulge in clear and graceful melody in which the work abounds The first movement is somewhat rugged, but is very strong, and is striking in its large force and freedom. The allegretto is charming in its naive piquancy and its pretty instrumentation, while learning discreetly used is not lacking. In fact the symphony abounds in clever contrapuntal devices which, however, do not obtrude themselves as the be all and end all of the work, but which fall into their due places as illustrative episodes subordinate to the general idea. A strong and deeply interesting individuality marks the symphony as a whole and shows the composer if not as a genius of the highest powers, as an original and self-reliant master of his art and science. The playing of the orchestra could scarcely have been bettered through the entire concert, and it must be conceded that by this time Mr. Nikisch has given ample evidence that he is a conductor who is entitled to great respect. The soloist was M. Emil Fischer, who has such a noble voice that its lack of variety in tone color is almost a misfortune. He sang the great bass aria from "Euryanthe" with true musicianly taste and feeling, but in a somewhat uninteresting manner. In fact, Mr. Fischer's style is hardly adapted to the concert room, where the methods of opera are apt to seem heavy and unrefined. At the conclusion of his singing of the aria he was vigorously applauded and as vigorously recalled. Later in the evening he sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, "Resignation," a flat and insipid song by Littolf, which was quite out of place in such a concert, and the romanza from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs," which is not an interesting example of the composer, and, moreover, has nothing of Spanish color about it. Mr. Fischer again sang earnestly, but heavily, and was again recalled. For the next concert we are to have a Haydn Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, and Beethoven's C-minor Symphony. Three symphonies are certainly a novelty in Boston concert programmes, and it remains to be seen if such a generous allowance of symphony will agree with the musical stomach of the symphony audience. Such a programme is hard on the ticket speculators; but it serves them right.

[15]

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin, D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MISS MARY E. OBRION,

MR. W. J. WINCH,

MR. ELIOT HUBBARD,

AND MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

On MONDAY EVENINGS, November 18th, December 9th, 1889, and January 6th, 1890.

SEASON TICKETS with Reserved Seats for the Series, Three Dollars, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY at the Box Office Music Hall, Monday, November 11th, at 9 A. M.

Subscription List now open at Music Hall.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Good, But Not Great, Programme—Mr. Fischer the Soloist.

Nothing was extremely great, but everything was agreeable and worthy, in the make-up of the programme of Saturday night. It began with the overture to "Euryanthe." Weber's overtures fill a niche of their own in the musical repertoire, for various reasons. Firstly, their construction is unique. Mozart was the first who thoroughly applied the sonata form to the overture, and his overtures to "The Magic Flute," "The Marriage of Figaro," etc., are models of symmetry. Beethoven discarded this form in most of his overtures in favor of the so-called "dramatic overture," but Weber continued it; only, in order to give a closer connection with the opera it preceded, he formed his overture upon themes taken from the work itself, presenting them as regular "chief," "secondary," and "closing" themes, and developing them in sonata style. That he was able to do this without producing a "patch-work" effect is forever a proof of his musicianship. Another marvel is the romantic effect with which he invested these works. Mr. Nikisch certainly allowed his sentiment free play both in shading and tempo at this concert, and yet in a Weber work this is a virtue rather than a fault, for both in piano and orchestral numbers, the works of this master permit liberties to be taken which would be out of place in a Beethoven composition. When did Weber ever write a work in which he did not give the horns a chance to display themselves. Our hornplayers are excellently balanced, and it is not to Mr. Reiter alone that credit must be given, for all the brasses blended perfectly. The kettledrummer has emerged from obscurity with alarming suddenness under Mr. Nikisch's régime; in every concert he gives some fortissimo effects that would have sent his former conductor into agonies of repressive gestures. In the overture, as in the Volkmann symphony, the effect was a little overdone, and one feared for the safety of the drum heads.

Mr. Emil Fischer sang at his very best in this concert. Lysiart's aria, "Wo berg 'Ich mich?" was given with great dramatic power, and had the additional advantage of being in line with the overture of the opera whence it was taken, "Euryanthe." Mr. Fischer attains a cantabile which is not usual with bassi profundi, and is able to bring forth some excellent contrasts by its judicious use. His deepest tones also have a resonance and purity possessed by few basses. Flexibility, however, is lacking in some degree, and the Vivace feroce which ended the aria was not quite as effective as the parts which preceded it. In two songs in the later part of the programme, the singer won a success, but I scarcely rank the sentimental work in strophe form, by Litolff, as quite up to the standard of these concerts. From such works down to Curschmann, then to Abt, and finally to Gumbert, would be only a few steps.

It was very significant to find already in the fourth concert of the series a couple of American compositions, and the fact augurs well for the protection of the American muse at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. The works in question were a couple of orchestral episodes by Arthur Bird. The first was the best. It was an "Oriental scene," and admirably presented the Eastern vein of music. It must be borne in mind that in this field Mozart, Beethoven and others have led us astray by using an amount of percussion that seems to intimate that the lazy Orientals are fearfully energetic in their music. The very term "Turkish music" (in German "Janitscharen musik") as applied to the percussive instruments of the orchestra is a misnomer; "Chinese music" would be much nearer the mark, for this nation, almost alone of all those of the Orient, delights in constant clatter. True the Turks, Arabs and Moors have percussive instruments, but they only use them lightly mark the rhythm, and they her add to than detract from the weird, monotonous sadness of the music. The forcible counter theme, then, in Mr. Bird's "Oriental scene," and the sudden and startling clash of the cymbals are not Eastern, although quite permissible for the sake of contrast; but the chief theme is thoroughly characteristic and fitting in its wailing melody, odd progressions and well established rhythm. The harp had plenty of work to do, and it is unnecessary to say that in Mr. Schuecker's hands all was well done. The violins were exquisite in their work, and the bass clarinet also deserves a word of praise. The reading of the work again from memory (what a mnemonical fiend our new conductor is!) was most worthy, both in the strange chief theme, and in the languor of the close. The second work was entitled Intermezzo and Trio. It is built in the shape with which Brahms has replaced the Beethoven Scherzo. It represents the body of a scherzo, then a trio in contrast, then instead of repeating the entire scherzo (and these repetitions are contrary to the musical spirit of our age), it goes at once to a coda founded chiefly upon the scherzo, Mr. Bird's intermezzo possessed a beautiful theme for violins and some effective oboe work, both excellently performed, the former instruments being used in very high positions and in harmonics. It did not impress me, however, as being so entirely original as the "Oriental Scene," and the first theme was somewhat reminiscent of another work.

The concert closed with Volkmann's symphony in B flat, a very genial and shapely work. At the very first the bold, brusque style of the chief theme showed that the reading was to be a virile one. The development of this symphony has its dissonances quite a la Schumann, and affords a fine contrast to the melody of the themes. The march-like second movement was given with ineffable daintiness, and the quaint effects of horns combined with oboes, the coquettish reappearance of the chief theme pizzicato upon the strings and the fragmentary close were all well done.

The third movement gave the woodwind (and horn) some golden opportunities which were not neglected. The oboe is the most prominent instrument here, and M. Sautet played splendidly. The horn seconded the theme with most refined shading, and clarinets and flutes were equally excellent in their less important phrases. The transformation of the simple and tender melody of this movement into the rollicking theme of the finale was executed by the orchestra to perfection, and Mr. Nikisch gave the gradual accelerando and crescendo just the right reading.

The finale was full of genial humor and animal spirits, and the power of the timpani may perhaps be condoned. The concert was interesting from first to last, and is to be succeeded next Friday and Saturday by one of yet greater interest, for in three symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the orchestra will portray the rise, progress and culmination of the symphonic form, a shape that developed to its culmination more rapidly than any other in the history of music. LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 3, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The Bostonians' Home Season with the First Week's Repertoire—Otto Hegner's Second Appearance in This City—Other Concert Events of the Week—News, Notes, Comment.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra appears to have a conviction that the American composer has a right to a hearing by his countrymen, and his action in giving a place on last evening's programe to Arthur Bird's "Episodes for Orchestra," styled "Oriental Scene" and "Intermezza," is to be highly commended by all friends of native musical talent. These two compositions have been well chosen by Mr. Nikisch from the many presented for his examination, and all who heard them must have had cause for new faith in the musical possibilities of the native American. The "Oriental Scene" is aptly named, for, aided by the fancy of the musician, it gives a wonderfully true picture of oriental life; all the quaint themes are treated with rare grace and skill in the score. Its contrasts are admirably calculated to add to the interest of the composition, and, all in all, it is one of the brightest evidences of the composer's right to a place among the honored names of the musical world of today. The "Intermezzo" is another most enjoyable number, with themes of great beauty, which are most happily treated in their elaboration. Both compositions were played with faultless care and skill under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and the applause which rewarded the composer and his work was richly merited. The "Euryanthe" overture opened the programme, and its reading by the new conductor brought out its familiar beauties with superb effect, the sharp contrasts of the composition being judiciously heightened. Volkmann's symphony in B flat completed the list of orchestral numbers, and made a brilliant ending to the programme, the charming andantino being made a source of great delight by the graceful reading given it. The symphony had its first hearing here under Mr. Henschel, and many other works of that regime might be reproduced with good results in these concerts. Mr. Emil Fischer, the basso of the New York Metropolitan Opera House, sang the air, "Wo berg ich mich?" from "Euryanthe" with orchestral accompaniment and the "Resignation" by Litolff and Schumann's romance from "Spanish Liebeslieder." Op. 138 with piano, gaining his greatest success in the Weber air, in which his good points as a singer were most successfully displayed. He won the favor of his audience as in former appearances here. Next Saturday's programme is as follows: Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the first concert of its fifth season in Chickering Hall, on Monday night, before a large and notably critical audience. Volkmann's Quartet in E-minor, op. 35, and Brahms's Quintet, op. 83, were performed. The Volkmann quartet, which was heard on this occasion for the second time at these concerts, is a delightfully genial work, melodious, gracefully learned, easy of comprehension, and charming in its flow and freshness. It is music pure and simple, characterized always by fine artistic taste, and, though not especially soaring in its aspirations, wholly pleasurable in the hearing. It was interpreted and played with a full appreciation of its delicacy of sentiment and its quiet tenderness of style; and, for the first time at these concerts, the 'cello fell into its proper place, and blended sympathetically with the other instruments, instead of obtruding itself. The Brahms quintet has much of beauty, but it also has long stretches of dry and wearisome pedantry that no excellence in the playing can render interesting or pleasing. It was given in its completeness for the first time by these artists, who, it need scarcely be said, did it full justice as far as conscientious care and admirably playing could do so. Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson assisted in a group of songs, "By the Danube," by Gustav Presser; "The Almond Tree," by Schumann, and a "Tuscan Song," by Tyson Wolff. The selections were scarcely suited to the atmosphere of such a concert, and, with the exception of the Schumann song, were an unfortunate mistake. It would, perhaps, be unfair to judge Mrs. Lawson by her performances at this concert, especially as she was manifestly nervous, and probably was not heard at her best. Her voice seems to be fresh and musical in quality, and some of its tones are very sweet and pure; but we shall await another opportunity to hear her before venturing upon an opinion of her powers and her talents.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1889.

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The announcement of a popular matinee by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, will be welcomed by many who were unable to secure seats for the regular series, and by all who enjoy a somewhat lighter programme than is usually offered. The lively demand for seats and the great favor with which similar performances were received last summer give promise of a very large attendance. Reserved seats are now on sale at Music Hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 3, 1889.

American Music Interpreted Under Nikisch's Baton.

The Fourth Symphony Programme—Hegner Matinee on Saturday.

"Young People's" Popular — Various Harmonic Happenings.

By way of showing his interest in the worthy music of American composers, Mr. Nikisch introduced two episodes for orchestra in his programme last week. Mr. Arthur Bird, the fortunate young gentleman whose work was thus honored, is a native of Cambridge, but this is the first time any of his important works have been heard in Boston, though Mr. Walter Damrosch presented, two seasons ago, in New York, a symphony from his hand, while his carnival scene and suite for orchestra have also found metropolitan interpretation. There is something not altogether creditable to Boston enterprise in the fact that Mr. Bird should have waited so long for a home hearing, particularly as the "episodes" are very agreeable compositions. They were first given last summer in Wiesbaden. The young composer's "Scene Orientale" in the free unconventional use of orchestral resources for the development of its characteristic theme, is assuredly well worth a place of honor in a Boston symphony programme. The intermezzo, too, is bright and skilfully scored. Mr. Nikisch seemed to take especial pleasure in bringing out the full effect of the "episodes"; indeed, nothing could surpass the delicacy of expression, the smoothness and evenness of tone and rhythmic charm that marked the interpretation. The audiences, both at the rehearsal and the concert, received Mr. Bird's works with great favor.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is familiar enough, yet new beauties were revealed in the interpretation. The Volkmann symphony, which has had but one previous hearing in Boston, was performed with delightful effect, the andantino being wholly charming. Perhaps some in the audience would have preferred another work, but the performance could not have proved otherwise than enjoyable to any one with a soul for music."

Mr. Emil Fischer, a singer who is well established in popular regard here, was the soloist. He gave, with much breadth of style and expression, the "Euryanthe" aria, "Wo Berg ich Mich" and was also heard—somewhat to less advantage, but acceptable nevertheless—in the Litolff's "Resignation" and a romance from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs." These were sung to pianoforte accompaniment.

This week's programme is nothing if not substantial. Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, is the offering. It will be indeed a "symphony" concert next Saturday!

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3,

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, opened with a richly colored reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. Of course, it must be taken for granted that Mr. Nikisch gave a severe blow to the conventionalities again, and flew directly in the face of tradition; but the effect was remarkably impressive, and the work bore the new coloring very well, and without any especial loss in its general meaning. The second motive was taken much slower than usual, and the fugato was subjected to the same treatment, and it is hardly noces-ary to say that there were one or two of the now familiar ritardandos, which, if Mr. Nikisch is not a little more sparing of them, will become as conventional as are the customary readings to which he seems to have so much objection. However, the overture was very impressive in its new aspect, and its more fiery passages were given with splendid force and brilliancy. It would seem though, that if Weber had wanted his work read as Mr. Nikisch read it, he would have marked it so, but as he failed to give any such indications, we may look upon it as a very interesting and remarkably effective Weber-Nikisch transcription. The novelty of the programme were two episodes for orchestra by Mr. Arthur Bird, which were heard for the first time here, and initiated Mr. Nikisch's recognition of native composers. One of these episodes is a "Scène Orientale," and the other an Intermezzo and Trio. Both are fresh and free in theme and in orchestral color, the first being the most original. The wood-wind instruments were used with fine skill and taste, and in the "Scène' a very striking and ingenious effect is made by the persistent reiteration of a minor second which forms an accompaniment to the principal subject. There are some fine contrasts in tone painting, and the whole is thoroughly artistic in feeling and shows the taste of a refined musician. The intermezzo is gracefully and delicately instrumented, and has a delightful vivacity, but it suggests the finale of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and some parts of Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" Overture. Both episodes were well worth the hearing, and fairly earned the hearty and appreciative applause that rewarded them. The symphony was Volkmann's in B-flat, which had been heard at an earlier concert by this orchestra, and which well deserved the repetition accorded it. It is wholly modern in style and treatment, but it differs from most modern symphonies in that its composer was not ashamed or afraid to indulge in clear and graceful melody in which the work abounds The first movement is somewhat rag ged, but is very strong, and is striking in its large force and freedom. The allegretto is charming in its naive piquancy and its pretty instrumentation, while learning discreetly used is not lacking. In fact the symphony abounds in clever contrapuctal devices which, however, do not obtrude themselves as the be all and end all of the work, but which fall into their due places as illustrative episodes subordinate to the general idea. A strong and deeply interesting individuality marks the symphony as a whole and shows the composer if not as a genius of the highest powers, as an original and self-reliant master of his art and science. The playing of the orchestra could scarcely have been bettered through the entire concert, and it must be conceded that by this time Mr. Nikisch has given ample evidence that he is a conductor who is entitled to great respect. The soloist was M. Emil Fischer, who has such a noble voice that its lack of variety in tone color is almost a misfortune. He sang the great bass aria from "Euryanthe" with true musicianly taste and feeling, but in a somewhat uninteresting manner. In fact, Mr. Fischer's style is hardly adapted to the concert room, where the methods of opera are apt to seem heavy and unrefined. At the conclusion of his singing of the aria he was vigorously applauded and as vigorously recalled. Later in the evening he sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, "Resignation," a flat and insipid song by Litolff, which was quite out of place in such a concert, and the romanza from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs," which is not an interesting example of the composer, and, moreover, has nothing of Spanish color about it. Mr. Fischer again sang carefully, but heavily, and was again recalled. For the next concert we are to have a Haydn Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, and Beethoven's C-minor Symphony. Three symphonies are certainly a novelty in Boston concert programmes, and it remains to be seen if such a generous allowance of symphony will agree with the musical stomach of the symphony audience. Such a programme is hard on the ticket speculators; but it serves them right.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st VIOLIN, D. KUNTZ, VIOLA.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d VIOLIN. J. ADAMOWSKI, VIOLONCELLO.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MISS MARY E. OBRION,

MR. W. J. WINCH,

MR. ELIOT HUBBARD,

AND MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, NOVEMBER 18TH, DECEMBER 9TH, 1889, AND JANUARY 6TH, 1890.

SEASON TICKETS WITH RESERVED SEATS FOR THE SERIES, THREE DOLLARS, WILL BE SOLD TO SUBSCRIBERS ONLY AT THE BOX OFFICE MUSIC HALL, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11TH, AT 9 A. M.

SUBSCRIPTION LIST NOW OPEN AT MUSIC HALL.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

[illegible] ADVERTISER

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Good, But Not Great, Programme—Mr. Fischer the Soloist.

Nothing was extremely great, but everything was agreeable and worthy, in the make-up of the programme of Saturday night. It began with the overture to "Euryanthe." Weber's overtures fill a niche of their own in the musical repertoire, for various reasons. Firstly, their construction is unique. Mozart was the first who thoroughly applied the sonata form to the overture, and his overtures to "The Magic Flute," "The Marriage of Figaro," etc., are models of symmetry. Beethoven discarded this form in most of his overtures in favor of the so-called "dramatic overture," but Weber continued it; only, in order to give a closer connection with the opera it preceded, he formed his overture upon themes taken from the work itself, presenting them as regular "chief," "secondary," and "closing" themes, and developing them in sonata style. That he was able to do this without producing a "patch-work" effect is forever a proof of his musicianship. Another marvel is the romantic effect with which he invested these works. Mr. Nikisch certainly allowed his sentiment free play both in shading and tempo at this concert, and yet in a Weber work this is a virtue rather than a fault, for both in piano and orchestral numbers, the works of this master permit liberties to be taken which would be out of place in a Beethoven composition. When did Weber ever write a work in which he did not give the horns a chance to display themselves. Our hornplayers are excellently balanced, and it is not to Mr. Reiter alone that credit must be given, for all the brasses blended perfectly. The kettledrummer has emerged from obscurity with alarming suddenness under Mr. Nikisch's régime; in every concert he gives some fortissimo effects that would have sent his former conductor into agonies of repressive gestures. In the overture, as in the Volkmann symphony, the effect was a little overdone, and one feared for the safety of the drum heads.

Mr. Emil Fischer sang at his very best in this concert. Lysiart's aria, "Wo berg 'Ich mich?" was given with great dramatic power, and had the additional advantage of being in line with the overture of the opera whence it was taken, "Euryanthe." Mr. Fischer attains a cantabile which is not usual with bassi profundi, and is able to bring forth some excellent contrasts by its judicious use. His deepest tones also have a resonance and purity possessed by few basses. Flexibility, however, is lacking in some degree, and the Vivace feroce which ended the aria was not quite as effective as the parts which preceded it. In two songs in the later part of the programme, the singer won a success, but I scarcely rank the sentimental work in strophe form, by Litolff, as quite up to the standard of these concerts. From such works down to Curschmann, then to Abt, and finally to Gumbert, would be only a few steps.

It was very significant to find already in the fourth concert of the series a couple

The third movement gave the wood-and-[illegible] horn, [illegible] opportunities which were not neglected. The oboe is the most prominent instrument here, and M. Sauzay played splendidly. The horn seconded the theme with most refined shading, and clarinets and flutes were equally excellent in their less important phrases. The transformation of the simple and tender melody of this movement into the rollicking theme of the finale was executed by the orchestra to perfection, and Mr. Nikisch gave the gradual accelerando and crescendo just the right reading.

The finale was full of genial humor and animal spirits, and the power of the timpani may perhaps be condoned. The concert was interesting from first to last, and is to be succeeded next Friday and Saturday by one of yet greater interest, for in three symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the orchestra will portray the rise, progress and culmination of the symphonic form, a shape that developed to its culmination more rapidly than any other in the history of music. LOUIS C. ELSON.

[illegible], NOV. 3, [illegible]

American Music Interpreted Under Nikisch's Baton.

The Fourth Symphony Programme—Hegner Matinee on Saturday.

"Young People's" Popular—Various Harmonic Happenings.

By way of showing his interest in the worthy music of American composers, Mr. Nikisch introduced two episodes for orchestra in his programme last week. Mr. Arthur Bird, the fortunate young gentleman whose work was thus honored, is a native of Cambridge, but this is the first time any of his important works have been heard in Boston, though Mr. Walter Damrosch presented, two seasons ago, in New York, a symphony from his hand, while his carnival scene and suite for orchestra have also found metropolitan interpretation. There is something not altogether creditable to Boston enterprise in the fact that Mr. Bird should have waited so long for a home hearing, particularly as the "episodes" are very agreeable compositions. They were first given last summer in Wiesbaden. The young composer's "Scene Orientale" in the free unconventional use of orchestral resources for the development of its characteristic theme, is assuredly well worth a place of honor in a Boston symphony programme. The intermezzo, too, is bright and skilfully scored. Mr. Nikisch seemed to take especial pleasure in bringing out the full effect of the "episodes"; indeed, nothing could surpass the delicacy of expression, the smoothness and evenness of tone and rhythmic charm that marked the interpretation. The audiences, both at the rehearsal and the concert, received Mr. Bird's works with great favor.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is familiar enough, yet new beauties were revealed in the interpretation. The Volkmann symphony, which has had but one previous hearing in Boston, was performed with delightful effect, the andantino being wholly charming. Perhaps some in the audience would have preferred another work, but the performance could not have proved otherwise than enjoyable to any one with a 'soul for music."

Mr. Emil Fischer, a singer who is well established in popular regard here, was the soloist. He gave, with much breadth of style and expression, the "Euryanthe" aria, "Wo Berg Ich Mich" and was also heard—somewhat to less advantage, but acceptable nevertheless—in the Litolff's "Resignation" and a romance from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs." These were sung to pianoforte accompaniment.

This week's programme is nothing if not substantial. Haydn's symphony in G, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, is the offering. It will be indeed a "symphony" concert next Saturday!

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, opened with a richly colored reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture. Of course, it must be taken for granted that Mr. Nikisch gave a severe blow to the conventionalities again, and flew directly in the face of tradition; but the effect was remarkably impressive, and the work bore the new coloring very well, and without any especial loss in its general meaning. The second motive was taken much slower than usual, and the fugato was subjected to the same treatment, and it is hardly necessary to say that there were one or two of the now familiar ritardandos, which, if Mr. Nikisch is not a little more sparing of them, will become as conventional as are the customary readings to which he seems to have so much objection. However, the overture was very impressive in its new aspect, and its more fiery passages were given with splendid force and brilliancy. It would seem though, that if Weber had wanted his work read as Mr. Nikisch read it, he would have marked it so, but as he failed to give any such indications, we may look upon it as a very interesting and remarkably effective Weber-Nikisch transcription. The novelty of the programme were two episodes for orchestra by Mr. Arthur Bird, which were heard for the first time here, and initiated Mr. Nikisch's recognition of native composers. One of these episodes is a "Scène Orientale," and the other an Intermezzo and Trio. Both are fresh and free in theme and in orchestral color, the first being the most original. The wood-wind instruments were used with fine skill and taste, and in the "Scène' a very striking and ingenious effect is made by the persistent reiteration of a minor second which forms an accompaniment to the principal subject. There are some fine contrasts in tone painting, and the whole is thoroughly artistic in feeling and shows the taste of a refined musician. The intermezzo is gracefully and delicately instrumented, and has a delightful vivacity, but it suggests the finale of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and some parts of Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" Overture. Both episodes were well worth the hearing, and fairly earned the hearty and appreciative applause that rewarded them. The symphony was Volkmann's in B-flat, which had been heard at an earlier concert by this orchestra, and which well deserved the repetition accorded it. It is wholly modern in style and treatment, but it differs from most modern symphonies in that its composer was not ashamed or afraid to indulge in clear and graceful melody in which the work abounds The first movement is somewhat rugged, but is very strong, and is striking in its large force and freedom. The allegretto is charming in its naive piquancy and its pretty instrumentation, while learning discreetly used is not lacking. In fact the symphony abounds in clever contrapuntal devices which, however, do not obtrude themselves as the be all and end all of the work, but which fall into their due places as illustrative episodes subordinate to the general idea. A strong and deeply interesting individuality marks the symphony as a whole and shows the composer if not as a genius of the highest powers, as an original and self-reliant master of his art and science. The playing of the orchestra could scarcely have been bettered through the entire concert, and it must be conceded that by this time Mr. Nikisch has given ample evidence that he is a conductor who is entitled to great respect. The soloist was M. Emil Fischer, who has such a noble voice that its lack of variety in tone color is almost a misfortune. He sang the great bass aria from "Euryanthe" with true musicianly taste and feeling, but in a somewhat uninteresting manner. In fact, Mr. Fischer's style is hardly adapted to the concert room, where the methods of opera are apt to seem heavy and unrefined. At the conclusion of his singing of the aria he was vigorously applauded and as vigorously recalled. Later in the evening he sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, "Resignation," a flat and insipid song by Littolf, which was quite out of place in such a concert, and the romanza from Schumann's "Spanish Love Songs," which is not an interesting example of the composer, and, moreover, has nothing of Spanish color about it. Mr. Fischer again sang earnestly, but heavily, and was again recalled. For the next concert we are to have a Haydn Symphony in G, Mozart's Symphony in G-minor, and Beethoven's C-minor Symphony. Three symphonies are certainly a novelty in Boston concert programmes, and it remains to be seen if such a generous allowance of symphony will agree with the musical stomach of the symphony audience. Such a programme is hard on the ticket speculators; but it serves them right.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 3, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The Bostonians' Home Season with the First Week's Repertoire—Otto Hegner's Second Appearance in This City—Other Concert Events of the Week—News, Notes, Comment.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra appears to have a conviction that the American composer has a right to a hearing by his countrymen, and his action in giving a place on last evening's programme to Arthur Bird's "Episodes for Orchestra," styled "Oriental Scene" and "Intermezza," is to be highly commended by all friends of native musical talent. These two compositions have been well chosen by Mr. Nikisch from the many presented for his examination, and all who heard them must have had cause for new faith in the musical possibilities of the native American. The "Oriental Scene" is aptly named, for, aided by the fancy of the musician, it gives a wonderfully true picture of oriental life; all the quaint themes are treated with rare grace and skill in the score. Its contrasts are admirably calculated to add to the interest of the composition, and, all in all, it is one of the brightest evidences of the composer's right to a place among the honored names of the musical world of today. The "Intermezzo" is another most enjoyable number, with themes of great beauty, which are most happily treated in their elaboration. Both compositions were played with faultless care and skill under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and the applause which rewarded the composer and his work was richly merited. The "Euryanthe" overture opened the programme, and its reading by the new conductor brought out its familiar beauties with superb effect, the sharp contrasts of the composition being judiciously heightened

STEINERT HALL.

FIRST CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN A MINOR, No. 1. — SCHUMANN

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

SONGS WITH PIANO. — FRANZ

a) "MADCHEN MIT DEM ROTHEN MUNDCHEN."
b) "AM LEUCHTENDEN SOMMERMORGEN."
c) GEWITTEMACHT.

MR. HUBBARD.

SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.

a) ANDANTE FROM THE CONCERTO IN D MINOR. — B. MOLIQUE
b) AM SPRINGBRUNNEN. — C. DAVIDOFF

MR. ADAMOWSKI.

PIANO QUARTET IN A MAJOR. — BRAHMS

MISS O'BRION, MESS. ADAMOWSKI AND MR. KUNTZ.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889.

Carl Baermann at the Third Boston Symphony Concert.

GROVE declares the name Emperor unnecessary; but one ought to be thankful that it occurred to somebody to apply it to Beethoven's great Fifth Concerto, in E-flat.

Composed when the French were capturing Vienna, 1809, it is not wonderful that the Master should have had Majesty in mind, as it stood before him in the might and light of two emperors. The Emperor of Concertos this will always be. It was played in Boston first in 1854 by the Germanias, with Robert Heller at the piano, though happening to be in New Hampshire at that date, I did not hear it. It has now been given five times at the Symphony Orchestra concert, Baermann officiating at the piano on four of these occasions. His oneness with the orchestra was more remarkable than ever this week, and the performance was perpetual delight. You can never tell how Baermann does it, but "he gets there just the same."

The overture was the Egmont, dating from nearly the same prolific period of Beethoven's life.

By way of entree, Mr. Nikisch gave a comparative novelty—in deference, it is thought, to popular wishes,—Glinka's Fantasy on Two Russian Folksongs: the first a Bridal Song; the second a Dance, decidedly hornpipey in character. This number was both welcome and brightly executed.

Having thus gone from Holland in the overture, through Vienna in the concerto, to Russia in the novelty, we came at last to Italy, in Mendelssohn's Symphony in A, played with airy rapidity. This work was first given in our city (on the competent authority of Geo. H. Wilson) nearly forty years ago, January 19, 1850, by the Musical Fund Society,—a society people are inclined to forget, though it did Boston excellent and ill-requited service. At first blush it seems strange to think that this Boston production was seventeen long years after Mendelssohn originally directed this symphony in London, in 1833; but on reflection it is not the delay we should wonder at, but the promptness. The Emperor Concerto waited from 1809 till 1854 before Boston listened to it. We should not in these days wait seventeen years before hearing a great work by a German composer; but there are compositions from other nations which will be much longer waited for, if the Symphony director continues to wear German earlocks.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

Fourth Symphony Concert—Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The programme of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, with Emil Fischer, soloist, was:

Weber.	Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber.	Air, "Wo berg, ich mich?" from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird.	Two episodes for orchestra. (MS.) a) Oriental scene. b) Intermezzo and trio. (First time in Boston.)
	Songs with pianoforte.
Littolf.	a) Resignation.
Schumann.	b) Romanza, from "Spanish Liebeslieder." Op. 138.
Volkmann.	Symphony No. 2 in B flat.

Again Mr. Nikisch conducted an entire programme without the score and with eminently satisfactory musical results. His revival of the strong and interesting Volkmann symphony is timely; it is one of the best modern works in this class (though the last movement is constructively weaker than the others.) The happy theme of the allegretto is charmingly instrumentated. The performance was one of the best this season, presenting so many elements of refined playing, that were we to particularize them each division of the orchestra would find itself eulogized. A sparkling and vital reading was given the "Euryanthe" overture, Mr. Nikisch maintaining an iconoclastic attitude in certain places, which we found to greatly enhance the romanticism of the whole. A pretty novelty was Arthur Bird's music. It is not very pretentious save that he uses an unusually full orchestra in the Scene Orientale, but it is skilful and imaginative writing. Mr. Bird leans to the picturesque in music, but we should say after hearing the lovely trio of the Intermezzo, that he was capable of considerable sentiment.

The band played both parts well, giving just the right motion to the first, in which the English horn is used most effectively. Mr. Nikisch has made a good beginning in selecting from the work of native composers. Mr. Fischer sang, as is his wont, intelligently, but with less vocal freedom than he usually shows; the Weber air is taxing. The songs were sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Max Zach. The programme of the next concert will furnish an especially good opportunity to consider the development of the symphony, one which all students of music, especially, should not overlook. Mr. Nikisch will play three works in the symphonic form, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, in the order named. The example from Haydn is a little-heard work in G, No. 15, of Breitkopf's edition; Mozart will be represented by the G minor symphony; [illegible] by the noble trio. A remarkable [illegible] Surely.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Weber: Lysiart's aria from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird: Two episodes for orchestra: Scène orientale, and Intermezzo and Trio (MS.)
Schumann: Romanza from "Spanish Love-songs," Op. 138.
Litolff: "Resignation."
Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat.

Mr. Emil Fischer was the singer.

The brilliant and romantic overture to "Euryanthe" was so admirably played, with so much fire, vigor and incisiveness of accent, that one could only regret the over-sentimentally slow tempo at which the second theme was taken—robbing it of all its buoyant grace—and the unnecessary dragging of the opening measures of the fugato that immediately follows the little episode on the muted strings. But, apart from these eccentricities, the overture was given with an effectiveness that carried everything before it. Arthur Bird's two "episodes" show that the composer is well skilled in writing for the orchestra, and knows how to produce gorgeous effects of tone-coloring that would do no discredit to the best French masters. Perhaps he inclines a little toward using all the tints on his palette on a very small picture, but this is an exuberance that can easily be forgiven. The "scène orientale" has much dreamy beauty, and one would say that it showed decided picturesque imaginativeness, had not the same thing been done by most French composers, from Félicien David down to the "colorists" of the present day. The Intermezzo shows more concentration of musical purpose and real inventiveness; the working out is, moreover, carried through with notable cleverness. Both pieces are charming as may be, and make one wish to hear more from the pen of a composer who, if report speaks true, has done things in a more earnest vein than these bits of musical bric-à-brac. But they were superbly played, and made a decided impression. The Volkmann symphony has moments of beauty, notably the transition from the third to the fourth movement, and the whirling close of the latter; but, for the most part, it seems rather tedious, where it is not positively distasteful. It gave the orchestra, however, a chance to do some magnificent playing, and Mr. Nikisch conducted it evidently con amore, and with immense effectiveness.

Mr. Fischer sang Lysiart's grand scena, "Wo berg ich mich?" in excellent style, if a little heavily in the concluding Allegro movement. But he was very impressive, both in the recitative passages and in the sombre, slow cantilena of the first part. The songs with pianoforte were less effective, and suffered sadly from poor accompanying.

The next programme is a novelty in the history of concert giving in this city. It consists of three symphonies: Haydn, in G; Mozart, in G minor; and Beethoven, in C minor. It thus gives a bird's-eye view over the whole growth of the symphony, from the first establishment of the form under Haydn, to its full development under Beethoven. More and better than this, it comprises at least two of the finest products of human genius in the symphonic form. Let those to whom two symphonies on the programme are a bugbear, just try the experiment, for once, and see if these three symphonies (et præterea nihil), do not give them as much enjoyment as they ever got from a concert.

SPECIAL.

—THE—

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Composed of 75 artists will give one of their excellent concerts at the Lowell Opera House, on Thursday, November 7th.

Tickets $1.00 and 75 cents. For sale Monday, Nov. 4, at 10 o'clock.

Ottegner Concerts

ACCOMPANIED BY
THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB OF BOSTON
AND MRS. PEMBERTON HINCKS

LIEBLER & MAASS, LITH. 68 TO 76 PARK PLACE, N.Y.

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF
MESSRS. HENRY E. ABBEY AND MAURICE GRAU

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, Nov. 13, at 2:30.
FIRST
YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c., 75c. and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the box office.

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a
GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,
at 2:30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,
OTTO HEGNER,
will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.
Prices $1.50, $1, 75c. and 50c. Seats now on sale at Music Hall box office.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Wednesday Afternoon, Nov. 13, at 2:30.
FIRST
YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c, 75c and $1.00, according to location. Now on sale at the box office.
6t n 4

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a
GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,
at 2.30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,
OTTO HEGNER,
will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.
Prices, $1.50, $1, 75c and 50c. Seats now on sale at Box Office, Music Hall. Steinway pianos used at these concerts.
8t[A] 1

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8,

NEW OPERA HOUSE, LOWELL

Grand Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LOWELL, Nov. 7.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert in the new Opera House this evening. The boxes were all filled with ladies and gentlemen in full dress, and a representative Lowell audience greeted Mr. Nikisch as he stepped forward to lead the overture "Euryanthe," by Weber.

Miss Florence Finlayson then rendered the Samson and Delilah aria by Saint-Saens, and captivated her auditors completely. Glinka's "Komarinskaja," a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, which was so popular with Boston audiences, was received rapturously and with long-continued applause. Miss Finlayson then sang two songs by Schumann, "I'll Not Complain" and "Spring Night," which at once showed what an excellent voice she has. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A, four movements, closed the programme.

A word as to the new opera house in which the concert took place. It is built after the plans of the Tremont Theatre in Boston, drawn by the same architect. The decorations are handsome. It has all the modern improvements, and a stage adapted to the mounting of any play now on the road. John F. Cosgrove is lessee and manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889

THE "POPULARS."

On Wednesday afternoon will be given the first of this season's "Young People's Popular," for which Mr. Nikisch has been making excellent provision. In spite of the juvenility of the title, there is no reason why those persons who were unsuccessful seekers after the Symphony tickets should not find consolation here, just as many regular patrons of the Friday or Saturday performances attend these also. Of course a whole symphony is not given and there may be a trace of levity in some of the numbers; but there are the same grand orchestra, the same conductor and the same style of rendering the music, so that the only difference lies in some points of the programme, which might well be accounted as of minor consequence by any who are truly anxious to keep au courant with the general drift of the season. The soloists will be Mme. Carl Alves, a New York contralto who made a fine impression at the recent Taunton festival, and M. Molé, the flutist. The orchestra will play the "Rienzi" overture and "Seigfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the Weber-Lizst "Invitation to the Dance."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889.

Carl Baermann at the Third Boston Symphony Concert.

GROVE declares the name Emperor unnecessary; but one ought to be thankful that it occurred to somebody to apply it to Beethoven's great Fifth Concerto, in E-flat.

Composed when the French were capturing Vienna, 1809, it is not wonderful that the Master should have had Majesty in mind, as it stood before him in the might and light of two emperors. The Emperor of Concertos this will always be. It was played in Boston first in 1854 by the Germanias, with Robert Heller at the piano, though happening to be in New Hampshire at that date, I did not hear it. It has now been given five times at the Symphony Orchestra concert, Baermann officiating at the piano on four of these occasions. His oneness with the orchestra was more remarkable than ever this week, and the performance was perpetual delight. You can never tell how Baermann does it, but "he gets there just the same."

The overture was the Egmont, dating from nearly the same prolific period of Beethoven's life.

By way of entree, Mr. Nikisch gave a comparative novelty—in deference, it is thought, to popular wishes,—Glinka's Fantasy on Two Russian Folksongs: the first a Bridal Song; the second a Dance, decidedly hornpipey in character. This number was both welcome and brightly executed.

Having thus gone from Holland in the overture, through Vienna in the concerto, to Russia in the novelty, we came at last to Italy, in Mendelssohn's Symphony in A, played with airy rapidity. This work was first given in our city (on the competent authority of Geo. H. Wilson) nearly forty years ago, January 19, 1850, by the Musical Fund Society,—a society people are inclined to forget, though it did Boston excellent and ill-requited service. At first blush it seems strange to think that this Boston production was seventeen long years after Mendelssohn originally directed this symphony in London, in 1833; but on reflection it is not the delay we should wonder at, but the promptness. The Emperor Concerto waited from 1809 till 1854 before Boston listened to it. We should not in these days wait seventeen years before hearing a great work by a German composer; but there are compositions from other nations which will be much longer waited for, if the Symphony director continues to wear German earlocks.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

Fourth Symphony Concert—Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The programme of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, with Emil Fischer, soloist, was:

Weber.	Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber.	Air, "Wo berg, ich mich?" from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird.	Two episodes for orchestra. (MS.) a) Oriental scene. b) Intermezzo and trio. (First time in Boston.)
	Songs with pianoforte.
Littolf.	a) Resignation.
Schumann.	b) Romanza, from "Spanish Liebeslieder." Op. 138.
Volkmann.	Symphony No. 2 in B flat.

Again Mr. Nikisch conducted an entire programme without the score and with eminently satisfactory musical results. His revival of the strong and interesting Volkmann symphony is timely; it is one of the best modern works in this class (though the last movement is constructively weaker than the others.) The happy theme of the allegretto is charmingly instrumentated. The performance was one of the best this season, presenting so many elements of refined playing, that were we to particularize them each division of the orchestra would find itself eulogized. A sparkling and vital reading was given the "Euryanthe" overture, Mr. Nikisch maintaining an iconoclastic attitude in certain places, which we found to greatly enhance the romanticism of the whole. A pretty novelty was Arthur Bird's music. It is not very pretentious save that he uses an unusually full orchestra in the Scene Orientale, but it is skilful and imaginative writing. Mr. Bird leans to the picturesque in music, but we should say after hearing the lovely trio of the Intermezzo, that he was capable of considerable sentiment.

The band played both parts well, giving just the right motion to the first, in which the English horn is used most effectively. Mr. Nikisch has made a good beginning in selecting from the work of native composers. Mr. Fischer sang, as is his wont, intelligently, but with less vocal freedom than he usually shows; the Weber air is taxing. The songs were sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Max Zach. The programme of the next concert will furnish an especially good opportunity to consider the development of the symphony, one which all students of music, especially, should not overlook. Mr. Nikisch will play three works in the symphonic form, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, in the order named. The example from Haydn is a little-heard work in G, No. 13, of Breitkopf's edition; Mozart will be represented by the G minor symphony; Beethoven by the noble fifth. A remarkable programme, surely.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Weber: Lysiart's aria from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird: Two episodes for orchestra: Scène orientale, and Intermezzo and Trio (MS.)
Schumann: Romanza from "Spanish Love-songs," Op. 138.
Litolff: "Resignation."
Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat.
Mr. Emil Fischer was the singer.

The brilliant and romantic overture to "Euryanthe" was so admirably played, with so much fire, vigor and incisiveness of accent, that one could only regret the over-sentimentally slow tempo at which the second theme was taken—robbing it of all its buoyant grace—and the unnecessary dragging of the opening measures of the fugato that immediately follows the little episode on the muted strings. But, apart from these eccentricities, the overture was given with an effectiveness that carried everything before it. Arthur Bird's two "episodes" show that the composer is well skilled in writing for the orchestra, and knows how to produce gorgeous effects of tone-coloring that would do no discredit to the best French masters. Perhaps he inclines a little toward using all the tints on his palette on a very small picture, but this is an exuberance that can easily be forgiven. The "scène orientale" has much dreamy beauty, and one would say that it showed decided picturesque imaginativeness, had not the same thing been done by most French composers, from Félicien David down to the "colorists" of the present day. The Intermezzo shows more concentration of musical purpose and real inventiveness; the working out is, moreover, carried through with notable cleverness. Both pieces are charming as may be, and make one wish to hear more from the pen of a composer who, if report speaks true, has done things in a more earnest vein than these bits of musical bric-à-brac. But they were superbly played, and made a decided impression. The Volkmann symphony has moments of beauty, notably the transition from the third to the fourth movement, and the whirling close of the latter; but, for the most part, it seems rather tedious, where it is not positively distasteful. It gave the orchestra, however, a chance to do some magnificent playing, and Mr. Nikisch conducted it evidently con amore, and with immense effectiveness.

Mr. Fischer sang Lysiart's grand scena, "Wo berg ich mich?" in excellent style, if a little heavily in the concluding Allegro movement. But he was very impressive, both in the recitative passages and in the sombre, slow cantilena of the first part. The songs with pianoforte were less effective, and suffered sadly from poor accompanying.

The next programme is a novelty in the history of concert giving in this city. It consists of three symphonies: Haydn, in G; Mozart, in G minor; and Beethoven, in C minor. It thus gives a bird's-eye view over the whole growth of the symphony, from the first establishment of the form under Haydn, to its full development under Beethoven. More and better than this, it comprises at least two of the finest products of human genius in the symphonic form. Let those to whom two symphonies on the programme are a bugbear, just try the experiment, for once, and see if these three symphonies (et praeterea nihil), do not give them as much enjoyment as they ever got from a concert.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, Nov. 13, at 2:30.
FIRST
YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR
Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c., 75c. and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the box office.

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a
GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,
at 2:30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,
OTTO HEGNER,
will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.
Prices $1.50, $1, 75c. and 50c. Seats now on sale at Music Hall box office.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Wednesday Afternoon, Nov. 13, at 2.30,
FIRST
YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR
Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c, 75c and $1.00, according to location. Now on sale at the box office.
6t n4

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a
GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,
at 2.30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,
OTTO HEGNER,
will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.
Prices, $1.50, $1, 75c and 50c. Seats now on sale at Box Office, Music Hall. Steinway pianos used at these concerts.
8t[A]

OPERA

SPECIAL.
—THE—
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Composed of 75 artists will give one of their excellent concerts at the Lowell Opera House, on Thursday, November 7th.
Tickets $1.00 and 75 cents. For sale Monday, Nov. 4, at 10 o'clock.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

NEW OPERA HOUSE, LOWELL

Grand Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LOWELL, Nov. 7.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert in the new Opera House this evening. The boxes were all filled with ladies and gentlemen in full dress, and a representative Lowell audience greeted Mr. Nikisch as he stepped forward to lead the overture "Euryanthe," by Weber.

Miss Florence Finlayson then rendered the Samson and Delilah aria by Saint-Saens, and captivated her auditors completely. Glinka's "Komarinskaja," a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, which was so popular with Boston audiences, was received rapturously and with long-continued applause. Miss Finlayson then sang two songs by Schumann, "I'll Not Complain" and "Spring Night," which at once showed what an excellent voice she has. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A, four movements, closed the programme.

A word as to the new opera house in which the concert took place. It is built after the plans of the Tremont Theatre in Boston, drawn by the same architect. The decorations are handsome. It has all the modern improvements, and a stage adapted to the mounting of any play now on the road. John F. Cosgrove is lessee and manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889

THE "POPULARS."

On Wednesday afternoon will be given the first of this season's "Young People's Populars," for which Mr. Nikisch has been making excellent provision. In spite of the juvenility of the title, there is no reason why those persons who were unsuccessful seekers after the Symphony tickets should not find consolation here, just as many regular patrons of the Friday or Saturday performances attend these also. Of course a whole symphony is not given and there may be a trace of levity in some of the numbers; but there are the same grand orchestra, the same conductor and the same style of rendering the music, so that the only difference lies in some points of the programme, which might well be accounted as of minor consequence by any who are truly anxious to keep au courant with the general drift of the season. The soloists will be Mme. Carl Alves, a New York contralto who made a fine impression at the recent Taunton festival, and M. Molé, the flutist. The orchestra will play the "Rienzi" overture and "Seigfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the Weber-Lizst "Invitation to the Dance."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889.

Carl Baermann at the Third Boston Symphony Concert.

GROVE declares the name Emperor unnecessary; but one ought to be thankful that it occurred to somebody to apply it to Beethoven's great Fifth Concerto, in E-flat.

Composed when the French were capturing Vienna, 1809, it is not wonderful that the Master should have had Majesty in mind, as it stood before him in the might and light of two emperors. The Emperor of Concertos this will always be. It was played in Boston first in 1854 by the Germanias, with Robert Heller at the piano, though happening to be in New Hampshire at that date, I did not hear it. It has now been given five times at the Symphony Orchestra concert, Baermann officiating at the piano on four of these occasions. His oneness with the orchestra was more remarkable than ever this week, and the performance was perpetual delight. You can never tell how Baermann does it, but "he gets there just the same."

The overture was the Egmont, dating from nearly the same prolific period of Beethoven's life.

By way of entree, Mr. Nikisch gave a comparative novelty—in deference, it is thought, to popular wishes,—Glinka's Fantasy on Two Russian Folksongs: the first a Bridal Song; the second a Dance, decidedly hornpipey in character. This number was both welcome and brightly executed.

Having thus gone from Holland in the overture, through Vienna in the concerto, to Russia in the novelty, we came at last to Italy, in Mendelssohn's Symphony in A, played with airy rapidity. This work was first given in our city (on the competent authority of Geo. H. Wilson) nearly forty years ago, January 19, 1850, by the Musical Fund Society,—a society people are inclined to forget, though it did Boston excellent and ill-requited service. At first blush it seems strange to think that this Boston production was seventeen long years after Mendelssohn originally directed this symphony in London, in 1833; but on reflection it is not the delay we should wonder at, but the promptness. The Emperor Concerto waited from 1809 till 1854 before Boston listened to it. We should not in these days wait seventeen years before hearing a great work by a German composer; but there are compositions from other nations which will be much longer waited for, if the Symphony director continues to wear German earlocks.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

Fourth Symphony Concert—Emil Fischer, Soloist.

The programme of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, with Emil Fischer, soloist, was:

Weber.	Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber.	Air, "Wo berg, ich mich?" from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird.	Two episodes for orchestra. (MS.) a) Oriental scene. b) Intermezzo and trio. (First time in Boston.)
	Songs with pianoforte.
Littolf.	a) Resignation.
Schumann.	b) Romanza, from "Spanish Liebeslieder." Op. 138.
Volkmann.	Symphony No. 2 in B flat.

Again Mr. Nikisch conducted an entire programme without the score and with eminently satisfactory musical results. His revival of the strong and interesting Volkmann symphony is timely; it is one of the best modern works in this class (though the last movement is constructively weaker than the others.) The happy theme of the allegretto is charmingly instrumentated. The performance was one of the best this season, presenting so many elements of refined playing, that were we to particularize them each division of the orchestra would find itself eulogized. A sparkling and vital reading was given the "Euryanthe" overture, Mr. Nikisch maintaining an iconoclastic attitude in certain places, which we found to greatly enhance the romanticism of the whole. A pretty novelty was Arthur Bird's music. It is not very pretentious save that he uses an unusually full orchestra in the Scene Orientale, but it is skilful and imaginative writing. Mr. Bird leans to the picturesque in music, but we should say after hearing the lovely trio of the Intermezzo, that he was capable of considerable sentiment.

The band played both parts well, giving just the right motion to the first, in which the English horn is used most effectively. Mr. Nikisch has made a good beginning in selecting from the work of native composers. Mr. Fischer sang, as is his wont, intelligently, but with less vocal freedom than he usually shows; the Weber air is taxing. The songs were sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Max Zach. The programme of the next concert will furnish an especially good opportunity to consider the development of the symphony, one which all students of music, especially, should not overlook. Mr. Nikisch will play three works in the symphonic form, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, in the order named. The example from Haydn is a little-heard work in G, No. 13, of Breitkopf's edition; Mozart will be represented by the G minor symphony; Beethoven by the noble fifth. A remarkable programme, surely.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Weber: Lysiart's aria from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird: Two episodes for orchestra: Scène orientale, and Intermezzo and Trio (MS.)
Schumann: Romanza from "Spanish Love-songs," Op. 138.
Litolff: "Resignation."
Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat.

Mr. Emil Fischer was the singer.

The brilliant and romantic overture to "Euryanthe" was so admirably played, with so much fire, vigor and incisiveness of accent, that one could only regret the over-sentimentality slow tempo at which the second theme was taken—robbing it of all its buoyant grace—and the unnecessary dragging of the opening measures of the fugato that immediately follows the little episode on the muted strings. But, apart from these eccentricities, the overture was given with an effectiveness that carried everything before it. Arthur Bird's two "episodes" show that the composer is well skilled in writing for the orchestra, and knows how to produce gorgeous effects of tone-coloring that would do no discredit to the best French masters. Perhaps he inclines a little toward using all the tints on his palette on a very small picture, but this is an exuberance that can easily be forgiven. The "scène orientale" has much dreamy beauty, and one would say that it showed decided picturesque imaginativeness, had not the same thing been done by most French composers, from Félicien David down to the "colorists" of the present day. The Intermezzo shows more concentration of musical purpose and real inventiveness; the working out is, moreover, carried through with notable cleverness. Both pieces are charming as may be, and make one wish to hear more from the pen of a composer who, if report speaks true, has done things in a more earnest vein than these bits of musical bric-à-brac. But they were superbly played, and made a decided impression. The Volkmann symphony has moments of beauty, notably the transition from the third to the fourth movement, and the whirling close of the latter; but, for the most part, it seems rather tedious, where it is not positively distasteful. It gave the orchestra, however, a chance to do some magnificent playing, and Mr. Nikisch conducted it evidently con amore, and with immense effectiveness.

Mr. Fischer sang Lysiart's grand scena, "Wo berg ich mich?" in excellent style, if a little heavily in the concluding Allegro movement. But he was very impressive, both in the recitative passages and in the sombre, slow cantilena of the first part. The songs with pianoforte were less effective, and suffered sadly from poor accompanying.

The next programme is a novelty in the history of concert giving in this city. It consists of three symphonies: Haydn, in G; Mozart, in G minor; and Beethoven, in C minor. It thus gives a bird's-eye view over the whole growth of the symphony, from the first establishment of the form under Haydn, to its full development under Beethoven. More and better than this, it comprises at least two of the finest products of human genius in the symphonic form. Let those to whom two symphonies on the programme are a bugbear, just try the experiment, for once, and see if these three symphonies (et praeterea nihil), do not give them as much enjoyment as they ever got from a concert.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, Nov. 13, at 2:30.

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c., 75c. and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the box office.

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a

GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,
at 2:30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER,

will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the

MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

Prices $1.50, $1, 75c. and 50c. Seats now on sale at Music Hall box office.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
Wednesday Afternoon, Nov. 13, at 2.30,

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c, 75c and $1.00, according to location. Now on sale at the box office.
6t n4

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a

GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,
at 2.30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER,

will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the

MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

Prices, $1.50, $1, 75c and 50c. Seats now on sale at Box Office, Music Hall. Steinway pianos used at these concerts.
8t[A]

OPERA HOUSE

SPECIAL.

—THE—

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Composed of 75 artists will give one of their excellent concerts at the Lowell Opera House, on Thursday, November 7th.

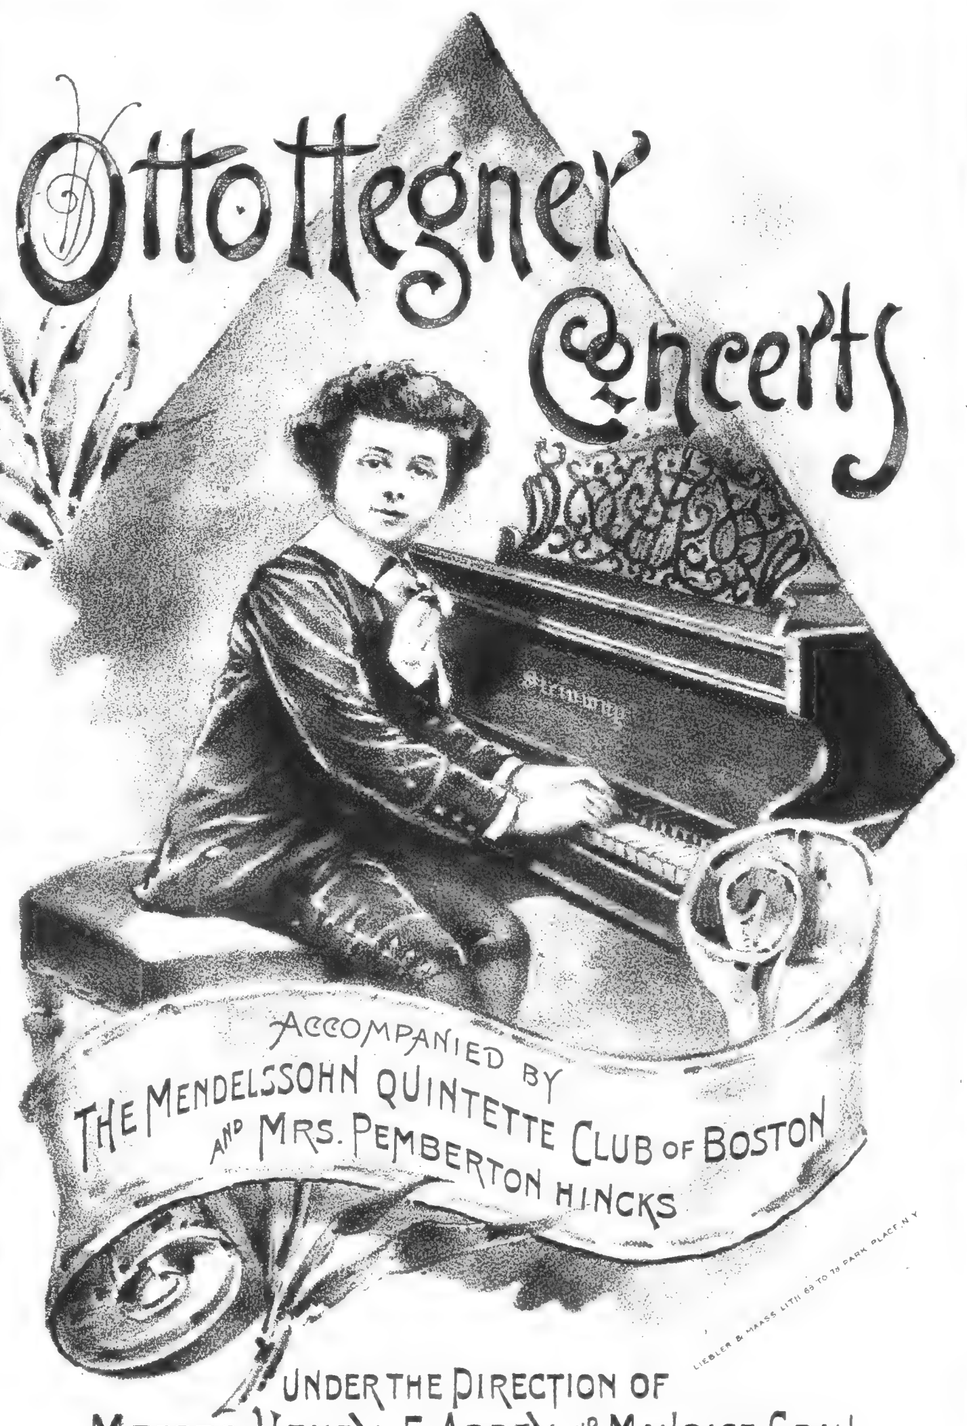
Tickets $1.00 and 75 cents. For sale Monday, Nov. 4, at 10 o'clock.

Otto Hegner Concerts



ACCOMPANIED BY
THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB OF BOSTON
AND MRS. PEMBERTON HINCKS

UNDER THE DIRECTION OF
MESSRS. HENRY E. ABBEY AND MAURICE GRAU

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

NEW OPERA HOUSE, LOWELL

Grand Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LOWELL, Nov. 7.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert in the new Opera House this evening. The boxes were all filled with ladies and gentlemen in full dress, and a representative Lowell audience greeted Mr. Nikisch as he stepped forward to lead the overture "Euryanthe," by Weber.

Miss Florence Finlayson then rendered the Samson and Delilah aria by Saint-Saens, and captivated her auditors completely. Glinka's "Komarinskaja," a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, which was so popular with Boston audiences, was received rapturously and with long-continued applause. Miss Finlayson then sang two songs by Schumann, "I'll Not Complain" and "Spring Night," which at once showed what an excellent voice she has. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A, four movements, closed the programme.

A word as to the new opera house in which the concert took place. It is built after the plans of the Tremont Theatre in Boston, drawn by the same architect. The decorations are handsome. It has all the modern improvements, and a stage adapted to the mounting of any play now on the road. John F. Cosgrove is lessee and manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889

THE "POPULARS."

On Wednesday afternoon will be given the first of this season's "Young People's Populars," for which Mr. Nikisch has been making excellent provision. In spite of the juvenility of the title, there is no reason why those persons who were unsuccessful seekers after the Symphony tickets should not find consolation here, just as many regular patrons of the Friday or Saturday performances attend these also. Of course a whole symphony is not given and there may be a trace of levity in some of the numbers; but there are the same grand orchestra, the same conductor and the same style of rendering the music, so that the only difference lies in some points of the programme, which might well be accounted as of minor consequence by any who are truly anxious to keep au courant with the general drift of the season. The soloists will be Mme. Carl Alves, a New York contralto who made a fine impression at the recent Taunton festival, and M. Molé, the flutist. The orchestra will play the "Rienzi" overture and "Seigfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the Weber-Lizst "Invitation to the Dance."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889.

Carl Baermann at the Third Boston Symphony Concert.

GROVE declares the name Emperor unnecessary; but one ought to be thankful that it occurred to somebody to apply it to Beethoven's great Fifth Concerto, in E-flat.

Composed when the French were capturing Vienna, 1809, it is not wonderful that the Master should have had Majesty in mind, as it stood before him in the might and light of two emperors. The Emperor of Concertos this will always be. It was played in Boston first in 1854 by the Germanias, with Robert Heller at the piano, though happening to be in New Hampshire at that date, I did not hear it. It has now been given five times at the Symphony Orchestra concert. Baermann offici casio was and You
"he g
Th near life.
By para to p Rus
the char and Hi overt Rus
Italy with in ou
Geo.
Janu
eiety get, requ stran was origi in we s
The 1854 not hear poss natu
if th
Ger

Boston Evening Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Weber: Lysiart's aria from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird: Two episodes for orchestra: Scène orientale, and Intermezzo and Trio (MS.)
Schumann: Romanza from "Spanish Love-songs," Op. 138.
Litolff: "Resignation."
Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat.

MR. EMIL FISCHER WAS the singer.

The brilliant and romantic overture to "Euryanthe" was so admirably played, with so much fire, vigor and incisiveness of accent, that one could only regret the over-sentimentally slow tempo at which the second theme was taken—robbing it of all its buoyant grace—and the unnecessary dragging of the opening measures of the fugato that immediately follows the little episode on the muted strings. But, apart from these so-

SPECIAL.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Composed of 75 artists will give one of their excellent concerts at the Lowell Opera House, on Thursday, November 7th.

Tickets $1.00 and 75 cents. For sale Monday, Nov. 4, at 10 o'clock.

MUSIC HALL.

MATINEE

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9TH, AT 2.30.

Messrs. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU have the honor to announce the First Afternoon Concert by the remarkable Young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER

PROGRAMME

Part First.

1. QUINTETTE, (B flat) - - - - - - MENDELSSOHN
MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.
MR. WILHELM OHLIGER, Solo Violin. MR. MANASSA ADLER, 2d Violin.
MR. THOMAS RYAN, Solo Clarinette and Viola. MR. PAUL HENNEBERG, Solo Flute and Viola
MR. MAX DROGE, Solo Violincellist.

2. ARIA, "Paul and Virginia," - - - - - - -
Mrs. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

3. SONATA, opus 53, - - - - - - - - - BEETHOVEN
OTTO HEGNER.

Part Second.

4. ADAGIO AND FINALE from Quintette, - - MENDELSSOHN
MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

5. BOLERO, "Carmen," - - - - - - - - - BIZET
Mrs. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

6. { a BERCEUSE, - - - - - - - - - CHOPIN
{ b GRANDE POLONAISE, - - - - - - - CHOPIN
OTTO HEGNER.

7. RONDO from Quintette, - - - - - - - WEBER
MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

EXECUTIVE STAFF:

ACTING MANAGER ..... Mr. MARCUS R. MAYER
BUSINESS MANAGER ..... Mr. C. N. SCHROEDER
REPRESENTATIVE ..... Mr. JEFF S. LEERBURGER

The next Concert to be given by young OTTO HEGNER will take place at

MUSIC HALL,

At A GRAND MATINEE, Saturday, Nov. 16, at 2.30.

TICKETS ON SALE at Box Office Music Hall, TUESDAY, NOV. 12.

SPECIAL NOTICE

The following Combinations will make Tours under the Direction of Messrs. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU.

SARASATE-D'ALBERT CONCERTS—Consisting of PABLO SARASATE, the Violin Virtuoso; EUGENE D'ALBERT, Pianist and Composer. Beginning New York, Nov. 18, 1889, Metropolitan Opera House.

MME. ADELINA PATTI, SIG. FRANCESCO TAMAGNO and GRAND ITALIAN OPERA CO. Beginning Chicago, December 9, 1889.

GEORGE EDWARDES' LONDON GAIETY THEATRE CO., with MISS FLORENCE ST. JOHN and Full Company of Co-Artists.

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT at Porte St. Martin Theatre, Paris, and Tour of the World.

SEASON 1890-91.

MISS MARY ANDERSON, Tour of the United States. Commencing October 28, 1890, at Broadway Theatre, New York.

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT, Tour of the United States. Commencing at Broadway Theatre, New York, October 6, 1890.

GEORGE EDWARDES' LONDON GAIETY THEATRE CO., with MR. FRED LESLIE, LETTIE LIND and SYLVIA GREY and others. Commencing Dec. 1, 1890, at Broadway Theatre, New York City.

Marcus R. Mayer, Acting Manager, Principal Offices, 1212 Broadway, N.Y. City

Again Mr. Nikisch conducted an entire programme without the score and with eminently satisfactory musical results. His revival of the strong and interesting Volkmann symphony is timely; it is one of the best modern works in this class (though the last movement is constructively weaker than the others.) The happy theme of the allegretto is charmingly instrumentated. The performance was one of the best this season, presenting so many elements of refined playing, that were we to particularize them each division of the orchestra would find itself eulogized. A sparkling and vital reading was given the "Euryanthe" overture, Mr. Nikisch maintaining an iconoclastic attitude in certain places, which we found to greatly enhance the romanticism of the whole. A pretty novelty was Arthur Bird's music. It is not very pretentious save that he uses an unusually full orchestra in the Scene Orientale, but it is skilful and imaginative writing. Mr. Bird leans to the picturesque in music, but we should say after hearing the lovely trio of the Intermezzo, that he was capable of considerable sentiment.

The band played both parts well, giving just the right motion to the first, in which the English horn is used most effectively. Mr. Nikisch has made a good beginning in selecting from the work of native composers. Mr. Fischer sang, as is his wont, intelligently, but with less vocal freedom than he usually shows; the Weber air is taxing. The songs were sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Max Zach. The programme of the next concert will furnish an especially good opportunity to consider the development of the symphony, one which all students of music, especially, should not overlook. Mr. Nikisch will play three works in the symphonic form, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, in the order named. The example from Haydn is a little-heard work in G, [illegible] Mozart will be [illegible] symphony; [illegible]

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c., 75c. and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the box office.

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a

GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,

Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,

at 2:30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER,

will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the

MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

Prices $1.50, $1. 75c. and 50c. Seats now on sale at Music Hall box office.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Wednesday Afternoon, Nov. 13, at 2.30,

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c, 75c and $1.00, according to location. Now on sale at the box office.

6t n 4

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a

GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,

Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,

at 2.30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER,

will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the

MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

Prices, $1.50, $1, 75c and 50c. Seats now on sale at Box Office, Music Hall. Steinway pianos used at these concerts.

8t(A) n 1

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

NEW OPERA HOUSE, LOWELL

Grand Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LOWELL, Nov. 7.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert in the new Opera House this evening. The boxes were all filled with ladies and gentlemen in full dress, and a representative Lowell audience greeted Mr. Nikisch as he stepped forward to lead the overture "Euryanthe," by Weber.

Miss Florence Finlayson then rendered the Samson and Delilah aria by Saint-Saens, and captivated her auditors completely. Glinka's "Komarinskaja," a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, which was so popular with Boston audiences, was received rapturously and with long-continued applause. Miss Finlayson then sang two songs by Schumann, "I'll Not Complain" and "Spring Night," which at once showed what an excellent voice she has. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A, four movements, closed the programme.

A word as to the new opera house in which the concert took place. It is built after the plans of the Tremont Theatre in Boston, drawn by the same architect. The decorations are handsome. It has all the modern improvements, and a stage adapted to the mounting of any play now on the road. John F. Cosgrove is lessee and manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889

THE "POPULARS."

On Wednesday afternoon will be given the first of this season's "Young People's Popular," for which Mr. Nikisch has been making excellent provision. In spite of the juvenility of the title, there is no reason why those persons who were unsuccessful seekers after the Symphony tickets should not find consolation here, just as many regular patrons of the Friday or Saturday performances attend these also. Of course a whole symphony is not given and there may be a trace of levity in some of the numbers; but there are the same grand orchestra, the same conductor and the same style of rendering the music, so that the only difference lies in some points of the programme, which might well be accounted as of minor consequence by any who are truly anxious to keep au courant with the general drift of the season. The soloists will be Mme. Carl Alves, a New York contralto who made a fine impression at the recent Taunton festival, and M. Molé, the flutist. The orchestra will play the "Rienzi" overture and "Seigfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the Weber-Lizst "Invitation to the Dance."

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 2, 1889.

Carl Baermann at the Third Boston Symphony Concert.

GROVE declares the name Emperor unnecessary; but one ought to be thankful that it occurred to somebody to apply it to Beethoven's great Fifth Concerto, in E-flat.

Composed when the French were capturing Vienna, 1809, it is not wonderful that the Master should have had Majesty in mind, as it stood before him in the might and light of two emperors. The Emperor of Concertos this will always be. It was played in Boston first in 1854 by the Germanias, with Robert Heller at the piano, though happening to be in New Hampshire at that date, I did not hear it. It has now been given five times at the Symphony Orchestra

offich
casio was and You
"he g
Th near life.
By parat to pe
Russ
the s char and Ha overt Russ
Italy with in ou
Geo.
Janu
eiety get, requ stran was origi in 18
we s
The 1854 not i hear pose natio if th
Ger

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Weber: Lysiart's aria from "Euryanthe."
Arthur Bird: Two episodes for orchestra: Scène orientale, and Intermezzo and Trio (MS.)
Schumann: Romanza from "Spanish Love-songs," Op. 138.
Litolff: "Resignation."
Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat.

Mr. Emil Fischer was the singer.

The brilliant and romantic overture to "Euryanthe" was so admirably played, with so much fire, vigor and incisiveness of accent, that one could only regret the over-sentimentally slow tempo at which the second theme was taken—robbing it of all its buoyant grace—and the unnecessary dragging of the opening measures of the fugato that immediately follows the little epi- [illegible] But, apart from these ec-

SPECIAL.

—THE—

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Composed of 75 artists will give one of their excellent concerts at the Lowell Opera House, on Thursday, November 7th.

Tickets $1.00 and 75 cents. For sale Monday, Nov. 4, at 10 o'clock.

MI

SATURI

Messrs. ABE
Afternoon Conce

OT

1. QUINTE

MR. WILHELM
MR. THOMAS R

2. ARIA, "

3. SONATA

4. ADAGIO

5. BOLER

6. { a BE b GR

7. RONDO

ACTING MA
BUSINESS REPRESENT

Steinway & Son
PIANOS

WAREROOMS
STEINWAY HALL NOS. 107, 109 & 111 EAST 14th S
Bet. Fourth Ave. and Irving Place,
NEW YORK.

Again Mr. Nikisch conducted an entire programme without the score and with eminently satisfactory musical results. His revival of the strong and interesting Volkmann symphony is timely; it is one of the best modern works in this class (though the last movement is constructively weaker than the others.) The happy theme of the allegretto is charmingly instrumentated. The performance was one of the best this season, presenting so many elements of refined playing, that were we to particularize them each division of the orchestra would find itself eulogized. A sparkling and vital reading was given the "Euryanthe" overture, Mr. Nikisch maintaining an iconoclastic attitude in certain places, which we found to greatly enhance the romanticism of the whole. A pretty novelty was Arthur Bird's music. It is not very pretentious save that he uses an unusually full orchestra in the Scene Orientale, but it is skilful and imaginative writing. Mr. Bird leans to the picturesque in music, but we should say after hearing the lovely trio of the Intermezzo, that he was capable of considerable sentiment.

The band played both parts well, giving just the right motion to the first, in which the English horn is used most effectively. Mr. Nikisch has made a good beginning in selecting from the work of native composers. Mr. Fischer sang, as is his wont, intelligently, but with less vocal freedom than he usually shows; the Weber air is taxing. The songs were sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Max Zach. The programme of the next concert will furnish an especially good opportunity to consider the development of the symphony, one which all students of music, especially, should not overlook. Mr. Nikisch will play three works in the symphonic form, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, in the order named. The example from Haydn is a little-heard work in G, No. 13, of Breitkopf's edition; Mozart will be represented by the G minor symphony; Beethoven by the [illegible] A remarkable [illegible]

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c., 75c. and $1.00, according to location, now on sale at the box office.

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a

GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,

Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,

at 2:30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER,

will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the

MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

Prices $1.50, $1, 75c. and 50c. Seats now on sale at Music Hall box office.

Boston Evening Transcript.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

Wednesday Afternoon, Nov. 13, at 2.30,

FIRST

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c, 75c and $1.00, according to location. Now on sale at the box office.

6t n 4

MUSIC HALL.

MESSRS. ABBEY, SCHOEFFEL & GRAU beg to announce a

GRAND HEGNER MATINEE,

Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 9,

at 2.30 o'clock, on which occasion the remarkable young Piano Virtuoso,

OTTO HEGNER,

will make his second appearance in Boston, accompanied by the

MENDELSSOHN QUINTET CLUB and Mrs. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

Prices, $1.50, $1, 75c and 50c. Seats now on sale at Box Office, Music Hall. Steinway pianos used at these concerts.

8t[A]

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

NEW OPERA HOUSE, LOWELL

Grand Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LOWELL, Nov. 7.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert in the new Opera House this evening. The boxes were all filled with ladies and gentlemen in full dress, and a representative Lowell audience greeted Mr. Nikisch as he stepped forward to lead the overture "Euryanthe," by Weber.

Miss Florence Finlayson then rendered the Samson and Delilah aria by Saint-Saens, and captivated her auditors completely. Glinka's "Komarinskaja," a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, which was so popular with Boston audiences, was received rapturously and with long-continued applause. Miss Finlayson then sang two songs by Schumann, "I'll Not Complain" and "Spring Night," which at once showed what an excellent voice she has. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony in A, four movements, closed the programme.

A word as to the new opera house in which the concert took place. It is built after the plans of the Tremont Theatre in Boston, drawn by the same architect. The decorations are handsome. It has all the modern improvements, and a stage adapted to the mounting of any play now on the road. John F. Cosgrove is lessee and manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889

THE "POPULARS."

On Wednesday afternoon will be given the first of this season's "Young People's Popular," for which Mr. Nikisch has been making excellent provision. In spite of the juvenility of the title, there is no reason why those persons who were unsuccessful seekers after the Symphony tickets should not find consolation here, just as many regular patrons of the Friday or Saturday performances attend these also. Of course a whole symphony is not given and there may be a trace of levity in some of the numbers; but there are the same grand orchestra, the same conductor and the same style of rendering the music, so that the only difference lies in some points of the programme, which might well be accounted as of minor consequence by any who are truly anxious to keep au courant with the general drift of the season. The soloists will be Mme. Carl Alves, a New York contralto who made a fine impression at the recent Taunton festival, and M. Molé, the flutist. The orchestra will play the "Rienzi" overture and "Seigfried Idyl" of Wagner, and the Weber-Lizst "Invitation to the Dance."

[17]

Lowell Opera House.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90.

Soloist:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinees.

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria.....
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried.....Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantaise for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs with piano.....
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisel would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

The New-York Times, Sunday, November 10,

Herr Arthur Nikisch's programme for the [illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was a fine lesson in the growth and development of the symphony [illegible] of a Haydn symphony, in C minor,

First "Young People's Popular"

is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season's "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be: overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times, Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

The Morning Times.

PUBLISHED BY
CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,
No 22 Central Street, Times Building,
LOWELL, MASS

Single copies two cents; 12 cents per week, or 50 cents per month, delivered anywhere within the city limits. Sent to any address in the United States or Canada at the same price.

ENTERED AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER.

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 8.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Cordial Reception Given the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Possibly the most notable musical event which is likely to occur in Lowell this season occurred last night. Certainly no organization can present a choicer programme of instrumental entertainment than that given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. A superb gathering of musical talent occupies the stage when this eminent organization is there. The audience, which completely filled the new opera house, was another testimonial to the high esteem in which this symphony orchestra is held. It was an audience composed of the best classes of our citizens. A very large extremely conservative element could be counted among those present. It may be that some of these took this opportunity to get a glimpse of the new opera house, but it was no less a desire to listen to the soul-entrancing instrumentation which they knew was in store, that drew them. Miss Florence Finlayson the vocal artist who accompanied the orchestra was a disappointment in many respects. She has a pleasing presence and a sympathetic voice. Her intonation is of a high standard. Her vocal compass, however, appears very limited, and her upper topes which are so sweet and full in a rich contralto voice, were strained and slightly unpleasant to hear. Confined to her limit her tones are exceedingly sweet and pure. Then, too, her selections were not such as will captivate an audience. They required no extraordinary gift beyond an expressive, sympathetic rendering, and it is rather for the gift beyond the ordinary that one naturally looks.

The selections of the orchestra were varied and fascinating. Beginning with the tuneful and graceful overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, there was a manifest interest and sympathy between the audience and orchestra. Extreme quietude prevailed during the several productions. The "Fantasie" on the Russian folksongs was very pleasing, and a recall was desired. But the main charm of the evening like the best wine at the feast was reserved till the last. This was Mendelssohn's grand symphony in A with its four movements. To this selection the musicians bent their best endeavors, and the result can be only inadequately expressed. It was entrancingly dreamy, bewitchingly bright and expressively tender. As some one in a whisper remarked, "it was divine."

Only one thing was lacking when the programme was finished, and that was more. The audience would gladly have sat another hour and listened to a repetition of the programme. There were but five numbers to the programme and the hall was empty at 9.30.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

ONE of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the best musicians of the Hub writes to THE MUSICAL COURIER about Conductor Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not know whether during your stay in Europe you had an occasion to become acquainted with our new conductor, and I therefore take this chance to tell you that he is a most charming man, who would soon become as sympathetic to you as he has become to all of us. He is most extraordinarily beloved by the orchestra, and to all appearance will ever remain so. As for his merits as an artist, it would seem superfluous to add my judgment to those of others, as you no doubt have been sufficiently informed on this subject, and as you, moreover, will soon have a chance to judge for yourself. We have, indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, but we are from week to week more interested in studying under Nikisch, and to note how differently he interprets compositions from what we have hitherto been accustomed to perform them. What he has so far done evinces unquestionably that he is an artist of most pronounced individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

FOUR SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
—AT THE—
HYPERION THEATER.

Monday Evenings, Dec. 16, January 13, February 10 and March 17.

Subscription now open at M. Steinert & Sons' piano warerooms. Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of four concerts $5, will b sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, Monday, December 2

C. A. ELLIS.....MANAGER.
n19 5t

care and attention. Lenton 11/21

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Those who were fortunate enough to hear the fine performances given in this city last season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and every lover of good music will read with interest the announcement of the series of four concerts to be given at the Hyperion by this superb organization, Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch of Leipsic, the concerts of this orchestra seem to have become more popular than ever. A subscription list is now open at the piano warerooms of M. Steinert Sons. Tickets will be sold to subscribers only on Monday, December 2.

AT THE GRAND.

Boston Daily Traveller.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889.

Musical Notes.

The programme of the fifth rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is: Symphony in G, No.13 (B and H,) Haydn; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Beethoven.

Mr. Nikisch's first Young People's Popular programme announced for next Wednesday afternoon in Music Hall is:

Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Aria. "My Heart opens to thy Voice," from "Samson and Dalila," St. Saëns (Mme. Alves); (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert ftantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. Mme. Carl Alves is a [illegible]

Lowell Opera House.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90.

Soloist:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

The Morning Times.

PUBLISHED BY
CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,
No 32 Central Street, Times Building,
LOWELL, MASS

Single copies two cents; 12 cents per week, or 50 cents per month, delivered anywhere within the city limits. Sent to any address in the United States or Canada at the same price.

ENTERED AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER.

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 8.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Cordial Reception Given the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Possibly the most notable musical event which is likely to occur in Lowell this season occurred last night. Certainly no organization can present a choicer programme of instrumental entertainment than that given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. A superb gathering of musical talent occupies the stage when this eminent organization is there. The audience, which completely filled the new opera house, was another testimonial to the high esteem in which this symphony orchestra is held. It was an audience composed of the best classes of our citizens. A very large extremely conservative element could be counted among those present. It may be that some of these took this opportunity to get a glimpse of the new opera house, but it was no less a desire to listen to the soul-entrancing instrumentation which they knew was in store, that drew them. Miss Florence Finlayson the vocal artist who accompanied the orchestra was a disappointment in many respects. She has a pleasing presence and a sympathetic voice. Her intonation is of a high standard. Her vocal compass, however, appears very limited, and her upper tones which are so sweet and full in a rich contralto voice, were strained and slightly unpleasant to hear. Confined to her limit her tones are exceedingly sweet and pure. Then, too, her selections were not such as will captivate an audience. They required no extraordinary gift beyond an expressive, sympathetic rendering, and it is rather for the gift beyond the ordinary that one naturally looks.

The selections of the orchestra were varied and fascinating. Beginning with the tuneful and graceful overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, there was a manifest interest and sympathy between the audience and orchestra. Extreme quietude prevailed during the several productions. The "Fantasie" on the Russian folksongs was very pleasing, and a recall was desired. But the main charm of the evening like the best wine at the feast was reserved till the last. This was Mendelssohn's grand symphony in A with its four movements. To this selection the musicians bent their best endeavors, and the result can be only inadequately expressed. It was entrancingly dreamy, bewitchingly bright and expressively tender. As some one in a whisper remarked, "it was divine."

Only one thing was lacking when the programme was finished, and that was more. The audience would gladly have sat another hour and listened to a repetition of the programme. There were but five numbers to the programme and the hall was empty at 9.30.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinees.

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria .....
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried ..... Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs with piano .....
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisel would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

The New-York Times, Sunday, November 10,

Herr Arthur Nikisch's programme for the [illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was a fine lesson in the growth and development of the symphonic form. It consisted of a Haydn symphony, a Mozart symphony, in G minor, [illegible]

First "Young People's Popular"

is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season's "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times, Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

ONE of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the best musicians of the Hub writes to THE MUSICAL COURIER about Conductor Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not know whether during your stay in Europe you had an occasion to become acquainted with our new conductor, and I therefore take this chance to tell you that he is a most charming man, who would soon become as sympathetic to you as he has become to all of us. He is most extraordinarily beloved by the orchestra, and to all appearance will ever remain so. As for his merits as an artist, it would seem superfluous to add my judgment to those of others, as you no doubt have been sufficiently informed on this subject, and as you, moreover, will soon have a chance to judge for yourself. We have, indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, but we are from week to week more interested in studying under Nikisch, and to note how differently he interprets compositions from what we have hitherto been accustomed to perform them. What he has so far done evinces unquestionably that he is an artist of most pronounced individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

FOUR SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
—AT THE—
HYPERION THEATER.

Monday Evenings, Dec. 16, January 13, February 10 and March 17.

Subscription now open at M. Steinert & Sons' piano warerooms. Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of four concerts $5, will be sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, Monday, December 2

C. A. ELLIS.....MANAGER.
n19 5t

care and attention. Lowell 11/21

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Those who were fortunate enough to hear the fine performances given in this city last season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and every lover of good music will read with interest the announcement of the series of four concerts to be given at the Hyperion by this superb organization, Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch of Leipsic, the concerts of this orchestra seem to have become more popular than ever. A subscription list is now open at the piano warerooms of M. Steinert Sons. Tickets will be sold to subscribers only on Monday, December 2.

AT THE GRAND.

Boston Daily Traveller.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889.

Musical Notes.

The programme of the fifth rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is: Symphony in G, No. 13 (B and H,) Haydn; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Beethoven.

Mr. Nikisch's first Young People's Popular programme announced for next Wednesday afternoon in Music Hall is:

Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Aria. "My Heart opens to thy Voice," from "Samson and Dalila," St. Saëns (Mme. Alves); (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time,) Mons. Mole; songs, with piano, (Mme. Alves); overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. Mme. Carl Alves is a favorite New York [illegible]

Lowell Opera House.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH. AT 8, P. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90.

Soloist:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

The Morning Times.

PUBLISHED BY
CAMPBELL & HANSCOM,
No 23 Central Street, Times Building,
LOWELL, MASS

Single copies two cents; 12 cents per week, or 50 cents per month, delivered anywhere within the city limits. Sent to any address in the United States or Canada at the same price.

ENTERED AS SECOND CLASS MAIL MATTER.

FRIDAY MORNING. NOV. 8.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Cordial Reception Given the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Possibly the most notable musical event which is likely to occur in Lowell this season occurred last night. Certainly no organization can present a choicer programme of instrumental entertainment than that given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. A superb gathering of musical talent occupies the stage when this eminent organization is there. The audience, which completely filled the new opera house, was another testimonial to the high esteem in which this symphony orchestra is held. It was an audience composed of the best classes of our citizens. A very large extremely conservative element could be counted among those present. It may be that some of these took this opportunity to get a glimpse of the new opera house, but it was no less a desire to listen to the soul-entrancing instrumentation which they knew was in store, that drew them. Miss Florence Finlayson the vocal artist who accompanied the orchestra was a disappointment in many respects. She has a pleasing presence and a sympathetic voice. Her intonation is of a high standard. Her vocal compass, however, appears very limited, and her upper tones which are so sweet and full in a rich contralto voice, were strained and slightly unpleasant to hear. Confined to her limit her tones are exceedingly sweet and pure. Then, too, her selections were not such as will captivate an audience. They required no extraordinary gift beyond an expressive, sympathetic rendering, and it is rather for the gift beyond the ordinary that one naturally looks.

The selections of the orchestra were varied and fascinating. Beginning with the tuneful and graceful overture to "Euryanthe" by Weber, there was a manifest interest and sympathy between the audience and orchestra. Extreme quietude prevailed during the several productions. The "Fantasie" on the Russian folksongs was very pleasing, and a recall was desired. But the main charm of the evening like the best wine at the feast was reserved till the last. This was Mendelssohn's grand symphony in A with its four movements. To this selection the musicians bent their best endeavors, and the result can be only inadequately expressed. It was entrancingly dreamy, bewitchingly bright and expressively tender. As some one in a whisper remarked, "it was divine."

Only one thing was lacking when the programme was finished, and that was more. The audience would gladly have sat another hour and listened to a repetition of the programme. There were but five numbers to the programme and the hall was empty at 9.30.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinees.

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria.....
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs with piano.....
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisal would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

The New-York Times, Sunday, November 10,

Herr Arthur Nikisch's programme for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was a fine lesson in the growth and development of the symphonic form. It consisted of a Haydn symphony in G, a Mozart symphony, in G minor, and Beethoven's great fifth.

First "Young People's Popular"

is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season s "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be, overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times, Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1889.

ONE of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the best musicians of the Hub writes to THE MUSICAL COURIER about Conductor Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not know whether during your stay in Europe you had an occasion to become acquainted with our new conductor, and I therefore take this chance to tell you that he is a most charming man, who would soon become as sympathetic to you as he has become to all of us. He is most extraordinarily beloved by the orchestra, and to all appearance will ever remain so. As for his merits as an artist, it would seem superfluous to add my judgment to those of others, as you no doubt have been sufficiently informed on this subject, and as you, moreover, will soon have a chance to judge for yourself. We have, indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, but we are from week to week more interested in studying under Nikisch, and to note how differently he interprets compositions from what we have hitherto been accustomed to perform them. What he has so far done evinces unquestionably that he is an artist of most pronounced individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

FOUR SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS
—AT THE—
HYPERION THEATER.

Monday Evenings, Dec. 16, January 13, February 10 and March 17.

Subscription now open at M. Steinert & Sons' piano warerooms. Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of four concerts $5, will b sold to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, Monday, December 2

C. A. ELLIS.....MANAGER.
n19 5t

care and attention.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Those who were fortunate enough to hear the fine performances given in this city last season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and every lover of good music will read with interest the announcement of the series of four concerts to be given at the Hyperion by this superb organization. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch of Leipsic, the concerts of this orchestra seem to have become more popular than ever. A subscription list is now open at the piano warerooms of M. Steinert Sons. Tickets will be sold to subscribers only on Monday, December 2.

AT THE GRAND.

Boston Daily Traveller.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889.

Musical Notes.

The programme of the fifth rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is: Symphony in G, No.13 (B and H,) Haydn; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Beethoven.

Mr. Nikisch's first Young People's Popular programme announced for next Wednesday afternoon in Music Hall is:

Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Aria. "My Heart opens to thy Voice," from "Samson and Dalila," St. Saëns (Mme. Alves); (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert ftantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time,) Mons. Mole; songs, with piano, (Mme. Alves); overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. Mme. Carl Alves is a favorite New York contralto.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Performances of past seasons by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, and a general knowledge of the excellence of the organization make it unnecessary to speak of the foremost position which it now occupies in the musical world. As a matter of record, it may be of interest to state that the Orchestra was formed in 1881 by a public-spirited and music-loving citizen of Boston, with the intention of giving his native city a permanent organization which should rank with the best orchestras of Europe. To his individual support alone is due the position which the organization has been able to assume.

During the first three years of its existence, the responsible post of Conductor was filled by Mr. Georg Henschel, who was succeeded in 1884 by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna, who held the position for five years.

Too much credit cannot be given these gentlemen for their great musical ability and conscientious devotion to the artistic interests of the organization.

Encouraged by the success of the performance given in Lowell last season, the management has completed arrangements for a concert to be given in the LOWELL OPERA HOUSE, Thursday Evening, November 7th. Assurance is given that nothing will be left undone to make this concert a notable event of the musical season, and worthy the attention of every lover of good music.

THE CONDUCTOR.

The management take pleasure in announcing the engagement of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as Conductor for the coming season. The following sketch of this famous young Kapellmeister is from the pen of Mr. Arthur Weld:—

THE CAREER OF ARTHUR NIKISCH.

"Before long, an artist will arrive in Boston who is probably not only destined to enjoy the greatest popularity in this city, but also to occupy for the next three years practically the most important musical position in this country, The work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra certainly entitles this institution to be considered as the finest Orchestra in this country, and one of the four or five finest orchestras in the world. This being so, the musical rank of its Conductor is undisputed; and the fact that very shortly the new incumbent of this position will be among us justifies the curiosity which is felt by all music lovers as to his artistic personality. It is probably no exaggeration to say that no one has ever been awaited in Boston with so much eager curiosity and interest as falls to the share of our new "Kapellmeister," and, therefore, a short biographical sketch of the distinguished newcomer will doubtless be welcome to many people.

Arthur Nikisch was born on the 12th of October, 1855, in a small town called Szent-Miklos, situated in the principality of Lichtenstein. His father occupied the position of head steward and auditor to the prince, and was himself an enthusiastic musical amateur. In earliest childhood, the boy showed such extraordinary talent that his parents determined to educate him as a musician. He began his studies with the violin; and he mastered this instrument with such ease and so completely that at the early age of eight he appeared in public with most extraordinary success, — in fact, the young prodigy received a genuine ovation. His first studies in harmony and organ-playing were made under the direction of the organist Prochazka, in the neighboring town of Buschtowitz; and in all branches the lad made such remarkable progress as to enable him to enter the Royal Conservatory in Vienna at the unusually early age of eleven. Here he worked harder than ever, and especially devoted himself to all the technical branches of composition, with such success that two years later (being then only thirteen years old) he sent a string sextet to an open competition,

---

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinées.

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria ..... Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried idyll ..... Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.) M. Molé.
Songs with piano ..... Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisel would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

The New-York Times,
Sunday, November 10,

Herr Arthur Nikisch's programme for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was a fine lesson in the growth and development of the symphonic form. It consisted of a Haydn symphony in G, a Mozart symphony, in G minor, and Beethoven's great fifth.

First "Young People's Popular" is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season s "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times,
Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

THE MUSICAL COU

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBE

ONE of the members of the Boston Sy chestra and one of the best musicians writes to THE M. SICAL COURIER about Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not kn during your stay in Europe you had an occa come acquainted with our new conductor, a fore take this chance to tell you that he charming man, who would soon become as to you as he has become to all of us. He traordinarily beloved by the orchestra, an pearance will ever remain so. As for his artist, it would seem superfluous to add my those of others, as you no doubt have been informed on this subject, and as you, mo soon have a chance to judge for yourself. indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, from week to week more interested in stud Nikisch, and to note how differently he inte positions from what we have hitherto been to perform them. What he has so far d unquestionably that he is an artist of most individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

and unanimously received the first prize. He remained at the conservatory for eight years, during which time he won many more prizes for his compositions, as well as the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions—a cantata for solo, chorus, and orchestra—was so successful as to be constantly repeated; and, as a special honor (and tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer), on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory, he publicly conducted a symphony. He was immensely popular with all his fellow-students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, who especially recognized his extraordinary talent for conducting; and, as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a magnificent and costly baton.

He immediately applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera; and, obtaining this honorable position without the least difficulty, he occupied it during four years, receiving in this way the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous répertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such magnificent conductors as Richter and Jahn. At the end of his experiences as a member of the orchestra (1878), he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neumann, to Leipsic, and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House, where at that time Anton Seidl was officiating as chief conductor. He remained in this position for a year, drilling the chorus and soloists, and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience had shown him that he had found a real musical wonder; and at the end of the year he was transferred to the New Opera House as head conductor, where he has been ever since. He made his début in this position with one of the most magnificent performances of "Tannhäuser" ever heard in Leipsic, and from that moment he was universally acknowledged as one of the most gifted and important conductors in Europe. It is no exaggeration to say that he has done more for music in Leipsic than any other individual can justly claim. Under his care and direction, the Leipsic Theatre orchestra has gained a European fame which entitles it to an equal or even superior place to the Gewandhaus orchestra. Nikisch has also, during these years in Leipsic, distinguished himself quite as much as a concert conductor as in the theatre; and (this will indeed be appreciated here in Boston) he is particularly successful as a programme maker. A performance of the colossal Ninth Symphony in 1882 is said to have been the most magnificent ever given; while the superb manner in which he conducted the concerts of the last "Tonkünstler-Versammlung" in 1883 brought him a profusion of orders and decorations from all over the country. He also conducted on many occasions in the Gewandhaus as Reinicke's substitute, and has also given many remarkably successful concerts with his own theatre orchestra. More especially noteworthy, is the manner in which he conducted the recent monster concerts of the Liszt Society. With them he achieved a success which caused all the noted German critics to acknowledge that Arthur Nikisch is one of the most brilliant and talented living conductors, both in the theatre and on the concert stage.

He has received countless offers to leave Leipsic. Frankfort, Vienna, Cassel, Carlsruhe, and Mannheim have all vied with one another in unsuccessful attempts to induce him to leave his beloved Leipsic; but it seems reserved for the most important art city of the New World to have finally overcome his scruples, and induced him to conquer new fields.

The musical world of Leipsic is in genuine distress, for they feel only to keenly that it will be impossible to replace him. He has earned a place in the great quartet of conductors,—Richter, Levy, Mottl, and Nikisch,—and between these four geniuses and the second flight there is a wide gap. But Leipsic's loss is our gain, and it remains only for the Boston public to show genuine appreciation of the good fortune which has given the local musical world a man whose artistic footsteps can be safely followed without any fear of a misstep."

THE PERSONNEL.

The liberal policy of the founder and the exacting requirements of the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his predecessors have resulted in the assembling of a body of artists of unusual ability, well-fitted to sustain the high standard of the organization.

Originally made up of the best available players of Boston and New York, each year the Orchestra has been strengthened by the acquisition of superior performers wherever they could be found, until it is now everywhere conceded that no such company has before been brought together in this country.

In its ranks may be found representatives from the leading orchestras of Vienna, Leipsic, Berlin. Paris, and London.

At the head of the Violins as Concertmeister is Mr. Franz Kneisel, who is ably supported by a corps of players, every member of which is a solo artist.

The leading 'Cellist is Mr. Anton Hekking, a newcomer of whom flattering accounts are heard.

Patrons of the concerts will remember with pleasure the brilliant playing on Flute and Oboe of Messrs. Molé and Sautet, who came two years ago from the Opera Comique, Paris. Other prominent players among the wind instruments are Mr. Xaver Reiter, First Horn, Mr. Pierre Müller, First Trumpet, late of the Lamoureux Orchestra, Paris, and Mr. Goldsmidt, First Clarinet. In every department the Orchestra has been brought as near as possible to ideal perfection.

THE SOLOIST.

With the intention of making the soloist an attractive feature of the coming concert, an engagement has been effected with MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON, the gifted young Contralto.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinees.

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria.....
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantaisie for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs with piano.....
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisel would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

The New-York Times,

Sunday, November 10,

Herr Arthur Nikisch's programme for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was a fine lesson in the growth and development of the symphonic form. It consisted of a Haydn symphony in G, a Mozart symphony, in G minor, and Beethoven's great fifth.

First "Young People's Popular" is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season's "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times,

Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

THE MUSICAL COU

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBE

ONE of the members of the Boston Sy chestra and one of the best musicians writes to THE MUSICAL COURIER about Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not kn during your stay in Europe you had an occ come acquainted with our new conductor, fore take this chance to tell you that he charming man, who would soon become as to you as he has become to all of us. He traordinarily beloved by the orchestra, an pearance will ever remain so. As for his artist, it would seem superfluous to add my those of others, as you no doubt have been informed on this subject, and as you, mo soon have a chance to judge for yourself, indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, from week to week more interested in stud Nikisch, and to note how differently he inte positions from what we have hitherto been to perform them. What he has so far d unquestionably that he is an artist of most individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS AND VARIOUS MUSICAL AUTHORITIES.

H. E. KREHBIEL in New York Tribune.

"Herr Nikisch is the kind of Conductor who gives people who can think something to think about. He troubles the musical waters with his baton and will not have them stagnate. He belongs to the younger set of Conductors who are putting an end to the old music-box style of performance. He is an interpreter, expounder, commentator; but he lets the instruments inspired by the men executing his will make the publication. He invites a fortissimo by a wave of his wand, but he does not act the fortissimo for the edification of the audience. He uses no music but he makes no parade of the fact.

His gestures are incisive and full of nervous energy, but not sweeping. * * *

He does not obtrude his signs of expression upon the public, though he uses them freely; his men know his intentions before they come before the people. He directs his men, controls and sways them; they are his agents of expression, the vehicles of his emotional proclamation. They follow him boldly in the wildest charge, for he neglects no cue. He is a leader whom it is safe to follow."

W. S. HENDERSON in New York Times.

"Mr. Nikisch unquestionably possesses in addition to his command as a disciplinarian a rich and generous warmth of temperament. He has a sympathetic appreciation of the composer's feelings that reaches backward across the years and becomes instinct with a vitality that seems contemporaneous with the birth of the work in the composer's mind. This is the highest tribute that can be paid to a Conductor. It is a quality which he shares with a master-actor who reveals to us the soul of a dramatic poem. This is what Mr. Nikisch does for a composition. He finds its soul. * * * *

It is a happy thing not only for Boston, but for America, that there is a Col. Higginson to keep such an Orchestra together, to retain it for the continued production of thoroughly rehearsed performances, and for the complete and satisfactory exposition of its Conductor's conceptions. It is another happy thing that so strong a leader has been found for this musical battalion. Mr. Nikisch is undeniably the man to take up the work which Mr. Gericke has laid down and carry it forward to new and grander heights."

CARL ZERRAHN.

"Mr. Nikisch is not a drill-master. He is a Conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

"Mr. Nikisch is certainly a Conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years."

B. J. LANG.

"No fear that the Orchestra can deteriorate: quite the contrary. I cannot doubt that a man of luminous talent and ability has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's Orchestra."

J. K. PAINE.

"Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fine expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

LOWELL OPERA HOUSE,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Euryanthe." . . . . WEBER

ARIA. "Samson and Dalila." . . . . SAINT-SAËNS
MISS FINLAYSON.

KOMARINSKAJA. FANTASIE for ORCHESTRA on two Russian Folk Songs. . . . GLINKA
BRIDAL SONG.
DANCE.

SONGS with PIANO.
a) I'LL NOT COMPLAIN. . . . . SCHUMANN
b) SPRING NIGHT. . . . . SCHUMANN
MISS FINLAYSON.

SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) . . . MENDELSSOHN
Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.—
Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinees.

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria.....
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon"
.....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs with piano.....
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisel would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

New-York Times,

November 10.

Herr Nikisch's programme for the ... the Boston Symphony Orches... last night, was a fine les... development of the ...

First "Young People's Popular" is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season's "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Molé; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times,

Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

THE MUSICAL COUR

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER

ONE of the members of the Boston Sym... chestra and one of the best musicians o... writes to THE MUSICAL COURIER about ... Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not know ... during your stay in Europe you had an occas... come acquainted with our new conductor, an... fore take this chance to tell you that he i... charming man, who would soon become as sy... to you as he has become to all of us. He is ... traordinarily beloved by the orchestra, and ... pearance will ever remain so. As for his me... artist, it would seem superfluous to add my jud... those of others, as you no doubt have been s... informed on this subject, and as you, more ... soon have a chance to judge for yourself. ... indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, b... from week to week more interested in study... Nikisch, and to note how differently he interp... positions from what we have hitherto been ac... to perform them. What he has so far don... unquestionably that he is an artist of most pr... individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS AND VARIOUS MUSICAL AUTHORITIES.

H. E. KREHBIEL in New York Tribune.

"Herr Nikisch is the kind of Conductor who gives people who can think something to think about. He troubles the musical waters with his baton and will not have them stagnate. He belongs to the younger set of Conductors who are putting an end to the old music-box style of performance. He is an interpreter, expounder, commentator; but he lets the instruments inspired by the men executing his will make the publication. He invites a fortissimo by a wave of his wand, but he does not act the fortissimo for the edification of the audience. He uses no music but he makes no parade of the fact.

His gestures are incisive and full of nervous energy, but not sweeping. * * *

He does not obtrude his signs of expression upon the public, though he uses them freely; his men know his intentions before they come before the people. He directs his men, controls and sways them; they are his agents of expression, the vehicles of his emotional proclamation. They follow him boldly in the wildest charge, for he neglects no cue. He is a leader whom it is safe to follow."

W. S. HENDERSON in New York Times.

"Mr. Nikisch unquestionably possesses in addition to his command as a disciplinarian a rich and generous warmth of temperament. He has a sympathetic appreciation of the composer's feelings that reaches backward across the years and becomes instinct with a vitality that seems contemporaneous with the birth of the work in the composer's mind. This is the highest tribute that can be paid to a Conductor. It is a quality which he shares with a master-actor who reveals to us the soul of a dramatic poem. This is what Mr. Nikisch does for a composition. He finds its soul. * * * *

It is a happy thing not only for Boston, but for America, that there is a Col. Higginson to keep such an Orchestra together, to retain it for the continued production of thoroughly rehearsed performances, and for the complete and satisfactory exposition of its Conductor's conceptions. It is another happy thing that so strong a leader has been found for this musical battalion. Mr. Nikisch is undeniably the man to take up the work which Mr. Gericke has laid down and carry it forward to new and grander heights."

CARL ZERRAHN.

"Mr. Nikisch is not a drill-master. He is a Conductor after my own heart. He meets all my ideas. I am more than satisfied. He is splendid."

BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

"Mr. Nikisch is certainly a Conductor from head to sole, and Boston may be proud of having secured him for a term of years."

B. J. LANG.

"No fear that the Orchestra can deteriorate: quite the contrary. I cannot doubt that a man of luminous talent and ability has come to conduct Mr. Higginson's Orchestra."

J. K. PAINE.

"Mr. Nikisch conducts with great freedom and fine expression, and with a fine conception of the works as well as with marked sympathy. He is altogether a very superior and masterly conductor."

LOWELL OPERA HOUSE,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Euryanthe." . . . . WEBER

ARIA. "Samson and Dalila." . . . . SAINT-SAENS

MISS FINLAYSON.

KOMARINSKAJA. FANTASIE for ORCHESTRA on two Russian Folk Songs. . . . GLINKA BRIDAL SONG.
DANCE

SONGS with PIANO.
a) I'LL NOT COMPLAIN. . . . SCHUMANN
b) SPRING NIGHT. . . . SCHUMANN

MISS FINLAYSON.

SYMPHONY in A. (Italian.) . . . MENDELSSOHN
Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.—
Con moto moderato.—Saltarello.

SOLOIST:

MISS FLORENCE FINLAYSON.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1889

The first "Young People's Popular" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday, Nov. 13, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch conducting, and Mme. Carl Alves and M. Molé as soloists. The advance sale of tickets has been very large, and the concert promises to be very highly successful. The programme, which follows, could hardly have been better selected; it is attractive and varied, and yet thoroughly in keeping with the object of these matinees.

Overture, "Barber of Seville" . . . . . Rossini
Aria . . . . .
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried Idyl . . . . . Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance" . . . . . Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantaise for flute and Orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon" . . . . . Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs with piano . . . . .
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" . . . . . Wagner

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889

The expected cry that the gentleness of Herr Nikisch was notable in the lack of precision of the Symphony orchestra's execution is already up and about, in good, healthy condition. If there be more than report in it, it is proof that the only way to get the best of work out of the artists is to treat them like school boys, and discipline them. There have been rumors in past generations that man was only an overgrown boy, but there has been some prejudice against accepting the conclusion as conclusive.

I am told that one of the most amiable conductors—in Germany where amiable conductors are very scarce—has a concert meister who is not in the least averse to rushing across the platform and punching another musician's head, and that in that way the amiable leader has a wonderfully well-trained orchestra. Now one could not expect that Kneisel would do anything of that sort, but it might be advisable for Mr. Higginson to employ a disciplinarian as well as a musician. Now there is John L. Here he is out of purse, and out of luck, and he would be able to enforce order. It is only an humble suggestion, but it ought to be endorsed by those who are so much in a hurry to announce that if Herr Nikisch does not look out he will lose the hold on his orchestra, and instead of inartistic freedom, have no unity at all.

The New-York Times,

Sunday, November 10,

Herr Arthur Nikisch's programme for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night, was a fine lesson in the growth and development of the symphonic form. It consisted of a Haydn symphony in G, a Mozart symphony, in G minor, and Beethoven's great fifth.

First "Young People's Popular" is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto of repute from New York, and Moss Charles Mole will appear as soloists. Mr. Nikisch announces the following programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; (a) Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) Mons. Mole; Songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The first of the season's "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, will be given on Wednesday afternoon, when the programme will be: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; aria, Mme. Alves; Siegfried idyll, Wagner; (b) "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; concert fantaise for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman, (first time) M. Mole; songs with piano, Mme. Alves; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

The New-York Times,

Sunday, November 10,

LIVE MUSICAL TOPICS.

Listening to Mr. Thomas's smooth, metronomic reading of the "Siegfried Idyl" and comparing it with the intensely dramatic, almost vocal treatment of the "Meistersinger" vorspiel by Arthur Nikisch, the idea was irresistibly suggested that a bold and effective tempo rubato was not inconsistent with a faithful adherence to metronome marks. The truth, as is usually the case with truth, is simple enough. There is no reason for supposing that a metronome mark is intended to apply to every bar and to every crotchet or quaver in it. The mark is merely a guide to the general tempo, and dramatic accelerations, retardations, or holds may be introduced in the proper places without interfering with the general pace of the movement.

THE MUSICAL COUR

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER

ONE of the members of the Boston Sym chestra and one of the best musicians writes to THE MUSICAL COURIER about Arthur Nikisch as follows: "I do not kno during your stay in Europe you had an occas come acquainted with our new conductor, an fore take this chance to tell you that he charming man, who would soon become as sy to you as he has become to all of us. He is traordinarily beloved by the orchestra, and pearance will ever remain so. As for his m artist, it would seem superfluous to add my ju those of others, as you no doubt have been s informed on this subject, and as you, more soon have a chance to judge for yourself. indeed, not less rehearsals than heretofore, b from week to week more interested in study Nikisch, and to note how differently he inter positions from what we have hitherto been ac to perform them. What he has so far don unquestionably that he is an artist of most pr individuality."

EXTRA SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The "young people's popular" to be given next Wednesday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be an event of great interest, and to many who failed to secure seats for the regular series presents an opportunity to hear the orchestra to exceptional advantage.

An admirable programme of light music is announced, introducing as soloists Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto who has won an enviable reputation in New York, and Mons. Molé, the eminent flute virtuoso. Reserved seats may be secured now at Music Hall.

[18]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1889.

SYMPHONIC NOTES.

What the Concerts of Today and Tomorrow Intend to Teach.

The programme of this afternoon and tomorrow evening deserves a few words of explanation in advance. It is intended to show at a glance, or rather at a single hearing, the development of symphony. The symphony, according to the post-Haydnite meaning of the term, is an orchestral sonata in four movements, naturally of larger form than the piano sonata, but built upon the same model. Its first movement (the true "sonata" or "allegro" form) had its origin in the old sonatas of Corelli, and this form is at times extended to the other movements, particularly the finale. Briefly described to the untechnical reader its shape is as follows: A chief theme, which is generally rapid, and of marked rhythm and definite figures—a second theme in contrast to the first, and in a different key—a closing theme (or more than one), concise and short, and with a well-marked cadence. All these divisions are then repeated in order to impress them well upon the mind of the auditor.

Now comes the important part of the movement, the keynote of the allegro form—the development. This is a thematic treatment of any or all of the themes which have been given; that is to say, the figures of the melodies are combined in new ways and in various keys so as to produce entirely new musical effects, and sometimes new themes. It is in the matter of development that the greatest progress will be evident in the three symphonies given in this programme. Note the simplicity and brevity of this division in the Haydn symphony, and the grand development of the first four notes of the Beethoven work, as well as the ingenious treatment of the notes given by the horn at the beginning of the second theme in this same division. After the development the melodies alluded to above are played through again, and then comes a coda. The coda too, will show the progress of symphonic construction. With Haydn it was slight and unimportant, with Mozart more extended, but with Beethoven it became a real chinox, an epitome of the movement. Note in the coda of the fifth symphony, first movement, how the imperative character of the first four notes of the movement is subtly changed into a timid and questioning phrase, and how at its end it thunders forth in power and majesty again.

Thus much about the most important first movement. The idea of the combination of various movements together in contrast, which is the characteristic of the symphony as a whole, came not from the old (pre Haydnite) sonata, but from the suite, which combined various dances of dissimilar character, in pleasant contrast; but while the suite was entirely in one key, the symphony is permitted to leave the original key in its second and sometimes in its third movement.

The general order of symphonic movements is first, an allegro of some kind, with development; second, a slow movement; third, a playful movement; fourth, a brilliant finale. This order is, however, not inimitable, particularly the two interior movements can change places, but in general it is safe to say that the first movement is the intellectual one, the second the emotional or romantic, the third the popular, and the last the bravura one.

The finale with Haydn and Mozart was generally a genial movement, its brightness probably being a reflection of the jollity of the old Gigue which ended the suite, but Beethoven made it more powerful, earnest and gigantic. Haydn composed nearly 150 symphonies, Mozart 49 and Beethoven 9, since the rather tawdry Battle Symphony is not numbered with this immortal sisterhood. The above points of analysis may seem mere platitudes to our musician readers, and perhaps an apology should be made to them for explaining things which they probably know already, but to the laity these details, crude as they are, may give some clues by which more thoroughly to understand this educational concert, which no true music-lover can afford to miss.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 13.

Extra Performance by the Symphony Orchestra Today.

The first "young people's popular," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be given at Music Hall this afternoon. The programme offered by Mr. Nikisch includes the overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini: "Siegfried Idyll," Wagner: "Invitations to Dance," Weber, and the overture "Rienzi," Wagner. Mme. Alves will contribute two vocal numbers and Mr. Mole will perform a fantasie for flute on themes from "Oberon." The opportunity of having light music played by such an organization does not often present itself, and the concert will doubtless attract a great audience.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 13, 1889.

TODAY'S SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The first "Young People's Popular" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall this afternoon. An interesting feature will be the first appearance in this city of Mme. Alves, a contralto singer, who has gained an enviable reputation in New York. Mr. Nikisch offers the following attractive programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Aria, "Samson and Delila," Saint Saëns; Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demerssemann; songs with piano; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The program of the fourth concert was as follows:

Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"
Weber.....Air, "Euryanthe"
Mr. Fischer.
Arthur Bird.....Two Episodes for Orchestra (MS.)
(a) Scene Orientale.
(b) Intermezzo and Trio.
(First time in Boston).
Litolff.....Song, "Resignation"
Schumann.....Romance from "Spanish Love Songs"
Mr. Fischer.
Volkmann.....2d Symphony

With the exception of the two songs sung by Mr. Emil Fischer with pianoforte accompaniment, the program was an interesting one; it was varied, it excited attention, and the different numbers were warmly applauded by the great audience.

It is true that Mr. Nikisch in the Weber overture apparently paid but slight attention to the metronomic indications of tempo given by Weber himself; notably in the second motive and in the fugato where the theme is propounded by the double-basses and 'cellos. That the overture gained by this treatment in beauty and effect, no thoughful person of trained musical feeling will deny. And singularly enough Weber himself comes to the rescue of Mr. Nikisch; for "Euryanthe" was brought out in Leipzig in 1824; and during the rehearsals Musik-director Praeger of that town wrote the author in regard to the proper "tempi." In a long letter in reply Weber first speaks of the duties of a conductor toward the singers. He then says, "The tempo should not be a 'mill-hammer' tyrannically restraining or urging on, but it should be to the piece of music what the beating of the pulse is to the life of man. There is no slow movement in which passages do not occur where a quicker movement is demanded so as to prevent a sensation of 'dragging.' There is no presto which does not require a quiet interpretation of many passages, so that the expression will not be destroyed by too much haste." After having given some examples, among them one from Spontini's "Vestal," he sums up the matter as follows: "We have in music no means of clearly pointing out these things. These rest alone in the breast of the man who feels, and if they are not to be found there, the metronome which protects only from gross mistakes will be of no avail, neither would be of any assistance the very imperfect indications which I in the richness of the material at hand should try to express more fully, did not past experience force itself upon me and warn me; in consequence of which I now regard such indications as superfluous and unprofitable, and I fear them, since they are liable to be misunderstood." Weber wrote thus in reference to the proper production of "Euryanthe." Is it probable that he would have been startled or shocked at the performance of it under Mr. Nikisch? No, he would have applauded heartily, and he would have patted the shoulders of the horn players.

Mr. Fischer sang from the same opera, the air of Lysiart, "Wo berg ich mich." This is a difficult and in many respects ungrateful aria; it is so long and makes such demands upon the voice that when given in Germany, certain measures are sometimes cut out. Great as was the talent of Weber in certain directions, such as dramatic instinct and expression, invention in instrumental effects, his voice parts are often stiff and unsingable. As a detached piece of music, as a concert selection, the aria in question is long-winded and uninteresting; and Mr. Fischer, who was evidently not "in voice," labored faithfully from recitative to final vivace. It is the fashion now to extol "Euryanthe" at the expense of Weber's other operas; to call it "epoch making"; and the disciples of Wagner really condescend to occasionally listen to an act or two. For the student of the growth of opera, it certainly is an interesting work. "Euryanthe" and Marschner's "Templar and Jewess" led to "Lohengrin." Indeed there are situations in each which are almost the exact prototypes of scenes in the latter opera. But "Euryanthe" failed at the start and all late attempts to gain a reversal of that judgment have been only partly successful. Weber wrote one great opera, "Der Freischutz."

The songs by Litolff and Schumann were a weariness to the flesh and spirit, and they were sung by Mr. Fischer in a solemn and perfunctory manner. Mr. Fischer, to whom nature gave a fine deep bass, has of late preferred roles which seem rather adapted to a baritone. It is seven years ago since I first heard him; and although he may have gained in dramatic force (for at that time his acting was most conventional), his voice is sadly changed; certain mannerisms which could have easily been repressed have become more disagreeable; and it looks as though in a year or two, he would join the ranks of the German "intellectual singers," who have a "noble conception of what Wagner meant,"—but they do not sing.

Arthur Bird is an American of talent who has lived for many years in Germany. The two manuscript compositions however smack of the Russian-French school. While their musical thought is by no means deep, the two works are melodious and of charming instrumentation. The first, an "Orientale," is perhaps the more original. It is scored for a very full orchestra, and each instrument contributes cunningly to the general effect, though, as has been pointed out, the peculiar use of the oboes is not new. The chief motive is a haunting melody full of languid voluptuousness. The curious and interesting part given to the harp was admirably played. The Intermezzo was not so original in subject or in treatment. The two compositions were led and played with the greatest care, and they were heartily applauded.

The symphony of the evening was Volkmann's in B flat. It perhaps might be more appropriately called, "Hungarian Suite." As a whole, it is an interesting composition which pleases for the moment and leaves no deep impression. The most striking number is the "Allegretto"; but the third movement, beginning with a sort of folk song for the oboe charmingly played by Mr. Sautet, is not without great beauty, which is rather enhanced than diminished by the "exhibition of pedantry" complained of by some. Perhaps the symphony as a whole suffers from a lack of sufficient variety of rhythm.

The program for this evening consists of symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The idea of thus showing the historical development of the symphony is not original with Mr. Nikisch. We should be thankful to him, however, for giving us an opportunity of hearing the symphony in G minor, that perfect work of the divine Mozart.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 13, 1889.

TODAY'S MATINEE AT MUSIC HALL.

The first extra matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this afternoon. A feature of the concert will be the first appeaaance in this city of Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto singer who has won an enviable reputation in New York. Mr. Molé, the first flute of the orchestra, will also contribute a solo number. The programme appears in full in the advertisement.

The Symphony Concerts and Mr. Nikisch's Programmes—Otto Hegner's Second Boston Appearance—"The Golah" and Francis Wilson Coming—News, Gossip and Comment.

The fifth of the season's symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, had for a programme the following:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

Mr. Nikisch has stated that his only desire is to present such programmes at these concerts as the patrons of the season desire, and he finds a justification in the course he has pursued in the large audiences and great applause which have been characteristic of the eight public performances of the orchestra already given. Unfortunately, Mr. Nikisch has not yet come to properly appreciate the politeness of Boston audiences. He will in time come to distinguish between the complimentary applause of his patrons and that which honestly expresses their appreciation. In last evening's programme he, however, hit upon a happy scheme to disarm criticism upon his action in one particular. The proper position of the symphony in these progammes has been a subject of discussion among local critics for several seasons. It has been held that the symphony should begin the programme, that it should end it, and that it should be put in the middle of the selections. All parties were recognized in last evening's arrangement, so Mr. Nikisch must be credited with at least one successful effort in programme making. Every appeal for lighter and better constructed programmes in these concerts is met invariably in certain quarters with a certain amount of ridicule, and the serious character of the programmes is defended as if the symphony concerts made a department of Harvard University, where only the tastes of the most studious devotees of music should be recognized. The public, however, is not exclusively composed of musical students, and it is unfair to ignore the demands of any large proportion of the patrons of these concerts. Messrs. Zerrahn, Henschel, Thomas, Bernhard Listemann and Neuendorff have always recognized the existence of other than musical students in preparing their most classical programmes, and Mr. Nikisch will do well to make a study of these competent conductors, rather than to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor.

In the playing of the three symphonies of last evening, Mr. Nikisch was at his best in his reading of that by Haydn, to which he gave his most intelligent direction, and brought out all its simple, easily comprehended beauties with remarkable success. The largo movement showed the excellence of the 'celli players in the most admirable fashion, and throughout the opening symphony of the evening the orchestra and its leader gave the utmost satisfaction. In the Mozart symphony, there was less cause to commend the new conductor, the graceful, romantic ideas of the composer being, at times, given far too pronounced a rendering to please those familiar with earlier performances of the work under local directors. The great fifth symphony took on a strange and surprising character in the interpretation it received on this occasion. It has had many performances here by musicians who have won the respect of American audiences by their eminent abilities. None of these have found the hidden meaning of its composer which Mr. Nikisch appears to have discovered. It may be that Mr. Nikisch is entirely right, and he certainly got an indorsement of his ideas from last evening's audience. Yet, it is at least an open question whether such a performance of this symphony will find general acceptance here. Next week the programme is as follows: Cherubini, overture, "Anacreon"; Eckert, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, Norwegian rhapsody; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra; Goetz, symphony in E; soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Magnificent Programme of Classical Music—The Hegner Matinee.

If a proof were needed that Boston has become absolutely classical in its musical tastes, that proof was given last Friday and Saturday. A programme consisting entirely of symphonic music and the house crowded both at rehearsal and concert with enthusiastic audiences—that is an event which is new in the musical annals even of Boston. Yet the concert could under no circumstances have been a dull one, for the three symphonies were not only melodious in themselves, but were in admirable contrast with each other. The wit who said that "the duller any music is, the more classical it becomes," would have found the point of his jest sadly blunted had he been at Saturday's concert. Mr. Nikisch is to be congratulated on having achieved a threefold purpose; he has shown the progress of symphony in a most agreeable object lesson; he has demonstrated that the great public is deeply interested in the higher forms; and he has abundantly proved that in a well selected programme, classical music is pleasing even in the popular sense. After all, much of the classical repertoire (in homophonic style) is popular music given in a more extended and symmetrical form.

The performance was very effective, but not entirely equal. Best of all, in the rendering, was the Haydn symphony in G, which began the programme. Mr. Nikisch in this thoroughly caught up the simplicity and directness of style which is characteristic of the father of instrumental form. He also showed a keen comprehension of the conservative character of the tempi of the earlier part of the classical epoch. With Hadyn and Mozart an allegro was less rapid, an adagio less languishing than with us, and this effect was faithfully reproduced, except that the development in the first movement was a trifle fast and furious—for Haydn. The largo was read and played to perfection. The minuet, possessing all the elements of a country dance, even to the musette-like drone-bass of the trio, was altogether charming. The finale could not fail to capture the audience, for in the early symphonic days this movement, corresponding to the gigue which ended the suite (from which the symphony was evolved) was always jovial and merry, and this work certainly formed no exception to the rule.

Then came the sweetest, purest, and most tender of all Mozart's symphonies—the one in G minor, far more in place here than the grand Jupiter symphony (composed at the same time) would have been. The development of the chief theme, in the first movement, was splendidly given, the contrabasses and violoncellos doing especially excellent work. Not less beautiful was the soulful andante, and in the trio of the minuet the wood wind instruments shaded their passages in a memorable manner. The dainty imitations of the finale, a thoroughly Mozartish example of figure treatment, were also finely given. In scarcely any part of the programme could one follow the change of symphonic structure better than in the finales of the three symphonies given. The Haydn finale, as above intimated, was jovial, the finale of the Mozart symphony, although not yet of the grand or intense style which obtained later, was yet not so entirely merry as the older type of ending, while the finale of the fifth symphony was lofty and heroic to the last degree.

The performance of the fifth symphony was the part of the programme which evoked the greatest enthusiasm, but here at least I must in great part dissent from the popular verdict. The work has been better performed in Boston on more than one occasion. Its first movement was inflated, theatrical, bombastic in the highest degree. The very first phrase was read with a pause on its fourth note that was distressingly prolonged, and the famous figure was not played with unity by the orchestra either. Beethoven said of this figure: "Thus Destiny knocks at the door"; but that final note was as if Destiny were trying to kick the door in.

At the beginning of the second theme the horn gave a fierce blast that could scarcely be represented by less than four f's, but in the development, where this same figure is tossed in a fragmentary state from string to wind instruments and back again, the performance was exquisite. The oboe phrase at the recapitulation of the chief theme, was finely given also, but in the coda bizarrerie again held sway. The andante was made rather too pronounced in its contrasts, and was roughly played although applauded to the echo. The scherzo was good again, although the second subject, upon the horn was unnecessarily ferocious. The bassoon did excellent work both in this and the preceding movement. The finale was very effective (and I must decidedly praise the transition to it, from the scherzo), for it is the most heroic and warlike part of the whole work—far more heroic in fact than the end of the Heroic Symphony—and it bore Mr. Nikisch's treatment "in King Cambyses vein" very well indeed. It aroused the audience to overwhelming applause, and in this case the enthusiasm was merited. One must not forget to mention the wonderful playing of the contrabasses in the trio of the scherzo. It was something for the artists and the conductor to be proud of.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

FRIDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1889.

SYMPHONIC NOTES.

What the Concerts of Today and Tomorrow Intend to Teach.

The programme of this afternoon and tomorrow evening deserves a few words of explanation in advance. It is intended to show at a glance, or rather at a single hearing, the development of symphony. The symphony, according to the post-Haydnite meaning of the term, is an orchestral sonata in four movements, naturally of larger form than the piano sonata, but built upon the same model. Its first movement (the true "sonata" or "allegro" form) had its origin in the old sonatas of Corelli, and this form is at times extended to the other movements, particularly the finale. Briefly described to the untechnical reader its shape is as follows: A chief theme, which is generally rapid, and of marked rhythm and definite figures—a second theme in contrast to the first, and in a different key—a closing theme (or more than one), concise and short, and with a well-marked cadence. All these divisions are then repeated in order to impress them well upon the mind of the auditor.

Now comes the important part of the movement, the keynote of the allegro form—the development. This is a thematic treatment of any or all of the themes which have been given; that is to say, the figures of the melodies are combined in new ways and in various keys so as to produce entirely new musical effects, and sometimes new themes. It is in the matter of development that the greatest progress will be evident in the three symphonies given in this programme. Note the simplicity and brevity of this division in the Haydn symphony, and the grand development of the first four notes of the Beethoven work, as well as the ingenious treatment of the notes given by the horn at the beginning of the second theme in this same division. After the development the melodies alluded to above are played through again, and then comes a coda. The coda too, will show the progress of symphonic construction. With Haydn it was slight and unimportant, with Mozart more extended, but with Beethoven it became a real chinox, an epitome of the movement. Note in the coda of the fifth symphony, first movement, how the imperative character of the first four notes of the movement is subtly changed into a timid and questioning phrase, and how at its end it thunders forth in power and majesty again.

Thus much about the most important first movement. The idea of the combination of various movements together in contrast, which is the characteristic of the symphony as a whole, came not from the old (pre Haydnite) sonata, but from the suite, which combined various dances of dissimilar character, in pleasant contrast; but while the suite was entirely in one key, the symphony is permitted to leave the original key in its second and sometimes in its third movement.

The general order of symphonic movements is first, an allegro of some kind, with development; second, a slow movement; third, a playful movement; fourth, a brilliant finale. This order is, however, not inimitable, particularly the two interior movements can change places, but in general it is safe to say that the first movement is the intellectual one, the second the emotional or romantic, the third the popular, and the last the bravura one.

The finale with Haydn and Mozart was generally a genial movement, its brightness probably being a reflection of the jollity of the old Gigue which ended the suite, but Beethoven made it more powerful, earnest and gigantic. Haydn composed nearly 150 symphonies, Mozart 49 and Beethoven 9, since the rather tawdry Battle Symphony is not numbered with this immortal sisterhood. The above points of analysis may seem mere platitudes to our musician readers, and perhaps an apology should be made to them for explaining things which they probably know already, but to the laity these details, crude as they are, may give some clues by which more thoroughly to understand this educational concert, which no true music-lover can afford to miss.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 13.

Extra Performance by the Symphony Orchestra Today.

The first "young people's popular," by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be given at Music Hall this afternoon. The programme offered by Mr. Nikisch includes the overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini: "Siegfried Idyll," Wagner; "Invitations to Dance," Weber, and the overture "Rienzi," Wagner. Mme. Alves will contribute two vocal numbers and Mr. Mole will perform a fantasie for flute on themes from "Oberon." The opportunity of having light music played by such an organization does not often present itself, and the concert will doubtless attract a great audience.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 13, 1889.

TODAY'S SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The first "Young People's Popular" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall this afternoon. An interesting feature will be the first appearance in this city of Mme. Alves, a contralto singer, who has gained an enviable reputation in New York. Mr. Nikisch offers the following attractive programme: Overture, "Barber of Seville," Rossini; Aria, "Samson and Delila," Saint Saëns; Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Berlioz; Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon," Demersseman; songs with piano; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The program of the fourth concert was as follows:

Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"
Weber.....Air, "Euryanthe"
Mr. Fischer.
Arthur Bird.....Two Episodes for Orchestra (MS.)
(a) Scene Orientale.
(b) Intermezzo and Trio.
(First time in Boston).
Litolff.....Song, "Resignation"
Schumann.....Romance from "Spanish Love Songs"
Mr. Fischer.
Volkmann.....2d Symphony

With the exception of the two songs sung by Mr. Emil Fischer with pianoforte accompaniment, the program was an interesting one; it was varied, it excited attention, and the different numbers were warmly applauded by the great audience.

It is true that Mr. Nikisch in the Weber overture apparently paid but slight attention to the metronomic indications of tempo given by Weber himself; notably in the second motive and in the fugato where the theme is propounded by the double-basses and 'cellos. That the overture gained by this treatment in beauty and effect, no thoughful person of trained musical feeling will deny. And singularly enough Weber himself comes to the rescue of Mr. Nikisch; for "Euryanthe" was brought out in Leipzig in 1824; and during the rehearsals Musik-director Praeger of that town wrote the author in regard to the proper "tempi." In a long letter in reply Weber first speaks of the duties of a conductor toward the singers. He then says, "The tempo should not be a 'mill-hammer' tyrannically restraining or urging on, but it should be to the piece of music what the beating of the pulse is to the life of man. There is no slow movement in which passages do not occur where a quicker movement is demanded so as to prevent a sensation of 'dragging.' There is no presto which does not require a quiet interpretation of many passages, so that the expression will not be destroyed by too much haste." After having given some examples, among them one from Spontini's "Vestal," he sums up the matter as follows: "We have in music no means of clearly pointing out these things. These rest alone in the breast of the man who feels, and if they are not to be found there, the metronome which protects only from gross mistakes will be of no avail, neither would be of any assistance the very imperfect indications which I in the richness of the material at hand should try to express more fully, did not past experience force itself upon me and warn me; in consequence of which I now regard such indications as superfluous and unprofitable, and I fear them, since they are liable to be misunderstood." Weber wrote thus in reference to the proper production of "Euryanthe." Is it probable that he would have been startled or shocked at the performance of it under Mr. Nikisch? No, he would have applauded heartily, and he would have patted the shoulders of the horn players.

Mr. Fischer sang from the same opera, the air of Lysiart, "Wo berg ich mich." This is a difficult and in many respects ungrateful aria; it is so long and makes such demands upon the voice that when given in Germany, certain measures are sometimes cut out. Great as was the talent of Weber in certain directions, such as dramatic instinct and expression, invention in instrumental effects, his voice parts are often stiff and unsingable. As a detached piece of music, as a concert selection, the aria in question is long-winded and uninteresting; and Mr. Fischer, who was evidently not "in voice," labored faithfully from recitative to final vivace. It is the fashion now to extol "Euryanthe" at the expense of Weber's other operas; to call it "epoch making"; and the disciples of Wagner really condescend to occasionally listen to an act or two. For the student of the growth of opera, it certainly is an interesting work. "Euryanthe" and Marschner's "Templar and Jewess" led to "Lohengrin." Indeed there are situations in each which are almost the exact prototypes of scenes in the latter opera. But "Euryanthe" failed at the start and all late attempts to gain a reversal of that judgment have been only partly successful. Weber wrote one great opera, "Der Freischutz."

The songs by Litolff and Schumann were a weariness to the flesh and spirit, and they were sung by Mr. Fischer in a solemn and perfunctory manner. Mr. Fischer, to whom nature gave a fine deep bass, has of late preferred roles which seem rather adapted to a baritone. It is seven years ago since I first heard him; and although he may have gained in dramatic force (for at that time his acting was most conventional), his voice is sadly changed; certain mannerisms which could have easily been repressed have become more disagreeable; and it looks as though in a year or two, he would join the ranks of the German "intellectual singers," who have a "noble conception of what Wagner meant,"—but they do not sing.

Arthur Bird is an American of talent who has lived for many years in Germany. The two manuscript compositions however smack of the Russian-French school. While their musical thought is by no means deep, the two works are melodious and of charming instrumentation. The first, an "Orientale," is perhaps the more original. It is scored for a very full orchestra, and each instrument contributes cunningly to the general effect, though, as has been pointed out, the peculiar use of the oboes is not new. The chief motive is a haunting melody full of languid voluptuousness. The curious and interesting part given to the harp was admirably played. The Intermezzo was not so original in subject or in treatment. The two compositions were led and played with the greatest care, and they were heartily applauded.

The symphony of the evening was Volkmann's in B flat. It perhaps might be more appropriately called, "Hungarian Suite." As a whole, it is an interesting composition which pleases for the moment and leaves no deep impression. The most striking number is the "Allegretto"; but the third movement, beginning with a sort of folk song for the oboe charmingly played by Mr. Sautet, is not without great beauty, which is rather enhanced than diminished by the "exhibition of pedantry" complained of by some. Perhaps the symphony as a whole suffers from a lack of sufficient variety of rhythm.

The program for this evening consists of symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The idea of thus showing the historical development of the symphony is not original with Mr. Nikisch. We should be thankful to him, however, for giving us an opportunity of hearing the symphony in G minor, that perfect work of the divine Mozart.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 13, 1889.

TODAY'S MATINEE AT MUSIC HALL.

The first extra matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this afternoon. A feature of the concert will be the first appeaaance in this city of Mme. Carl Alves, a contralto singer who has won an enviable reputation in New York. Mr. Molé, the first flute of the orchestra, will also contribute a solo number. The programme appears in full in the advertisement.

SUNDAY HERALD

ON, NOVEMBER 10

The Symphony Concerts and Mr. Nikisch's Programmes—Otto Hegner's Second Boston Appearance—"The Oolah" and Francis Wilson Coming—News, Gossip and Comment.

The fifth of the season's symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, had for a programme the following:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

Mr. Nikisch has stated that his only desire is to present such programmes at these concerts as the patrons of the season desire, and he finds a justification in the course he has pursued in the large audiences and great applause which have been characteristic of the eight public performances of the orchestra already given. Unfortunately, Mr. Nikisch has not yet come to properly appreciate the politeness of Boston audiences. He will in time come to distinguish between the complimentary applause of his patrons and that which honestly expresses their appreciation. In last evening's programme he, however, hit upon a happy scheme to disarm criticism upon his action in one particular. The proper position of the symphony in these progammes has been a subject of discussion among local critics for several seasons. It has been held that the symphony should begin the programme, that it should end it, and that it should be put in the middle of the selections. All parties were recognized in last evening's arrangement, so Mr. Nikisch must be credited with at least one successful effort in programme making. Every appeal for lighter and better constructed programmes in these concerts is met invariably in certain quarters with a certain amount of ridicule, and the serious character of the programmes is defended as if the symphony concerts made a department of Harvard University, where only the tastes of the most studious devotees of music should be recognized. The public, however, is not exclusively composed of musical students, and it is unfair to ignore the demands of any large proportion of the patrons of these concerts. Messrs. Zerrahn, Henschel, Thomas, Bernhard Listemann and Neuendorff have always recognized the existence of other than musical students in preparing their most classical programmes, and Mr. Nikisch will do well to make a study of these competent conductors, rather than to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor.

In the playing of the three symphonies of last evening, Mr. Nikisch was at his best in his reading of that by Haydn, to which he gave his most intelligent direction, and brought out all its simple, easily comprehended beauties with remarkable success. The largo movement showed the excellence of the 'celli players in the most admirable fashion, and throughout the opening symphony of the evening the orchestra and its leader gave the utmost satisfaction. In the Mozart symphony, there was less cause to commend the new conductor, the graceful, romantic ideas of the composer being, at times, given far too pronounced a rendering to please those familiar with earlier performances of the work under local directors. The great fifth symphony took on a strange and surprising character in the interpretation it received on this occasion. It has had many performances here by musicians who have won the respect of American audiences by their eminent abilities. None of these have found the hidden meaning of its composer which Mr. Nikisch appears to have discovered. It may be that Mr. Nikisch is entirely right, and he certainly got an indorsement of his ideas from last evening's audience. Yet, it is at least an open question whether such a performance of this symphony will find general acceptance here. Next week the programme is as follows: Cherubini, overture, "Anacreon"; Eckert, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, Norwegian rhapsody; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra; Goetz, symphony in E; soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1889.

[18]

THE SYMPHONY.

A Magnificent Programme of Classical Music—The Hegner Matinee.

If a proof were needed that Boston has become absolutely classical in its musical tastes, that proof was given last Friday and Saturday. A programme consisting entirely of symphonic music and the house crowded both at rehearsal and concert with enthusiastic audiences—that is an event which is new in the musical annals even of Boston. Yet the concert could under no circumstances have been a dull one, for the three symphonies were not only melodious in themselves, but were in admirable contrast with each other. The wit who said that "the duller any music is, the more classical it becomes," would have found the point of his jest sadly blunted had he been at Saturday's concert. Mr. Nikisch is to be congratulated on having achieved a threefold purpose; he has shown the progress of symphony in a most agreeable object lesson; he has demonstrated that the great public is deeply interested in the higher forms; and he has abundantly proved that in a well selected programme, classical music is pleasing even in the popular sense. After all, much of the classical repertoire (in homophonic style) is popular music given in a more extended and symmetrical form.

The performance was very effective, but not entirely equal. Best of all, in the rendering, was the Haydn symphony in G, which began the programme. Mr. Nikisch in this thoroughly caught up the simplicity and directness of style which is characteristic of the father of instrumental form. He also showed a keen comprehension of the conservative character of the tempi of the earlier part of the classical epoch. With Hadyn and Mozart an allegro was less rapid, an adagio less languishing than with us, and this effect was faithfully reproduced, except that the development in the first movement was a trifle fast and furious—for Haydn. The largo was read and played to perfection. The minuet, possessing all the elements of a country dance, even to the musette-like drone-bass of the trio, was altogether charming. The finale could not fail to capture the audience, for in the early symphonic days this movement, corresponding to the gigue which ended the suite (from which the symphony was evolved) was always jovial and merry, and this work certainly formed no exception to the rule.

Then came the sweetest, purest, and most tender of all Mozart's symphonies—the one in G minor, far more in place here than the grand Jupiter symphony (composed at the same time) would have been. The development of the chief theme, in the first movement, was splendidly given, the contrabasses and violoncellos doing especially excellent work. Not less beautiful was the soulful andante, and in the trio of the minuet the wood wind instruments shaded their passages in a memorable manner. The dainty imitations of the finale, a thoroughly Mozartish example of figure treatment, were also finely given. In scarcely any part of the programme could one follow the change of symphonic structure better than in the finales of the three symphonies given. The Haydn finale, as above intimated, was jovial, the finale of the Mozart symphony, although not yet of the grand or intense style which obtained later, was yet not so entirely merry as the older type of ending, while the finale of the fifth symphony was lofty and heroic to the last degree.

The performance of the fifth symphony was the part of the programme which evoked the greatest enthusiasm, but here at least I must in great part dissent from the popular verdict. The work has been better performed in Boston on more than one occasion. Its first movement was inflated, theatrical, bombastic in the highest degree. The very first phrase was read with a pause on its fourth note that was distressingly prolonged, and the famous figure was not played with unity by the orchestra either. Beethoven said of this figure: "Thus Destiny knocks at the door"; but that final note was as if Destiny were trying to kick the door in.

At the beginning of the second theme the horn gave a fierce blast that could scarcely be represented by less than four f's, but in the development, where this same figure is tossed in a fragmentary state from string to wind instruments and back again, the performance was exquisite. The oboe phrase at the recapitulation of the chief theme, was finely given also, but in the coda bizarrerie again held sway. The andante was made rather too pronounced in its contrasts, and was roughly played although applauded to the echo. The scherzo was good again, although the second subject, upon the horn was unnecessarily ferocious. The bassoon did excellent work both in this and the preceding movement. The finale was very effective (and I must decidedly praise the transition to it, from the scherzo), for it is the most heroic and warlike part of the whole work—far more heroic in fact than the end of the Heroic Symphony—and it bore Mr. Nikisch's treatment "in King Cambyses vein" very well indeed. It aroused the audience to overwhelming applause, and in this case the enthusiasm was merited. One must not forget to mention the wonderful playing of the contrabasses in the trio of the scherzo. It was something for the artists and the conductor to be proud of.

MERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889.

FOURTH AND FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

ARTHUR BIRD has written Two Episodes. This unpublished work was the novelty at the Fourth Boston Symphony Concert. The first number, Oriental Scene, calls for the usual full orchestra, besides triangle, glockenspiel, piccolo, cymbals, harp. The second Episode is called Intermezzo. Both Episodes are quaint in character, and demand just such careful direction as Mr. Nikisch gave them.

Volkmann's Second Symphony, B-flat, was once before given in Boston, under Mr. Henschel; but that was six years ago, and this production made it almost a novelty. It is as brief as beautiful. The graceful Allegro Vivace leads to the saucy Allegretto, full of life and Indian Summer. Ehlert declares it symbolic of the composer's want of affinity with ordinary society. The third movement, Andantino, impresses musicians as comical, with its curious mixture of tempo, and leads abruptly to Piu Mosso (a little more so!) ending in the Allegro.

The singer was Emil Fischer, with his evenly solid voice; but his three selections were not calculated to rouse much enthusiasm: One of Schumann's Spanish Lovesongs; Litolff's Resignation; Lysiart's solo, from the second act of Weber's opera, Euryanthe, the classic overture to which had just opened the concert. No one would suspect this song to be a proclamation of diabolical vengeance.

The Fifth Symphony Concert gives us three great works: Haydn's Symphony in G; Mozart's Symphony in G minor; and Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

THIS admirable organization this year includes Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Svecenski, Anton Hekking. The first concert was given at Chickering Hall, Oct. 28, before a large audience, in which the German element was very strong and appreciative. There were two string selections, the concert opening with Volkmann's Fourth Quartet in E-minor (op. 35, according to the program, but 34 according to Grove), in which the second movement is the Scherzo. The third, the Andantino, made a vivid impression with its fine viola work.

The closing number was the quaint and beautiful Quintet in F, by Brahms, op. 88, written seven years ago, Max Zach playing the second viola. This work has been before played in part at a Kneisel concert, but not in its entirety, the third movement, Allegro Energico, being heard here for the first time, and rousing nods of emphatic admiration among the Teutonic listeners.

For a singer, sandwiched between the instrumental slices, the Quartet had Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, who won some success at the Worcester Festival, and has appeared recently at a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. Her songs were Schumann's Almond Tree; Gustav Presser's Danube; and (a greater novelty) Tuscan Song by Tyson Wolff. Mrs. Lawson was received with that kindness which Boston usually awards to strangers.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTH CONCERT.

That the symphony concert programme for last evening met with the most popular endorsement of the season thus far, as regards attendance must have at least surprised Herr Nikisch, who imposed a severe test by the character of his selections.

The symphonies performed are all so well known that it would seem supererogatory to refer in detail to their musical and scientific traits. It speaks abundantly well for the broad and sterling characteristics of Mr. Nikisch as a musician to say that the Haydn (G major, No. 13) and Mozart symphonies were conducted as in as objective, strict, and legitimate manner as the most exacting pedagogue could have desired. With that immortal monument of genius Beethoven's C minor symphony the conductor was more elastic, and his reading of the score was not so impressive of the individuality of the interpreter. It was an intensely dramatic, remarkable and exciting reading, and at its close the wildest enthusiasm prevailed. Men rose en masse and cheered the conductor, and women, in their way, were equally demonstrative. Altogether the concert was afforded one of the most illustrious triumphs of orchestral conducting and performance that has yet been witnessed in this city.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1889.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On Saturday night Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following remarkable programme to the patrons of the Symphony concerts:

Symphony in G major.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony in C minor.....Beethoven.

The widely expressed fear that the public would be "frightened" by three symphonies was not realized. On Friday afternoon the whole available standing room was sold out an hour before the doors were opened, and on Saturday evening the hall was more crowded than any concert as yet. And the enthusiasm! One could hardly believe oneself in cold and contemplative Boston, and indeed it is a great deal for a Boston audience to unanimously spring to its feet and cry out "Bravo! bravo!" Yet so they did on Saturday, and it was genuine, heart-felt and well-earned applause. The concert may be justly considered as epoch-creating in this city. The Haydn symphony (No. 13 of the Breitkopf and Härtel edition) has oddly enough never been heard here before, although it is a constant favorite on the programmes abroad. Its performance Saturday night was a revelation. It was as if the very soul of the gentle-spirited, kindly-humored old master had penetrated every nook and corner of the whole hall; with an air of bewilderment one looked and saw the orchestra in the black coats of the nineteenth century and not the powdered wigs and silk and satin splendor of an hundred years ago. Surely our hypercritical listeners can find nothing to cavil at here! No one of the older classical symphonies has ever been so perfectly rendered—so faultlessly conceived and superbly executed at these concerts, and it would be difficult to imagine how anywhere a greater perfection could be attained

The Mozart symphony was also finely rendered, and here Mr. Nikisch gave a little more modern coloring in several instances. Notably successful in its effect was the slight rallentando at the beginning of the principal theme on several occasions in the first movement, while the menuetto was nothing short of superb, and the burst of applause which followed it was a hearty indication of how the public at large appreciated the interpretation. Mr. Krehbiel, the distinguished critic of the New York Tribune, has pointed out to me the "old discovery of the parallelism (melodic but not rhythmic) between the Mozart finale and the Beethoven scherzo," which is indeed extraordinary, as the notes are absolutely the same. This was one of the many points of interest in the programme, and one could see that Mr. Nikisch had taken note of all such details. Naturally enough, the culmination of this splendid programme was reached with the fifth Beethoven symphony, and it may be said at once that so fine a performance in conception, and even more especially in execution, has never been heard in this city. Mr. Nikisch is evidently influenced by Wagner's ideas in the conception of this work, but for that heaven be praised, as at last we have heard this work played in such a manner that the listener could see what was inside the score. The noble—one may say colossal—thoughts which pervade this work were all laid bare with a master hand. Especially the first and last movements were worthy of all praise. The long holds at the opening were grandly impressive, and the famous horn passage in the first movement was given its true meaning by the slight ritard and the accented fortissimo. At the end of the first movement the applause was deafening. The romantic coloring of the andante con moto was delightful, although in one instance an unimportant passage in the second violins was exalted to a cantabile at the expense of the theme proper. The fascinating scherzo gained new beauties by the flexible rendering it received, and the last movement was simply gorgeous in its breadth and strength. This great burst of exaltation was given its true meaning—so manly and so noble—and the orchestra played as perhaps an orchestra never played before. The exceptionally difficult violin figures were as clear as crystal. The 'cellos and basses overcame all difficulties with apparent ease, and every man seemed fired with the magnetism which pervaded the whole concert. Much comment has been made here on Mr. Nikisch's short stature, but it would be difficult for any man to look more imposing and commanding than he did while conducting this movement. At the end the audience—fairly beside itself with enthusiasm—rose to its feet and broke into prolonged shouts of applause.

Of course there will be dissenters to this interpretation. Some people will always prefer a dry-as-dust pedantry to a warm and genial rendering, and it seems useless to discuss further the well-worn topic of "tradition." It has already been pointed out that the "traditions" do not come from the composers themselves, and more cannot be said. It is interesting, however, to read how Weber answered a conductor who wrote him for the tempi of "Euryanthe." Mr. Philip Hale calls attention to this in Saturday's Home Journal, and he gives the following admirable translation of Weber's reply:

> The tempo should not be a "mill-hammer" tyrannically restraining or urging on, but it should be to the piece of music what the beating of the pulse is to the life of man. There is no slow movement in which passages do not occur where a quicker movement is demanded so as to prevent a seasation of "dragging." There is no presto which does not require a quiet interpretation of many passages, so that the expression will not be destroyed by too much haste. We have in music no means of clearly pointing out these things. These rest alone in the breast of the man who feels, and if they are not to be found there, the metronome which protects only from gross mistakes will be of no avail, neither would be of any assistance the very imperfect indications which I in the richness of the material at hand should try to express more fully, did not past experience force itself upon me and warn me; in consequence of which I now regard such indications as superfluous and unprofitable, and I fear them, since they are liable to be misunderstood.

This certainly makes further discussion unnecessary in Weber's case, and there is no reason to assume that any reasonable composer would feel any differently. At all events, by far the majority of people at Saturday's concert felt that they had got to know the real Beethoven at last, and the wonderful music gained for them a thousand new beauties through Mr. Nikisch's splendid and thoughtful interpretation.

ARTHUR WELD.

[illegible] of the week. New Haven Journal

The Boston Symphony orchestra is more popular than ever under the new conductor, Arthur Nikisch of Leipsic. Several important additions to the orchestra have been made since the last appearance here. A subscription is now open at Steinert's, and on Monday, December 2, the first privileges of securing seats will be given.

Salvini at the Hyperion on Saturday evening will be the most important dramatic attraction thus far in the season. In his portrayal of Samson he has won an artistic triumph of the highest kind, a triumph which can be equaled by no one but himself. Signor Salvini has determined not again to play outside of the larger Europ[illegible] and his own theater in Florence.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Never was an educational programme put forth in so palatable a guise as in the concert of last night. Mr. Nikisch's object was to show by three symphonic works played continuously, the rise, development and culmination of the greatest instrumental form we possess. Never was a juxtaposition of composers more effective. Haydn's symphonies stand beside Beethoven's as a charming villa might stand beside a palace, in architecture, and it was most enjoyable to go from the simplicity of his development and the daintiness of his melodies to the massive thematic treatment of Beethoven. Between these two came the most pathetic and the most attractive of all Mozart's instrumental works, the symphony in G minor. It was more in place, this violet among symphonic flowers, in such a programme, than its sister work the great "Jupiter" symphony would have been, for the "Jupiter" trenches a little in its majesty, upon the ground of Beethoven, and its lofty style was exceptional even with Mozart, who was more truly represented by this less grandiose example of tenderness and purity. And Beethoven's fifth symphony was a proper example of the culmination of symphonic form, for while it has all the rugged power of the master it does not deviate from the regular form of the symphony as the great ninth symphony does, and it shows in its first movement all the power of thematic development, and after all development is the cornerstone of symphony. Then, also, it has a true Beethoven coda in its first movement, and the full use of the coda in the sonata form is one of the characteristic points in the full development of symphony. It also shows the advance in technical difficulty which marks the onward progress of the symphony. Such a contrabass passage as is found in the third movement, would have been deemed insanity in Hadyn's day, and in fact Weber did call Beethoven a bedlamite because of his audacity in the handling of these instruments.

The performance was something worthy of the occasion, and it stands to Boston's credit that the public was not dismayed by the solid, classical character of the programme and the absence of a solo artist, but crowded the hall in every part and displayed the most vivid interest in the unusual succession of symphonies. The enthusiasm at times became most emphatic, and at the close of the concert the conductor received a veritable ovation. The appreciation was well deserved in the Hadyn and Mozart works, Mr. Nikisch well understands the true tempi of the earlier classical epoch, and does not take an allegro too fast nor an adagio too slow when used by Hadyn or Mozart. The entire Hadyn symphony (with the single exception that the opening movement was a little too furious) was splendidly read and splendidly performed. The rustic, musette-like character of its minuet was charming, and the drone bass of the trio had just the right degree of prominence.

The finale, too, in which the jovial character of the Gigue, which formerly ended the suite, was reflected, had sufficient brusquerie to make it most attractive. The G minor symphony, by Mozart, scarcely began with the perfection which Mr. Gerricke used to give to the opening theme, but the appearance of the chief figure on the contrabasses and 'cellos in the development, and in fact the entire development, was excellently done. The beautiful imitations of the finale of this work were also perfectly given, and the applause which followed was abundantly earned.

But I cannot speak so eulogistically of the first movement of the fifth symphony. Mr. Gericke has given it better. In the interminably prolonged pauses upon the chief figure, in the rather rough beginning of the chief theme, the orchestra fell below its former standard, and the "knocks of destiny" became rather affected. In the beginning of the second theme, as in the same place in the third movement, the horn blew a hurricane such as I have never heard in this work. It was virility, but it was the virility of a prize-fighter rather than that of Beethoven. Nevertheless, the charming development of the second theme, where the fragments of its first figure are tossed to and fro between the strings and wind instruments, was very finely performed.

The andante was again a little too masculine and brusque. The bassoons did some praiseworthy execution in this and the next movement. The contrabasses deserved a vote of thanks from the entire audience. Not only did they do excellent work in the Mozart symphony, but they performed the terrible passage in the trio of the scherzo in a manner beyond criticism. It was inspiring to hear them. But the crowning point of the whole concert, appropriately came last. The finale of the fifth symphony is considerably more heroic than the end of the Heroic symphony, and here at least power, dynamic force, and detonating explosions, are not out of place. This part was given with a vigor beyond anything I can recall, and created a furore that was far beyond anything achieved this season. The applause here was not misplaced, and I can only add the enthusiasm of cold type to the frenzied fervor of the public. Next Saturday comes a programme brimful of novelty, and the seldom heard symphony of that unfortunate genius, H. Goetz.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1889.

Why the Symphony Musicians Laugh —A Funny Episode Up in Lowell.

The Symphony orchestra went up to Lowell Thursday night and gave a concert in the new Opera House, which, by the way, is a perfect gem of a theatre. One of the trombones, who had no part in the Italian symphony, which closed the evening's programme, sauntered out of the stage entrance just before 9 o'clock, with the intention of strolling about until the special train started for Boston at 10.15. As he passed up the street his eye was attracted by electric lights and big flaring posters announcing a performance by Cleveland's minstrels. Thinking to pass the time away, until the train started, he passed through the entrance, laid down his 50 cents at the box office window, received his blue pasteboard and went in. Imagine his surprise when he found himself in the opera house with Mr. Nikisch just starting the orchestra on the second movement of the symphony! "Charlie" is unhappy, as every one in town knows how he paid 50 cents to hear the orchestra of which he is a member, play a symphony which he knows by heart. The money was refunded on demand.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The three symphonies announced for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not deter the public from attending, for there was a very large audience, which not only listened to the symphonies with unbroken interest and manifest pleasure, but which was the most enthusiastic audience of the season thus far. It did not always "applaud in the right places," but it did so very often, and became frequently excited to a degree rare in the attendance at a symphony concert. The performances opened with Haydn's beautiful and perennially fresh symphony in G, No. 13 of the Breitkopf and Haertel edition, which, strangely enough, had not been heard at these concerts before. The programme calls it a "pretty" work, but it is more than this, for it is full of noble thoughts worked out with a flexible freedom of musical learning that is scarcely known in this day, which looks back upon Haydn with a smiling toleration, as if graceful naivete and simplicity were his only attributes. In view of Mr. Nikisch's earlier readings, it was not unreasonable to anticipate, with some alarm, that he might attempt to modernize Haydn, but such anticipations were delightfully disappointed, for he not only gave a reading that was at once sympathetic and virile, but with a most welcome absence of that sugary weakness that is too often made to pass current for Haydn. It was a brilliant and exceptionally fine piece of work from beginning to end, and, on the whole, one of the most satisfying interpretations of a Haydn symphony ever heard here. The allegros were perhaps given a little faster than Haydn intended and than the musicians of his day could have been subjected to, especially his contrabasso players; but beyond this no liberties were taken with the work that it did not bear easily and naturally. The slow movement in particular was given with exquisite expressiveness and richness of effect. The hearty applause bestowed upon the performance of this movement, and in fact of the whole symphony, was fully earned and fairly deserved. Mozart's great symphony in G minor followed and received equally fine and equally sympathetic treatment, the only fault being in the slowness with which the opening bars were taken, and the retarding of the theme whenever it appeared, which deprived the movement of much of its spirit and sparkle, and at last became monotonous and affected. The lovely andante was accorded a beautiful reading, sometimes lacking in delicacy in the performance but unexceptionable in intention. The minuet had one of the most impressive readings it had ever obtained here, and nothing could have been more in harmony with the sentiment of the finale than the interpretation it received. In fact, the performances of these two symphonies were the most gratifying successes that Mr. Nikisch had hitherto achieved with the older masters. The whole ended with Beethoven's C minor symphony. Here, however, as if to make up for the reserve and discretion he had shown toward Haydn and Mozart, Mr. Nikisch began at the very outset to modernize Beethoven. He exaggerated the opening bars in a grossly melodramatic way that made them almost absurdly sensational. The whole of the movement was broken up in respect to time, in a way and with an effect that was vulgar and tasteless, not to use so harsh a word as impertinent. Beethoven is evidently not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and besides Beethoven, as filtered through Mr. Nikisch, is by no means as interesting as Beethoven, pure and simple. An unpleasing, blatant and theatrical color was imparted to the whole symphony. It was doubtless exciting enough, and it stirred the audience to a pitch of unwonted enthusiasm; but it was regretable, none the less. There was much ritardando and much tempo rubato in the slow movement; but the effect here was not so coarse and so inappropriate as it was in the wonderful first allegro, of which the life and movement were exasperatingly distorted. It may be difficult to say what is exactly the right reading of this movement, but it is by no means as difficult to reach the conclusion that Mr. Nikisch's reading is radically a wrong one. By and by the gifted conductor will, by experience, come to the conclusion that it is wiser to read Beethoven as he is than according to some modern theory of what he ought to be. The scherzo was on the whole the best intepreted movement, and the grand break into the finale was given with magnificent largeness, but the tawdry theatrical element pervaded the reading as a whole, and, despite the amazing force and brilliancy with which it was worked up toward the end, the movement dragged by reason of the frequent breaks in the time. There were power and evident deep and careful thought in the view Mr. Nikisch presented of the work; but it was a mistaken one. Too great an effort was made to make the symphony say something that was not in it to say; to squeeze something more out of it than was found there before. To paraphrase a familiar saying, it was splendid, but it was not Beethoven. However, it pleased the audience, which manifested its delight by a storm of applause and shouts of bravo, and by calling the conductor forward several times to bow his acknowledgments; but, nevertheless, the judicious could not but grieve. At the next concert, the selections are to be overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; Concerto for violincello, Eckert; Rhapsodie Noveglenne, Svensden (first time); "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra, Bruch (first time); and Symphony in F, Goetz. The soloist will be Mr. Leo Schultz.

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., NOV. 9, 1889.

The symphony concert of last week was memorable from the fact that for the first time, this season, the name of an American composer appeared upon the programme. Two episodes for orchestra, by Arthur Bird, were given. The character of the first of these pieces is indicated by the title, "Scène Orientale." The music had the true Eastern flavor, and is thoroughly suggestive of the scene which it attempts to portray. The comparison piece, an "Intermezzo and Trio," is conceived somewhat in the vein of Mendelssohn's fairy music, at the same time reminding one of Schumann's fantastic moods, although the style is not really an imitation of either of these masters. For both cases the composer shows considerable command of orchestration, and what is still better, works out his ideas with a consistency and a thoroughness which are too often lacking in the productions of the younger men of our day. It is just this lack or consistency which is the chief fault to be found with Volkmann's symphony in B flat, also given at this concert. The themes are often striking, but the treatment of them is such that the work as a whole seems scrappy, does not hang together. The third movement alone is satisfactory in this respect, although the finale rises nearly to the same level. The performance of the symphony was all that could be desired, and the remaining orchestral number of the programme, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," was played with great brilliancy. Mr. Emil Fischer sang Lysiart's aria from the same opera, and songs by Litolff and Schumann. These selections served to exhibit the singer's magnificent voice in all its richness, but the manner of execution was rather lazy.

B. C. H.

MERICAN ART JOURNAL.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889.

FOURTH AND FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

ARTHUR BIRD has written Two Episodes. This unpublished work was the novelty at the Fourth Boston Symphony Concert. The first number, Oriental Scene, calls for the usual full orchestra, besides triangle, glockenspiel, piccolo, cymbals, harp. The second Episode is called Intermezzo. Both Episodes are quaint in character, and demand just such careful direction as Mr. Nikisch gave them.

Volkmann's Second Symphony, B-flat, was once before given in Boston, under Mr. Henschel; but that was six years ago, and this production made it almost a novelty. It is as brief as beautiful. The graceful Allegro Vivace leads to the saucy Allegretto, full of life and Indian Summer. Ehlert declares it symbolic of the composer's want of affinity with ordinary society. The third movement, Andantino, impresses musicians as comical, with its curious mixture of tempo, and leads abruptly to Piu Mosso (a little more so!) ending in the Allegro.

The singer was Emil Fischer, with his evenly solid voice; but his three selections were not calculated to rouse much enthusiasm: One of Schumann's Spanish Lovesongs; Litolff's Resignation; Lysiart's solo, from the second act of Weber's opera, Euryanthe, the classic overture to which had just opened the concert. No one would suspect this song to be a proclamation of diabolical vengeance.

The Fifth Symphony Concert gives us three great works: Haydn's Symphony in G; Mozart's Symphony in G minor; and Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

THIS admirable organization this year includes Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Svecenski, Anton Hekking. The first concert was given at Chickering Hall, Oct. 28, before a large audience, in which the German element was very strong and appreciative. There were two string selections, the concert opening with Volkmann's Fourth Quartet in E-minor (op. 35, according to the program, but 34 according to Grove), in which the second movement is the Scherzo. The third, the Andantino, made a vivid impression with its fine viola work.

The closing number was the quaint and beautiful Quintet in F, by Brahms, op. 88, written seven years ago, Max Zach playing the second viola. This work has been before played in part at a Kneisel concert, but not in its entirety, the third movement, Allegro Energico, being heard here for the first time, and rousing nods of emphatic admiration among the Teutonic listeners.

For a singer, sandwiched between the instrumental slices, the Quartet had Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, who won some success at the Worcester Festival, and has appeared recently at a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. Her songs were Schumann's Almond Tree; Gustav Presser's Danube; and (a greater novelty) Tuscan Song by Tyson Wolff. Mrs. Lawson was received with that kindness which Boston usually awards to strangers.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTH CONCERT.

That the symphony concert programme for last evening met with the most popular endorsement of the season thus far, as regards attendance must have at least surprised Herr Nikisch, who imposed a severe test by the character of his selections.

The symphonies performed are all so well known that it would seem supererogatory to refer in detail to their musical and scientific traits. It speaks abundantly well for the broad and sterling characteristics of Mr. Nikisch as a musician to say that the Haydn (G major, No. 13) and Mozart symphonies were conducted as in as objective, strict, and legitimate manner as the most exacting pedagogue could have desired. With that immortal monument of genius Beethoven's C minor symphony the conductor was more elastic, and his reading of the score was not so impressive of the individuality of the interpreter. It was an intensely dramatic, remarkable and exciting reading, and at its close the wildest enthusiasm prevailed. Men rose en masse and cheered the conductor, and women, in their way, were equally demonstrative. Altogether the concert was afforded one of the most illustrious triumphs of orchestral conducting and performance that has yet been witnessed in this city.

Boston Post.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1889.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On Saturday night Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following remarkable programme to the patrons of the Symphony concerts:

Symphony in G major.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony in C minor.....Beethoven

The widely expressed fear that the public would be "frightened" by three symphonies was not realized. On Friday afternoon the whole available standing room was sold out an hour before the doors were opened, and on Saturday evening the hall was more crowded than any concert as yet. And the enthusiasm! One could hardly believe oneself in cold and contemplative Boston, and indeed it is a great deal for a Boston audience to unanimously spring to its feet and cry out "Bravo! bravo!" Yet so they did on Saturday, and it was genuine, heart-felt and well-earned applause. The concert may be justly considered as epoch-creating in this city. The Haydn symphony (No. 13 of the Breitkopf and Härtel edition) has oddly enough never been heard here before, although it is a constant favorite on the programmes abroad. Its performance Saturday night was a revelation. It was as if the very soul of the gentle-spirited, kindly-humored old master had penetrated every nook and corner of the whole hall; with an air of bewilderment one looked and saw the orchestra in the black coats of the nineteenth century and not the powdered wigs and silk and satin splendor of an hundred years ago. Surely our hypercritical listeners can find nothing to cavil at here! No one of the older classical symphonies has ever been so perfectly rendered—so faultlessly conceived and superbly executed at these concerts, and it would be difficult to imagine how anywhere a greater perfection could be attained.

The Mozart symphony was also finely rendered, and here Mr. Nikisch gave a little more modern coloring in several instances. Notably successful in its effect was the slight rallentando at the beginning of the principal theme on several occasions in the first movement, while the menuetto was nothing short of superb, and the burst of applause which followed it was a hearty indication of how the public at large appreciated the interpretation. Mr. Krehbiel, the distinguished critic of the New York Tribune, has pointed out to me the "old discovery of the parallelism (melodic but not rhythmic) between the Mozart finale and the Beethoven scherzo," which is indeed extraordinary, as the notes are absolutely the same. This was one of the many points of interest in the programme, and one could see that Mr. Nikisch had taken note of all such details. Naturally enough, the culmination of this splendid programme was reached with the fifth Beethoven symphony, and it may be said at once that so fine a performance in conception, and even more especially in execution, has never been heard in this city. Mr. Nikisch is evidently influenced by Wagner's ideas in the conception of this work, but for that heaven be praised, as at last we have heard this work played in such a manner that the listener could see what was inside the score. The noble—one may say colossal—thoughts which pervade this work were all laid bare with a master hand. Especially the first and last movements were worthy of all praise. The long holds at the opening were grandly impressive, and the famous horn passage in the first movement was given its true meaning by the slight ritard and the accented fortissimo. At the end of the first movement the applause was deafening. The romantic coloring of the andante con moto was delightful, although in one instance an unimportant passage in the second violins was exalted to a cantabile at the expense of the theme proper. The fascinating scherzo gained new beauties by the flexible rendering it received, and the last movement was simply gorgeous in its breadth and strength. This great burst of exaltation was given its true meaning—so manly and so noble—and the orchestra played as perhaps an orchestra never played before. The exceptionally difficult violin figures were as clear as crystal. The 'cellos and basses overcame all difficulties with apparent ease, and every man seemed fired with the magnetism which pervaded the whole concert. Much comment has been made here on Mr. Nikisch's short stature, but it would be difficult for any man to look more imposing and commanding than he did while conducting this movement. At the end the audience—fairly beside itself with enthusiasm—rose to its feet and broke into prolonged shouts of applause.

Of course there will be dissenters to this interpretation. Some people will always prefer a dry-as-dust pedantry to a warm and genial rendering, and it seems useless to discuss further the well-worn topic of "tradition." It has already been pointed out that the "traditions" do not come from the composers themselves, and more cannot be said. It is interesting, however, to read how Weber answered a conductor who wrote him for the tempi of "Euryanthe." Mr. Philip Hale calls attention to this in Saturday's Home Journal, and he gives the following admirable translation of Weber's reply:

> The tempo should not be a "mill-hammer" tyrannically restraining or urging on, but it should be to the piece of music what the beating of the pulse is to the life of man. There is no slow movement in which passages do not occur where a quicker movement is demanded so as to prevent a sensation of "dragging." There is no presto which does not require a quiet interpretation of many passages, so that the expression will not be destroyed by too much haste. We have in music no means of clearly pointing out these things. These rest alone in the breast of the man who feels, and if they are not to be found there, the metronome which protects only from gross mistakes will be of no avail, neither would be of any assistance the very imperfect indications which I in the richness of the material at hand should try to express more fully, did not past experience force itself upon me and warn me; in consequence of which I now regard such indications as superfluous and unprofitable, and I fear them, since they are liable to be misunderstood.

This certainly makes further discussion unnecessary in Weber's case, and there is no reason to assume that any reasonable composer would feel any differently. At all events, by far the majority of people at Saturday's concert felt that they had got to know the real Beethoven at last, and the wonderful music gained for them a thousand new beauties through Mr. Nikisch's splendid and thoughtful interpretation.

ARTHUR WELD.

New Haven News [illegible] of the week.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is more popular than ever under the new conductor, Arthur Nikisch of Leipsic. Several important additions to the orchestra have been made since the last appearance here. A subscription is now open at Steinert's, and on Monday, December 2, the first privileges of securing seats will be given.

Salvini at the Hyperion on Saturday evening will be the most important dramatic attraction thus far in the season. In his portrayal of Samson he has won an artistic triumph of the highest kind, a triumph which can be equaled by no one but himself. Signor Salvini has determined not again to play outside of the larger Euro- [illegible] and his own theater in Florence

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Never was an educational programme put forth in so palatable a guise as in the concert of last night. Mr. Nikisch's object was to show by three symphonic works played continuously, the rise, development and culmination of the greatest instrumental form we possess. Never was a juxtaposition of composers more effective. Haydn's symphonies stand beside Beethoven's as a charming villa might stand beside a palace, in architecture, and it was most enjoyable to go from the simplicity of his development and the daintiness of his melodies to the massive thematic treatment of Beethoven. Between these two came the most pathetic and the most attractive of all Mozart's instrumental works, the symphony in G minor. It was more in place, this violet among symphonic flowers, in such a programme, than its sister work the great "Jupiter" symphony would have been, for the "Jupiter" trenches a little in its majesty, upon the ground of Beethoven, and its lofty style was exceptional even with Mozart, who was more truly represented by this less grandiose example of tenderness and purity. And Beethoven's fifth symphony was a proper example of the culmination of symphonic form, for while it has all the rugged power of the master it does not deviate from the regular form of the symphony as the great ninth symphony does, and it shows in its first movement all the power of thematic development, and after all development is the cornerstone of symphony. Then, also, it has a true Beethoven coda in its first movement, and the full use of the coda in the sonata form is one of the characteristic points in the full development of symphony. It also shows the advance in technical difficulty which marks the onward progress of the symphony. Such a contrabass passage as is found in the third movement, would have been deemed insanity in Hadyn's day, and in fact Weber did call Beethoven a bedlamite because of his audacity in the handling of these instruments.

The performance was something worthy of the occasion, and it stands to Boston's credit that the public was not dismayed by the solid, classical character of the programme and the absence of a solo artist, but crowded the hall in every part and displayed the most vivid interest in the unusual succession of symphonies. The enthusiasm at times became most emphatic, and at the close of the concert the conductor received a veritable ovation. The appreciation was well deserved in the Hadyn and Mozart works, Mr. Nikisch well understands the true tempi of the earlier classical epoch, and does not take an allegro too fast nor an adagio too slow when used by Hadyn or Mozart. The entire Hadyn symphony (with the single exception that the opening movement was a little too furious) was splendidiy read and splendidly performed. The rustic, musette-like character of its minuet was charming, and the drone bass of the trio had just the right degree of prominence.

The finale, too, in which the jovial character of the Gigue, which formerly ended the suite, was reflected, had sufficient brusquerie to make it most attractive. The G minor symphony, by Mozart, scarcely began with the perfection which Mr. Gerricke used to give to the opening theme, but the appearance of the chief figure on the contrabasses and 'cellos in the development, and in fact the entire development, was excellently done. The beautiful imitations of the finale of this work were also perfectly given, and the applause which followed was abundantly earned.

But I cannot speak so eulogistically of the first movement of the fifth symphony. Mr. Gericke has given it better. In the interminably prolonged pauses upon the chief figure, in the rather rough beginning of the chief theme, the orchestra fell below its former standard, and the "knocks of destiny" became rather affected. In the beginning of the second theme, as in the same place in the third movement, the horn blew a hurricane such as I have never heard in this work. It was virility, but it was the virility of a prize-fighter rather than that of Beethoven. Nevertheless, the charming development of the second theme, where the fragments of its first figure are tossed to and fro between the strings and wind instruments, was very finely performed.

The andante was again a little too masculine and brusque. The bassoons did some praiseworthy execution in this and the next movement. The contrabasses deserved a vote of thanks from the entire audience. Not only did they do excellent work in the Mozart symphony, but they performed the terrible passage in the trio of the scherzo in a manner beyond criticism. It was inspiring to hear them. But the crowning point of the whole concert, appropriately came last. The finale of the fifth symphony is considerably more heroic than the end of the Heroic symphony, and here at least power, dynamic force, and detonating explosions, are not out of place. This part was given with a vigor beyond anything I can recall, and created a furore that was far beyond anything achieved this season. The applause here was not misplaced, and I can only add the enthusiasm of cold type to the frenzied fervor of the public. Next Saturday comes a programme brimful of novelty, and the seldom heard symphony of that unfortunate genius, H. Goetz.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1889.

Why the Symphony Musicians Laugh —A Funny Episode Up in Lowell.

The Symphony orchestra went up to Lowell Thursday night and gave a concert in the new Opera House, which, by the way, is a perfect gem of a theatre. One of the trombones, who had no part in the Italian symphony, which closed the evening's programme, sauntered out of the stage entrance just before 9 o'clock, with the intention of strolling about until the special train started for Boston at 10.15. As he passed up the street his eye was attracted by electric lights and big flaring posters announcing a performance by Cleveland's minstrels. Thinking to pass the time away, until the train started, he passed through the entrance, laid down his 50 cents at the box office window, received his blue pasteboard and went in. Imagine his surprise when he found himself in the opera house with Mr. Nikisch just starting the orchestra on the second movement of the symphony! "Charlie" is unhappy, as every one in town knows how he paid 50 cents to hear the orchestra of which he is a member, play a symphony which he knows by heart. The money was refunded on demand.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The three symphonies announced for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not deter the public from attending, for there was a very large audience, which not only listened to the symphonies with unbroken interest and manifest pleasure, but which was the most enthusiastic audience of the season thus far. It did not always "applaud in the right places," but it did so very often, and became frequently excited to a degree rare in the attendance at a symphony concert. The performances opened with Haydn's beautiful and perennially fresh symphony in G, No. 13 of the Breitkopf and Haertel edition, which, strangely enough, had not been heard at these concerts before. The programme calls it a "pretty" work, but it is more than this, for it is full of noble thoughts worked out with a flexible freedom of musical learning that is scarcely known in this day, which looks back upon Haydn with a smiling toleration, as if graceful naivete and simplicity were his only attributes. In view of Mr. Nikisch's earlier readings, it was not unreasonable to anticipate, with some alarm, that he might attempt to modernize Haydn, but such anticipations were delightfully disappointed, for he not only gave a reading that was at once sympathetic and virile, but with a most welcome absence of that sugary weakness that is too often made to pass current for Haydn. It was a brilliant and exceptionally fine piece of work from beginning to end, and, on the whole, one of the most satisfying interpretations of a Haydn symphony ever heard here. The allegros were perhaps given a little faster than Haydn intended and than the musicians of his day could have been subjected to, especially his contrabasso players; but beyond this no liberties were taken with the work that it did not bear easily and naturally. The slow movement in particular was given with exquisite expressiveness and richness of effect. The hearty applause bestowed upon the performance of this movement, and in fact of the whole symphony, was fully earned and fairly deserved. Mozart's great symphony in G minor followed and received equally fine and equally sympathetic treatment, the only fault being in the slowness with which the opening bars were taken, and the retarding of the theme whenever it appeared, which deprived the movement of much of its spirit and sparkle, and at last became monotonous and affected. The lovely andante was accorded a beautiful reading, sometimes lacking in delicacy in the performance but unexceptionable in intention. The minuet had one of the most impressive readings it had ever obtained here, and nothing could have been more in harmony with the sentiment of the finale than the interpretation it received. In fact, the performances of these two symphonies were the most gratifying successes that Mr. Nikisch had hitherto achieved with the older masters. The whole ended with Beethoven's C minor symphony. Here, however, as if to make up for the reserve and discretion he had shown toward Haydn and Mozart, Mr. Nikisch began at the very outset to modernize Beethoven. He exaggerated the opening bars in a grossly melodramatic way that made them almost absurdly sensational. The whole of the movement was broken up in respect to time, in a way and with an effect that was vulgar and tasteless, not to use so harsh a word as impertinent. Beethoven is evidently not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and besides Beethoven, as filtered through Mr. Nikisch, is by no means as interesting as Beethoven, pure and simple. An unpleasing, blatant and theatrical color was imparted to the whole symphony. It was doubtless exciting enough, and it stirred the audience to a pitch of unwonted enthusiasm; but it was regretable, none the less. There was much ritardando and much tempo rubato in the slow movement; but the effect here was not so coarse and so inappropriate as it was in the wonderful first allegro, of which the life and movement were exasperatingly distorted. It may be difficult to say what is exactly the right reading of this movement, but it is by no means as difficult to reach the conclusion that Mr. Nikisch's reading is radically a wrong one. By and by the gifted conductor will, by experience, come to the conclusion that it is wiser to read Beethoven as he is than according to some modern theory of what he ought to be. The scherzo was on the whole the best intepreted movement, and the grand break into the finale was given with magnificent largeness, but the tawdry theatrical element pervaded the reading as a whole, and, despite the amazing force and brilliancy with which it was worked up toward the end, the movement dragged by reason of the frequent breaks in the time. There were power and evident deep and careful thought in the view Mr. Nikisch presented of the work; but it was a mistaken one. Too great an effort was made to make the symphony say something that was not in it to say; to squeeze something more out of it than was found there before. To paraphrase a familiar saying, it was splendid, but it was not Beethoven. However, it pleased the audience, which manifested its delight by a storm of applause and shouts of bravo, and by calling the conductor forward several times to bow his acknowledgments; but, nevertheless, the judicious could not but grieve. At the next concert, the selections are to be overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; Concerto for violincello, Eckert; Rhapsodie Noveglenne, Svensden (first time); "Kol Nideri," for violoncello and orchestra, Bruch (first time); and Symphony in F, Goetz. The soloist will be Mr. Leo Schultz.

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., NOV. 9, 1889.

The symphony concert of last week was memorable from the fact that for the first time, this season, the name of an American composer appeared upon the programme. Two episodes for orchestra, by Arthur Bird, were given. The character of the first of these pieces is indicated by the title, "Scène Orientale." The music had the true Eastern flavor, and is thoroughly suggestive of the scene which it attempts to portray. The comparison piece, an "Intermezzo and Trio," is conceived somewhat in the vein of Mendelssohn's fairy music, at the same time reminding one of Schumann's fantastic moods, although the style is not really an imitation of either of these masters. For both cases the composer shows considerable command of orchestration, and what is still better, works out his ideas with a consistency and a thoroughness which are too often lacking in the productions of the younger men of our day. It is just this lack or consistency which is the chief fault to be found with Volkmann's symphony in B flat, also given at this concert. The themes are often striking, but the treatment of them is such that the work as a whole seems scrappy, does not hang together. The third movement alone is satisfactory in this respect, although the finale rises nearly to the same level. The performance of the symphony was all that could be desired, and the remaining orchestral number of the programme, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," was played with great brilliancy. Mr. Emil Fischer sang Lysiart's aria from the same opera, and songs by Litolff and Schumann. These selections served to exhibit the singer's magnificent voice in all its richness, but the manner of execution was rather lazy.

B. C. H.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889.

FOURTH AND FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

ARTHUR BIRD has written Two Episodes. This unpublished work was the novelty at the Fourth Boston Symphony Concert. The first number, Oriental Scene, calls for the usual full orchestra, besides triangle, glockenspiel, piccolo, cymbals, harp. The second Episode is called Intermezzo. Both Episodes are quaint in character, and demand just such careful direction as Mr. Nikisch gave them.

Volkmann's Second Symphony, B-flat, was once before given in Boston, under Mr. Henschel; but that was six years ago, and this production made it almost a novelty. It is as brief as beautiful. The graceful Allegro Vivace leads to the saucy Allegretto, full of life and Indian Summer. Ehlert declares it symbolic of the composer's want of affinity with ordinary society. The third movement, Andantino, impresses musicians as comical, with its curious mixture of tempo, and leads abruptly to Piu Mosso (a little more so!) ending in the Allegro.

The singer was Emil Fischer, with his evenly solid voice; but his three selections were not calculated to rouse much enthusiasm: One of Schumann's Spanish Lovesongs; Litolff's Resignation; Lysiart's solo, from the second act of Weber's opera, Euryanthe, the classic overture to which had just opened the concert. No one would suspect this song to be a proclamation of diabolical vengeance.

The Fifth Symphony Concert gives us three great works: Haydn's Symphony in G; Mozart's Symphony in G minor; and Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 9, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

THIS admirable organization this year includes Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, Louis Svecenski, Anton Hekking. The first concert was given at Chickering Hall, Oct. 28, before a large audience, in which the German element was very strong and appreciative. There were two string selections, the concert opening with Volkmann's Fourth Quartet in E-minor (op. 35, according to the program, but 34 according to Grove), in which the second movement is the Scherzo. The third, the Andantino, made a vivid impression with its fine viola work.

The closing number was the quaint and beautiful Quintet in F, by Brahms, op. 88, written seven years ago, Max Zach playing the second viola. This work has been before played in part at a Kneisel concert, but not in its entirety, the third movement, Allegro Energico, being heard here for the first time, and rousing nods of emphatic admiration among the Teutonic listeners.

For a singer, sandwiched between the instrumental slices, the Quartet had Mrs. Corinne Moore-Lawson, who won some success at the Worcester Festival, and has appeared recently at a Symphony Concert in Cambridge. Her songs were Schumann's Almond Tree; Gustav Presser's Danube; and (a greater novelty) Tuscan Song by Tyson Wolff. Mrs. Lawson was received with that kindness which Boston usually awards to strangers.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FIFTH CONCERT.

That the symphony concert programme for last evening met with the most popular endorsement of the season thus far, as regards attendance must have at least surprised Herr Nikisch, who imposed a severe test by the character of his selections.

The symphonies performed are all so well known that it would seem supererogatory to refer in detail to their musical and scientific traits. It speaks abundantly well for the broad and sterling characteristics of Mr. Nikisch as a musician to say that the Haydn (G major, No. 13) and Mozart symphonies were conducted as in as objective, strict, and legitimate manner as the most exacting pedagogue could have desired. With that immortal monument of genius Beethoven's C minor symphony the conductor was more elastic, and his reading of the score was not so impressive of the individuality of the interpreter. It was an intensely dramatic, remarkable and exciting reading, and at its close the wildest enthusiasm prevailed. Men rose en masse and cheered the conductor, and women, in their way, were equally demonstrative. Altogether the concert was afforded one of the most illustrious triumphs of orchestral conducting and performance that has yet been witnessed in this city.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1889.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On Saturday night Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following remarkable programme to the patrons of the Symphony concerts:

Symphony in G major ..... Haydn
Symphony in G minor ..... Mozart
Symphony in C minor ..... Beethoven

The widely expressed fear that the public would be "frightened" by three symphonies was not realized. On Friday afternoon the whole available standing room was sold out an hour before the doors were opened, and on Saturday evening the hall was more crowded than any concert as yet. And the enthusiasm! One could hardly believe oneself in cold and contemplative Boston, and indeed it is a great deal for a Boston audience to unanimously spring to its feet and cry out "Bravo! bravo!" Yet so they did on Saturday, and it was genuine, heart-felt and well-earned applause. The concert may be justly considered as epoch-creating in this city. The Haydn symphony (No. 13 of the Breitkopf and Härtel edition) has oddly enough never been heard here before, although it is a constant favorite on the programmes abroad. Its performance Saturday night was a revelation. It was as if the very soul of the gentle-spirited, kindly-humored old master had penetrated every nook and corner of the whole hall; with an air of bewilderment one looked and saw the orchestra in the black coats of the nineteenth century and not the powdered wigs and silk and satin splendor of an hundred years ago. Surely our hypercritical listeners can find nothing to cavil at here! No one of the older classical symphonies has ever been so perfectly rendered—so faultlessly conceived and superbly executed at these concerts, and it would be difficult to imagine how anywhere a greater perfection could be attained

The Mozart symphony was also finely rendered, and here Mr. Nikisch gave a little more modern coloring in several instances. Notably successful in its effect was the slight rallentando at the beginning of the principal theme on several occasions in the first movement, while the menuetto was nothing short of superb, and the burst of applause which followed it was a hearty indication of how the public at large appreciated the interpretation. Mr. Krehbiel, the distinguished critic of the New York Tribune, has pointed out to me the "old discovery of the parallelism (melodic but not rhythmic) between the Mozart finale and the Beethoven scherzo," which is indeed extraordinary, as the notes are absolutely the same. This was one of the many points of interest in the programme, and one could see that Mr. Nikisch had taken note of all such details. Naturally enough, the culmination of this splendid programme was reached with the fifth Beethoven symphony, and it may be said at once that so fine a performance in conception, and even more especially in execution, has never been heard in this city. Mr. Nikisch is evidently influenced by Wagner's ideas in the conception of this work, but for that heaven be praised, as at last we have heard this work played in such a manner that the listener could see what was inside the score. The noble—one may say colossal—thoughts which pervade this work were all laid bare with a master hand. Especially the first and last movements were worthy of all praise. The long holds at the opening were grandly impressive, and the famous horn passage in the first movement was given its true meaning by the slight ritard and the accented fortissimo. At the end of the first movement the applause was deafening. The romantic coloring of the andante con moto was delightful, although in one instance an unimportant passage in the second violins was exalted to a cantabile at the expense of the theme proper. The fascinating scherzo gained new beauties by the flexible rendering it received, and the last movement was simply gorgeous in its breadth and strength. This great burst of exaltation was given its true meaning—so manly and so noble—and the orchestra played as perhaps an orchestra never played before. The exceptionally difficult violin figures were as clear as crystal. The 'cellos and basses overcame all difficulties with apparent ease, and every man seemed fired with the magnetism which pervaded the whole concert. Much comment has been made here on Mr. Nikisch's short stature, but it would be difficult for any man to look more imposing and commanding than he did while conducting this movement. At the end the audience—fairly beside itself with enthusiasm—rose to its feet and broke into prolonged shouts of applause.

Of course there will be dissenters to this interpretation. Some people will always prefer a dry-as-dust pedantry to a warm and genial rendering, and it seems useless to discuss further the well-worn topic of "tradition." It has already been pointed out that the "traditions" do not come from the composers themselves, and more cannot be said. It is interesting, however, to read how Weber answered a conductor who wrote him for the tempi of "Euryanthe." Mr. Philip Hale calls attention to this in Saturday's Home Journal, and he gives the following admirable translation of Weber's reply:

> The tempo should not be a "mill-hammer" tyrannically restraining or urging on, but it should be to the piece of music what the beating of the pulse is to the life of man. There is no slow movement in which passages do not occur where a quicker movement is demanded so as to prevent a sensation of "dragging." There is no presto which does not require a quiet interpretation of many passages, so that the expression will not be destroyed by too much haste. We have in music no means of clearly pointing out these things. These rest alone in the breast of the man who feels, and if they are not to be found there, the metronome which protects only from gross mistakes will be of no avail, neither would be of any assistance the very imperfect indications which I in the richness of the material at hand should try to express more fully, did not past experience force itself upon me and warn me; in consequence of which I now regard such indications as superfluous and unprofitable, and I fear them, since they are liable to be misunderstood.

This certainly makes further discussion unnecessary in Weber's case, and there is no reason to assume that any reasonable composer would feel any differently. At all events, by far the majority of people at Saturday's concert felt that they had got to know the real Beethoven at last, and the wonderful music gained for them a thousand new beauties through Mr. Nikisch's splendid and thoughtful interpretation.

ARTHUR WELD.

of the week. Nov. Mason News 11

The Boston Symphony orchestra is more popular than ever under the new conductor, Arthur Nikisch of Leipsic. Several important additions to the orchestra have been made since the last appearance here. A subscription is now open at Steinert's, and on Monday, December 2, the first privileges of securing seats will be given.

Salvini at the Hyperion on Saturday evening will be the most important dramatic attraction thus far in the season. In his portrayal of Samson he has won an artistic triumph of the highest kind, a triumph which can be equaled by no one but himself. Signor Salvini has determined not again to play outside of the larger Euro- ...es and his own theater in Florence

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Never was an educational programme put forth in so palatable a guise as in the concert of last night. Mr. Nikisch's object was to show by three symphonic works played continuously, the rise, development and culmination of the greatest instrumental form we possess. Never was a juxtaposition of composers more effective. Haydn's symphonies stand beside Beethoven's as a charming villa might stand beside a palace, in architecture, and it was most enjoyable to go from the simplicity of his development and the daintiness of his melodies to the massive thematic treatment of Beethoven. Between these two came the most pathetic and the most attractive of all Mozart's instrumental works, the symphony in G minor. It was more in place, this violet among symphonic flowers, in such a programme, than its sister work the great "Jupiter" symphony would have been, for the "Jupiter" trenches a little in its majesty, upon the ground of Beethoven, and its lofty style was exceptional even with Mozart, who was more truly represented by this less grandiose example of tenderness and purity. And Beethoven's fifth symphony was a proper example of the culmination of symphonic form, for while it has all the rugged power of the master it does not deviate from the regular form of the symphony as the great ninth symphony does, and it shows in its first movement all the power of thematic development, and after all development is the cornerstone of symphony. Then, also, it has a true Beethoven coda in its first movement, and the full use of the coda in the sonata form is one of the characteristic points in the full development of symphony. It also shows the advance in technical difficulty which marks the onward progress of the symphony. Such a contrabass passage as is found in the third movement, would have been deemed insanity in Hadyn's day, and in fact Weber did call Beethoven a bedlamite because of his audacity in the handling of these instruments.

The performance was something worthy of the occasion, and it stands to Boston's credit that the public was not dismayed by the solid, classical character of the programme and the absence of a solo artist, but crowded the hall in every part and displayed the most vivid interest in the unusual succession of symphonies. The enthusiasm at times became most emphatic, and at the close of the concert the conductor received a veritable ovation. The appreciation was well deserved in the Hadyn and Mozart works, Mr. Nikisch well understands the true tempi of the earlier classical epoch, and does not take an allegro too fast nor an adagio too slow when used by Hadyn or Mozart. The entire Hadyn symphony (with the single exception that the opening movement was a little too furious) was splendidly read and splendidly performed. The rustic, musette-like character of its minuet was charming, and the drone bass of the trio had just the right degree of prominence.

The finale, too, in which the jovial character of the Gigue, which formerly ended the suite, was reflected, had sufficient brusquerie to make it most attractive. The G minor symphony, by Mozart, scarcely began with the perfection which Mr. Gerricke used to give to the opening theme, but the appearance of the chief figure on the contrabasses and 'cellos in the development, and in fact the entire development, was excellently done. The beautiful imitations of the finale of this work were also perfectly given, and the applause which followed was abundantly earned.

But I cannot speak so eulogistically of the first movement of the fifth symphony. Mr. Gericke has given it better. In the interminably prolonged pauses upon the chief figure, in the rather rough beginning of the chief theme, the orchestra fell below its former standard, and the "knocks of destiny" became rather affected. In the beginning of the second theme, as in the same place in the third movement, the horn blew a hurricane such as I have never heard in this work. It was virility, but it was the virility of a prize-fighter rather than that of Beethoven. Nevertheless, the charming development of the second theme, where the fragments of its first figure are tossed to and fro between the strings and wind instruments, was very finely performed.

The andante was again a little too masculine and brusque. The bassoons did some praiseworthy execution in this and the next movement. The contrabasses deserved a vote of thanks from the entire audience. Not only did they do excellent work in the Mozart symphony, but they performed the terrible passage in the trio of the scherzo in a manner beyond criticism. It was inspiring to hear them. But the crowning point of the whole concert, appropriately came last. The finale of the fifth symphony is considerably more heroic than the end of the Heroic symphony, and here at least power, dynamic force, and detonating explosions, are not out of place. This part was given with a vigor beyond anything I can recall, and created a furore that was far beyond anything achieved this season. The applause here was not misplaced, and I can only add the enthusiasm of cold type to the frenzied fervor of the public. Next Saturday comes a programme brimful of novelty, and the seldom heard symphony of that unfortunate genius, H. Goetz.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1889.

Why the Symphony Musicians Laugh —A Funny Episode Up in Lowell.

The Symphony orchestra went up to Lowell Thursday night and gave a concert in the new Opera House, which, by the way, is a perfect gem of a theatre. One of the trombones, who had no part in the Italian symphony, which closed the evening's programme, sauntered out of the stage entrance just before 9 o'clock, with the intention of strolling about until the special train started for Boston at 10.15. As he passed up the street his eye was attracted by electric lights and big flaring posters announcing a performance by Cleveland's minstrels. Thinking to pass the time away, until the train started, he passed through the entrance, laid down his 50 cents at the box office window, received his blue pasteboard and went in. Imagine his surprise when he found himself in the opera house with Mr. Nikisch just starting the orchestra on the second movement of the symphony! "Charlie" is unhappy, as every one in town knows how he paid 50 cents to hear the orchestra of which he is a member, play a symphony which he knows by heart. The money was refunded on demand.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The three symphonies announced for the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not deter the public from attending, for there was a very large audience, which not only listened to the symphonies with unbroken interest and manifest pleasure, but which was the most enthusiastic audience of the season thus far. It did not always "applaud in the right places," but it did so very often, and became frequently excited to a degree rare in the attendance at a symphony concert. The performances opened with Haydn's beautiful and perennially fresh symphony in G, No. 13 of the Breitkopf and Haertel edition, which, strangely enough, had not been heard at these concerts before. The programme calls it a "pretty" work, but it is more than this, for it is full of noble thoughts worked out with a flexible freedom of musical learning that is scarcely known in this day, which looks back upon Haydn with a smiling toleration, as if graceful naivete and simplicity were his only attributes. In view of Mr. Nikisch's earlier readings, it was not unreasonable to anticipate, with some alarm, that he might attempt to modernize Haydn, but such anticipations were delightfully disappointed, for he not only gave a reading that was at once sympathetic and virile, but with a most welcome absence of that sugary weakness that is too often made to pass current for Haydn. It was a brilliant and exceptionally fine piece of work from beginning to end, and, on the whole, one of the most satisfying interpretations of a Haydn symphony ever heard here. The allegros were perhaps given a little faster than Haydn intended and than the musicians of his day could have been subjected to, especially his contrabasso players; but beyond this no liberties were taken with the work that it did not bear easily and naturally. The slow movement in particular was given with exquisite expressiveness and richness of effect. The hearty applause bestowed upon the performance of this movement, and in fact of the whole symphony, was fully earned and fairly deserved. Mozart's great symphony in G minor followed and received equally fine and equally sympathetic treatment, the only fault being in the slowness with which the opening bars were taken, and the retarding of the theme whenever it appeared, which deprived the movement of much of its spirit and sparkle, and at last became monotonous and affected. The lovely andante was accorded a beautiful reading, sometimes lacking in delicacy in the performance but unexceptionable in intention. The minuet had one of the most impressive readings it had ever obtained here, and nothing could have been more in harmony with the sentiment of the finale than the interpretation it received. In fact, the performances of these two symphonies were the most gratifying successes that Mr. Nikisch had hitherto achieved with the older masters. The whole ended with Beethoven's C minor symphony. Here, however, as if to make up for the reserve and discretion he had shown toward Haydn and Mozart, Mr. Nikisch began at the very outset to modernize Beethoven. He exaggerated the opening bars in a grossly melodramatic way that made them almost absurdly sensational. The whole of the movement was broken up in respect to time, in a way and with an effect that was vulgar and tasteless, not to use so harsh a word as impertinent. Beethoven is evidently not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and besides Beethoven, as filtered through Mr. Nikisch, is by no means as interesting as Beethoven, pure and simple. An unpleasing, blatant and theatrical color was imparted to the whole symphony. It was doubtless exciting enough, and it stirred the audience to a pitch of unwonted enthusiasm; but it was regretable, none the less. There was much ritardando and much tempo rubato in the slow movement; but the effect here was not so coarse and so inappropriate as it was in the wonderful first allegro, of which the life and movement were exasperatingly distorted. It may be difficult to say what is exactly the right reading of this movement, but it is by no means as difficult to reach the conclusion that Mr. Nikisch's reading is radically a wrong one. By and by the gifted conductor will, by experience, come to the conclusion that it is wiser to read Beethoven as he is than according to some modern theory of what he ought to be. The scherzo was on the whole the best intepreted movement, and the grand break into the finale was given with magnificent largeness, but the tawdry theatrical element pervaded the reading as a whole, and, despite the amazing force and brilliancy with which it was worked up toward the end, the movement dragged by reason of the frequent breaks in the time. There were power and evident deep and careful thought in the view Mr. Nikisch presented of the work; but it was a mistaken one. Too great an effort was made to make the symphony say something that was not in it to say; to squeeze something more out of it than was found there before. To paraphrase a familiar saying, it was splendid, but it was not Beethoven. However, it pleased the audience, which manifested its delight by a storm of applause and shouts of bravo, and by calling the conductor forward several times to bow his acknowledgments; but, nevertheless, the judicious could not but grieve. At the next concert, the selections are to be overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; Concerto for violincello, Eckert; Rhapsodie Novegienne, Svensden (first time); "Kol Nideri," for violoncello and orchestra, Bruch (first time); and Symphony in F, Goetz. The soloist will be Mr. Leo Schultz.

THE CHRONICLE.

BROOKLINE, MASS., NOV. 9, 1889.

The symphony concert of last week was memorable from the fact that for the first time, this season, the name of an American composer appeared upon the programme. Two episodes for orchestra, by Arthur Bird, were given. The character of the first of these pieces is indicated by the title, "Scène Orientale." The music had the true Eastern flavor, and is thoroughly suggestive of the scene which it attempts to portray. The comparison piece, an "Intermezzo and Trio," is conceived somewhat in the vein of Mendelssohn's fairy music, at the same time reminding one of Schumann's fantastic moods, although the style is not really an imitation of either of these masters. For both cases the composer shows considerable command of orchestration, and what is still better, works out his ideas with a consistency and a thoroughness which are too often lacking in the productions of the younger men of our day. It is just this lack or consistency which is the chief fault to be found with Volkmann's symphony in B flat, also given at this concert. The themes are often striking, but the treatment of them is such that the work as a whole seems scrappy, does not hang together. The third movement alone is satisfactory in this respect, although the finale rises nearly to the same level. The performance of the symphony was all that could be desired, and the remaining orchestral number of the programme, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," was played with great brilliancy. Mr. Emil Fischer sang Lysiart's aria from the same opera, and songs by Litolff and Schumann. These selections served to exhibit the singer's magnificent voice in all its richness, but the manner of execution was rather lazy.

B. C. H.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1889.

Nikisch's Trio of Symphonies

—"Young People's Popular."

It was a very substantial bill of fare that Mr. Nikisch set before his audience yesterday. Three symphonies made up the programme, and, in spite of what had been said regarding the educational value thereof, a good many people shook their heads and declared that for once those who are privileged to sit within sight of the Leipzig conductor's baton would have a fit of classical indigestion. But the results justified Mr. Nikisch's expectations, and not the fears of these timorous gentlemen. It was an educational programme, to be sure, but one to be enjoyed by all lovers of good music, whatever their relative knowledge or attainments. Those who were most familiar with the works of the great masters interpreted last evening were, it is safe to say, the most delighted. But even the novice in musical art must have caught something of the thought and spirit of Haydn and Mozart and Beethoven, set forth as they were with marvellous accuracy of effect and the greatest artistic skill.

The rise and progress of the symphony was clearly illustrated by the presentation successively of Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13, Mozart's symphony in G minor and Beethoven's Fifth symphony in C minor. This was, of course, and any sense of weariness that might have been felt had a trio of large works of less significance been offered was agreeably avoided last evening. Entire justice was given to "Papa Haydn's" flowing measures; the familiar largo could hardly have been interpreted with more breadth, evenness and fulness of tone—expression and the allegretto, taken at one of the briskest of paces, afforded delightful evidence of the orchestra's skill and the director's art in gaining new effects from effects from the best-known themes. Mozart could hardly have been more aptly represented than by the G minor symphony, which many account his best work in this line, and the performance, in its delicacy and fineness of appreciation of the composer's thought, was a great achievement indeed. But the greater triumphs of the occasion were gained with Beethoven. No one who is at all a student of music is ignorant of the rank which this Fifth symphony holds among the works of the great master. And the interpretation was worthy the masterpiece. Where all was done so well it is difficult to single out especial excellences. But the effect attained in that wonderful transition from the scherzo to the finale was so magnificent, and so roused the audience to eager listening, that no review of this memorable concert would be adequate which did not record this fact, and express new admiration for the marvellous way in which this great orchestra, as under a wizard's wand, is made to express the highest thought and aspirations of Beethoven's genius. There was enthusiastic appreciation for the achievements of the concert. Though the programme was longer than usual, they were but few in number who did not remain to the close, and thus carry away with them the memory of one of the noblest interpretations of the great finale to the Beethoven symphony that has ever been given in this musical city.

A Programme of Cumulative Interest,

This week Mr. Nikisch is to give a programme that, whatever else it may lack, will assuredly not be wanting in novelty. One would say that the director had it in mind to alternate standard works with the achievements of latter-day composers in his concert arrangements. Svendsen's "Norwegian Rhapsody" (given for the first time) and Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture are to be performed by the orchestra. The symphony will be Goetz', in F. Mr. Leo Schultz, the soloist of the occasion, will be heard in a 'cello concerto by Eckert, and Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," for violincello and orchestra—both of these works being new here. The

First. "Young People's Popular"

is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

THE EVENING MAIL,

TORONTO, NOVEMBER 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLUB.

From Our Own Correspondent.

HAMILTON, Nov. 6.—This famous orchestral club played here last night in the Grand Opera house, but were faced by an audience of the thinnest description. Doubtless the fear that they would be treated to high classical music kept many away, but those who were present enjoyed a rich performance. All the pieces rendered were good, the violin solo of Mr. de Seve being the choicest number. Mr. Lax evidently thought it beneath his dignity to play to a mere handful of listeners, and after playing a few preliminary bars of the flute solo set opposite his name on the programme turned his back on the audience without apology or explanation and walked away. His bad taste was rewarded by some pronounced hissing, but the greater part of the audience rewarded him with silent contempt.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To the Editor of The Mail.

SIR,—A letter of enquiry indicates that the small club announced to give a concert in Toronto in November is understood by some to be the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The inappropriate name chosen by this small company is well calculated to mislead the public. For this reason will you oblige me by stating that it has no connection whatever with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, under direction of Herr Arthur Nikisch, will be heard for the first time in Toronto in May next, when it will appear under the management of Messrs. I. Suckling & Sons. Yours, etc.,

CHARLES A. ELLIS,
Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 12, 1889.

The Symphony Concerts and Mr. Nikisch's Programmes—Otto Hegner's Second Boston Appearance—"The Golah" and Francis Wilson Coming—News, Gossip and Comment.

The fifth of the season's symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, had for a programme the following:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

Mr. Nikisch has stated that his only desire is to present such programmes at these concerts as the patrons of the season desire, and he finds a justification in the course he has pursued in the large audiences and great applause which have been characteristic of the eight public performances of the orchestra already given. Unfortunately, Mr. Nikisch has not yet come to properly appreciate the politeness of Boston audiences. He will in time come to distinguish between the complimentary applause of his patrons and that which honestly expresses their appreciation. In last evening's programme he, however, hit upon a happy scheme to disarm criticism upon his action in one particular. The proper position of the symphony in these progammes has been a subject of discussion among local critics for several seasons. It has been held that the symphony should begin the programme, that it should end it, and that it should be put in the middle of the selections. All parties were recognized in last evening's arrangement, so Mr. Nikisch must be credited with at least one successful effort in programme making. Every appeal for lighter and better constructed programmes in these concerts is met invariably in certain quarters with a certain amount of ridicule, and the serious character of the programmes is defended as if the symphony concerts made a department of Harvard University, where only the tastes of the most studious devotees of music should be recognized. The public, however, is not exclusively composed of musical students, and it is unfair to ignore the demands of any large proportion of the patrons of these concerts. Messrs. Zerrahn, Henschel, Thomas, Bernhard Listemann and Neuendorff have always recognized the existence of other than musical students in preparing their most classical programmes, and Mr. Nikisch will do well to make a study of these competent conductors, rather than to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor.

In the playing of the three symphonies of last evening, Mr. Nikisch was at his best in his reading of that by Haydn, to which he gave his most intelligent direction, and brought out all its simple, easily comprehended beauties with remarkable success. The largo movement showed the excellence of the 'cello players in the most admirable fashion, and throughout the opening symphony of the evening the orchestra and its leader gave the utmost satisfaction. In the Mozart symphony, there was less cause to commend the new conductor, the graceful, romantic ideas of the composer being, at times, given far too pronounced a rendering to please those familiar with earlier performances of the work under local directors. The great fifth symphony took on a strange and surprising character in the interpretation it received on this occasion. It has had many performances here by musicians who have won the respect of American audiences by their eminent abilities. None of these have found the hidden meaning of its composer which Mr. Nikisch appears to have discovered. It may be that Mr. Nikisch is entirely right, and he certainly got an indorsement of his ideas from last evening's audience. Yet, it is at least an open question whether such a performance of this symphony will find general acceptance here. Next week the programme is as follows: Cherubini, overture, "Anacreon"; Eckert, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, Norwegian rhapsody; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra; Goetz, symphony in E; soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 11.

"STRAWS" AT THE SYMPHONIES.

To the Editor of the Transcript: Nowhere is the truth of the old adage, "Straws show which way the wind blows," more exemplified than at the Symphony rehearsals, for the putting on of a cape or sack, the shutting of an opera-glass case, the rattling of a programme, are all mere "straws" in themselves; and yet when these things are done in the midst of some inspiring musical passage, they stamp the doers as unmusical, in spite of all protests on their part to the contrary.

This unmusical element was especially felt during the performance of the last movement of the Fifth Symphony on Friday. It was the experience of a lifetime to hear that glorious masterpiece rendered as it was rendered that afternoon, and yet in the very midst of the superb finale many actually went out, while many others contented themselves with making ready to go, and fidgeting about in their seats until the last chord sounded and set them free.

This unmusical restlessness shows itself towards the close of every Symphony rehearsal. Are we always to suffer from it? Surely, ample opportunity is afforded those intending to leave the hall early in the pauses between the movements of the symphony, and the corridors afford sufficient room for the adjustment of wraps, etc. Will not people be kind enough to avail themselves of these opportunities, instead of continuing to mar the enjoyment of those to whom the last notes of a concert are as precious as the first? E. B. P.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I am a regular attendant at the Symphony Orchestra Rehearsals on Fridays, but being one of the unfortunates who have no reserved seats, I am compelled to go there early and stand with the crowd. During the half-hour that elapses between my arrival and the opening of the doors, I am forced, being alone, to use all my natural inventiveness to pass away the time. Latterly I have taken to examining women's bonnets—an interesting, intructive, and in not a few cases an amusing occupation. I notice, with regret, the apparent return of birds to bonnets. I say birds, for not only is the whole bird put on, but in many cases there are two or even three. I remember the successful tirade that was made against the fashion last year, when the number of "birded" bonnets perceptibly diminished. It seems a pity that, with all the ornaments that milliners have at their command (and, in point of fact, simplicity is more beautiful than ostentation), they still persist in robbing the woods and fields of songsters. Another noticeable fact is the use of long hat pins. They are often put through the hats so that the point protrudes some inches in the air, and is likely to get in some one's eye. Short women should consider this. I was continually dodging, last Friday, a pin of this kind on a restless short woman's hat, and it even attracted the attention of my immediate neighbors—women themselves, who are supposed to be used to such things. I never heard of any accident happening from leaving this pin-point sticking out in the air, but I see no reason why, in a crowd, one could not happen. C. R. N.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1889.

The Fifth Symphony Concert—A Unique Programme.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert was:

Haydn. Symphony in G, No. 13. (B. & H.)
Mozart. Symphony in G minor. (K. 550.)
Beethoven. Symphony No. 5, in C minor.

There was no soloist.

There is no doubt that the first announcement of this programme startled the town; it was generally condemned. It was felt that as a community we had cast off our leading strings in music, that there was no need to receive so direct an object lesson on the form of the symphony, especially as Mr. Nikisch was passing the fifth out of twenty-four programmes without having shown as much tolerance towards composers other than German as did Mr. Gericke. But the programme found favor, the Friday afternoon audience crowded Music Hall, admission tickets even being at a premium some time before the hour of beginning the rehearsal, while the attendance on Saturday evening has seldom been equalled. Thus did Mr. Nikisch demonstrate not only that the regular habitues of Boston symphony concerts are music lovers, but that the city in general is so musically cultured and earnest as to eagerly grasp an opportunity to hear one of the plainest and strictest of programmes into which the personal element (as represented by the soloist) did not protrude. Let those who have heretofore cavilled at the sincerity of Boston symphony audiences forever hold their peace, and if the proceeding deprives some of our paragraphers of a principal resource it does not matter.

Mr. Nikisch, having planned a historical programme, made a wise juxtaposition of works. The less well-known Symphony in G by Haydn illustrates the eminent clearness of form, the melodic beauty, the naturalness and the gayety of the father of instrumental music; the G minor of Mozart is a lofty example of that composer's elegant musical diction, while its preponderating mood contrasted well with the example from happy Haydn, which it followed, and the noble Fifth of Beethoven, up to which it led. It would have been worth while to have transported Haydn from his Walhalla to hear his gentle music played as Mr. Nikisch played it; what would the old master, who ambled through thirty years of quiet life at Esterhaz, writing symphonies for an orchestra of sixteen, have said on hearing so much tone? Of course he would have been delighted. The G-minor Symphony, which was played as first written, namely, without clarinets, was, barring the too slow tempo of the first movement, exquisitely read. It is no wonder musical analysts disagree in ascribing a meaning to this work. Why go beneath the surface of the notes? Mozart does not invite such a procedure.

The reading of the Fifth Symphony was intensely vigorous, dramatic, and, at the entrance into the finale, of unparalleled dignity and breadth. The opening chords, in which Beethoven depicts the knocking of fate, were made very effective by Mr. Nikisch's manner of continuing the tone, and the way in which they were phrased on their repetition, though a departure from custom, has its justification in the free conception of the movement as a whole. The characteristics of emphasis, accent and elasticity of tempi, which are inseparable from Mr. Nikisch, were bestowed upon this interpretation of the symphony only, as it seemed to us, to make it more noble. Certainly the lead up to the finale, and the whole of that movement, were performed with extraordinary effect. The scherzo was a triumph for the basses, who not only gamboled in time and tune, but made a superb noise about it. The playing of the band throughout the concert calls for no adverse comment; in several departments, notably the 'cellos in the Haydn symphony, and the wood-wind in the andante of Beethoven's Fifth there was superlative excellence. The audience at the close of the concert recalled Mr. Nikisch several times with unwonted enthusiasm, many even cheering; the evening as a whole was an occasion to be remembered. The next programme contains three novelties, two of which will be presented by one of the new 'cello players of the orchestra, Mr. Leo Schulz, who came with Mr. Nikisch from Leipzig. In full it is: Cherubini, Overture, "Anacreon;" Eckert, concerto for violoncello (first time); Svendsen, Norwegian Rhapsody in A (first time); Bruch, Kol Nidrei for violoncello and orchestra (first time); Goetz, Symphony in F.

[CONTINUED FROM PAGE SEVEN.]

The practice of theatre people regarding the posting on their premises of announcements of coming attractions is to herald the new while the old is still saying farewell. This plan is followed by the manager of the new Opera House at Lowell, who on following nights last week had as guests the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Haverly's Minstrels. The orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony to close its concert, and as the work does not call for trombones one of the blowers upon this instrument of offence or defence thought he would improve spare minutes by strolling about Lowell. He left the theatre by a rear door and soon found himself in the main street. His eye caught sight of an attractive poster at a theatre entrance. Ha! said the mighty puckerer, this pleases me. His purse was lighter by fifty cents when he reached the inside of the Opera House where his confreres from Boston were playing the second movement of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony.

Hegner's second concert was well attended,

Boston Evening Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1889.

[20]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 13).
Mozart: Symphony in G minor (Köchel, 550).
Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor.

Mr. Nikisch's experiment of making up a programme of nothing but symphonies had, among others, one very singular result. That just those three symphonies, given in the order they were, would be hugely enjoyed by the larger part of the audience might have been foretold with tolerable certainty. The curious part of the matter was that, after all that had been said and written in various quarters about the unbearableness of more than one symphony at a concert, this programme drew an audience such as is seldom seen, even at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, except on nights when some exceptionally notable virtuoso is to perform. So far from this list of three symphonies having any terror in it, it proved to be positively an attraction, for the hall was literally thronged. This was pretty good proof of what pleasure the audience anticipated; and that they got what they came for was evidenced by their frequent and hearty applause. Seldom has the Music Hall been the scene of such enthusiasm; no high C of a robustious tenor; no breakneck antics of a strong-armed and nimble-fingered pianoforte smasher, would have called forth more ardent hand-clapping and vociferous shouting than were heard on Saturday evening. It was a great experience.

Of the performance of the Haydn symphony—our old, familiar friend of the Harvard Musical days—it can only be said that it was superb at every point; out and out the finest thing Mr. Nikisch has yet done here. It was a splendid example of immense effectiveness won by perfectly legitimate and relevant means. The playing was fiery and vigorous, without being melodramatic, and what of "romanticism" could be imparted to the music was shown forth by a well-directed incisiveness of accent and dynamic shading, not by any modern-transcendental fooling with the tempo. The effect was immediate; think of a Haydn minuet being all but encored!

With the Mozart symphony, however, we must take up once more our old complaint against modern romanticism poking its nose into places where it has no business. We are free to admit that the opening theme of the first movement sounds very lovely at the sentimentally slow tempo at which Mr. Nikisch takes it; so lovely, indeed, that one could almost forget the quite evident fact that Mozart had no notion of its going so slow (for no composer in his senses would have marked such a tempo as "Allegro molto"), were it not that this dragging out of the phrase knocks one of the most characteristic "points" in the movement fatally on the head. This is the energetic, pulsating accompaniment on the violas, the original and invigorating effect of which has long been famous. Here is a true story in point: Liszt, in his virtuoso days, once performed the daring feat of playing the whole of his own two-hand pianoforte transcription of Beethoven's pastoral symphony in the second part of a concert in Munich, immediately after the orchestra had played the same symphony in the first part. The effect was overwhelming. After the performance, Franz Lachner stepped up to Liszt and said to him, "You can do tremendous things with those wonderful ten fingers of yours; but complicated as the score of the Pastoral symphony is, and clearly as you play all its minutest details, I'll tell you one thing you can't do. You can't play the simple little first movement of Mozart's G minor symphony!" Liszt thought a moment, and then said, with one of his peculiar smiles: "Why, no! that's impossible! That viola accompaniment in the first sixteen measures would take up both my hands, and I should have nothing left to play the melody and bass with." This shows, at least, what importance two noted musicians, one of them a classicist, and the other a romantic come-outer, attributed to this viola accompaniment. Now, as Mr. Nikisch takes the leading theme, the pulsating vigor of this accompanying figure vanishes completely, and the whole impression is enfeebled and cheapened. For the rest, though, the wonderful symphony was superbly played, the minuet and finale being done the fullest justice.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the first movement of Beethoven's C minor symphony, although wholly distasteful to us, has the authority of precedent. Would, though, that Ries (or was it Schindler?) had never given vent to that grandiose comparison of his between the first figure in this symphony and "Fate knocking at the gate!" Would also that Beethoven's reply, that his exegesis of those first four notes were of a sort that could be publicly repeated; it might act as a wholesome antidote to all highflown transcendentalism in musical interpretation. In the Andante con moto, Mr. Nikisch allowed himself to make some quite new, and, as the French say, "unpublished" effects. The most curious of these, perhaps, was the throwing into strong prominence of the second violin part, during the second variation of the principal theme, to the almost complete extinction of the theme itself. One could not help wondering whence this wholly new cantabile melody had come, and, upon the whole, what it was doing there. But the splendid manner in which Mr. Nikisch made the trumpets and horns bring out the martial second theme went far to console one for such little vagaries. The Scherzo went admirably, if the tempo was a little slow at times, and wherever Beethoven writes "un poco," Mr. Nikisch persists in reading "molto." But the Finale was glorious throughout, and carried everything before it. Anything more grandly exhilarating were hard to imagine. The audience clapped, stamped and shouted like mad.

The next programme is: Cherubini, overture to "Anacreon"; Eckert, concerto for 'cello; Svendsen, rhapsodie norvégienne; Bruch, Kol Nidrei, for 'cello and orchestra; Goetz, symphony in F. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist.

For the first concert in the popular series to be given on Wednesday afternoon, in the Music Hall, the programme includes four works for orchestra—Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; the "Siegfried Idyll" and overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Invitation to the Dance," Von Weber, instrumented by Berlioz. Mr. Molé will play a fantasia for flute and orchestra by Damersseman on themes from Von Weber's "Oberon." Mrs. Alves will sing an aria from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," with orchestra, and a group of songs with pianoforte.

Boston Sunday Globe.
TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.
SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1889.

Nikisch's Trio of Symphonies —"Young People's Popular."

It was a very substantial bill of fare that Mr. Nikisch set before his audience yesterday. Three symphonies made up the programme, and, in spite of what had been said regarding the educational value thereof, a good many people shook their heads and declared that for once those who are privileged to sit within sight of the Leipzig conductor's baton would have a fit of classical indigestion. But the results justified Mr. Nikisch's expectations, and not the fears of these timorous gentlemen. It was an educational programme, to be sure, but one to be enjoyed by all lovers of good music, whatever their relative knowledge or attainments. Those who were most familiar with the works of the great masters interpreted last evening were, it is safe to say, the most delighted. But even the novice in musical art must have caught something of the thought and spirit of Haydn and Mozart and Beethoven, set forth as they were with marvellous accuracy of effect and the greatest artistic skill.

The rise and progress of the symphony was clearly illustrated by the presentation successively of Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13, Mozart's symphony in G minor and Beethoven's Fifth symphony in C minor. This was, of course, and any sense of weariness that might have been felt had a trio of large works of less significance been offered was agreeably avoided last evening. Entire justice was given to "Papa Haydn's" flowing measures; the familiar largo could hardly have been interpreted with more breadth, evenness and fulness of tone—expression and the allegretto, taken at one of the briskest of paces, afforded delightful evidence of the orchestra's skill and the director's art in gaining new effects from effects from the best-known themes. Mozart could hardly have been more aptly represented than by the G minor symphony, which many account his best work in this line, and the performance, in its delicacy and fineness of appreciation of the composer's thought, was a great achievement indeed. But the greater triumphs of the occasion were gained with Beethoven. No one who is at all a student of music is ignorant of the rank which this Fifth symphony holds among the works of the great master. And the interpretation was worthy the masterpiece. Where all was done so well it is difficult to single out especial excellences. But the effect attained in that wonderful transition from the scherzo to the finale was so magnificent, and so roused the audience to eager listening, that no review of this memorable concert would be adequate which did not record this fact, and express new admiration for the marvellous way in which this great orchestra, as under a wizard's wand, is made to express the highest thought and aspirations of Beethoven's genius. There was enthusiastic appreciation for the achievements of the concert. Though the programme was longer than usual, they were but few in number who did not remain to the close, and thus carry away with them the memory of one of the noblest interpretations of the great finale to the Beethoven symphony that has ever been given in this musical city.

A Programme of Cumulative Interest,

This week Mr. Nikisch is to give a programme that, whatever else it may lack, will assuredly not be wanting in novelty. One would say that the director had it in mind to alternate standard works with the achievements of latter-day composers in his concert arrangements. Svendsen's "Norwegian Rhapsody" (given for the first time) and Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture are to be performed by the orchestra. The symphony will be Goetz', in F. Mr. Leo Schultz, the soloist of the occasion, will be heard in a 'cello concerto by Eckert, and Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," for violincello and orchestra—both of these works being new here. The

First "Young People's Popular"

is to occur on Wednesday afternoon next, and will prove an event of great interest. Those who are numbered among the unsuccessful seekers after Symphony tickets will now have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra to exceptional advantage. The overture to "The Barber of Seville," the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried" idyl, and Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"—these are certainly admirable selections. Mme. Carl Alves is to sing an aria by Rossini, and a series of songs to pianoforte accompaniment, and Mr. Charles Mole is to be heard in a new fantasy for flute and orchestra on themes from Weber's "Oberon."

THE EVENING MAIL,
TORONTO, NOVEMBER 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLUB.

From Our Own Correspondent.

HAMILTON, Nov. 6.—This famous orchestral club played here last night in the Grand Opera house, but were faced by an audience of the thinnest description. Doubtless the fear that they would be treated to high classical music kept many away, but those who were present enjoyed a rich performance. All the pieces rendered were good, the violin solo of Mr. de Seve being the choicest number. Mr. Lax evidently thought it beneath his dignity to play to a mere handful of listeners, and after playing a few preliminary bars of the flute solo set opposite his name on the programme turned his back on the audience without apology or explanation and walked away. His bad taste was rewarded by some pronounced hissing, but the greater part of the audience rewarded him with silent contempt.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To the Editor of The Mail.

SIR,—A letter of enquiry indicates that the small club announced to give a concert in Toronto in November is understood by some to be the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The inappropriate name chosen by this small company is well calculated to mislead the public. For this reason will you oblige me by stating that it has no connection whatever with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This organization, under direction of Herr Arthur Nikisch, will be heard for the first time in Toronto in May next, when it will appear under the management of Messrs. I. Suckling & Sons. Yours, etc.,

CHARLES A. ELLIS,
Manager Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD,
BOSTON, NOVEMBER 10, 1889.

The Symphony Concerts and Mr. Nikisch's Programmes—Otto Hegner's Second Boston Appearance—"The Golah" and Francis Wilson Coming—News, Gossip and Comment.

The fifth of the season's symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening, had for a programme the following:

Symphony in G.....Haydn
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Symphony No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven

Mr. Nikisch has stated that his only desire is to present such programmes at these concerts as the patrons of the season desire, and he finds a justification in the course he has pursued in the large audiences and great applause which have been characteristic of the eight public performances of the orchestra already given. Unfortunately, Mr. Nikisch has not yet come to properly appreciate the politeness of Boston audiences. He will in time come to distinguish between the complimentary applause of his patrons and that which honestly expresses their appreciation. In last evening's programme he, however, hit upon a happy scheme to disarm criticism upon his action in one particular. The proper position of the symphony in these progammes has been a subject of discussion among local critics for several seasons. It has been held that the symphony should begin the programme, that it should end it, and that it should be put in the middle of the selections. All parties were recognized in last evening's arrangement, so Mr. Nikisch must be credited with at least one successful effort in programme making. Every appeal for lighter and better constructed programmes in these concerts is met invariably in certain quarters with a certain amount of ridicule, and the serious character of the programmes is defended as if the symphony concerts made a department of Harvard University, where only the tastes of the most studious devotees of music should be recognized. The public, however, is not exclusively composed of musical students, and it is unfair to ignore the demands of any large proportion of the patrons of these concerts. Messrs. Zerrahn, Henschel, Thomas, Bernhard Listemann and Neuendorff have always recognized the existence of other than musical students in preparing their most classical programmes, and Mr. Nikisch will do well to make a study of these competent conductors, rather than to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor.

In the playing of the three symphonies of last evening, Mr. Nikisch was at his best in his reading of that by Haydn, to which he gave his most intelligent direction, and brought out all its simple, easily comprehended beauties with remarkable success. The largo movement showed the excellence of the 'cello players in the most admirable fashion, and throughout the opening symphony of the evening the orchestra and its leader gave the utmost satisfaction. In the Mozart symphony, there was less cause to commend the new conductor, the graceful, romantic ideas of the composer being, at times, given far too pronounced a rendering to please those familiar with earlier performances of the work under local directors. The great fifth symphony took on a strange and surprising character in the interpretation it received on this occasion. It has had many performances here by musicians who have won the respect of American audiences by their eminent abilities. None of these have found the hidden meaning of its composer which Mr. Nikisch appears to have discovered. It may be that Mr. Nikisch is entirely right, and he certainly got an indorsement of his ideas from last evening's audience. Yet, it is at least an open question whether such a performance of this symphony will find general acceptance here. Next week the programme is as follows: Cherubini, overture, "Anacreon"; Eckert, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, Norwegian rhapsody; Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra; Goetz, symphony in E; soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 11.

"STRAWS" AT THE SYMPHONIES.

To the Editor of the Transcript: Nowhere is the truth of the old adage, "Straws show which way the wind blows," more exemplified than at the Symphony rehearsals, for the putting on of a cape or sack, the shutting of an opera-glass case, the rattling of a programme, are all mere "straws" in themselves; and yet when these things are done in the midst of some inspiring musical passage, they stamp the doers as unmusical, in spite of all protests on their part to the contrary.

This unmusical element was especially felt during the performance of the last movement of the Fifth Symphony on Friday. It was the experience of a lifetime to hear that glorious masterpiece rendered as it was rendered that afternoon, and yet in the very midst of the superb finale many actually went out, while many others contented themselves with making ready to go, and fidgeting about in their seats until the last chord sounded and set them free.

This unmusical restlessness shows itself towards the close of every Symphony rehearsal. Are we always to suffer from it? Surely, ample opportunity is afforded those intending to leave the hall early in the pauses between the movements of the symphony, and the corridors afford sufficient room for the adjustment of wraps, etc. Will not people be kind enough to avail themselves of these opportunities, instead of continuing to mar the enjoyment of those to whom the last notes of a concert are as precious as the first? E. B. P.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I am a regular attendant at the Symphony Orchestra Rehearsals on Fridays, but being one of the unfortunates who have no reserved seats, I am compelled to go there early and stand with the crowd. During the half-hour that elapses between my arrival and the opening of the doors, I am forced being alone, to use all my natural inventiveness to pass away the time. Latterly I have taken to examining women's bonnets—an interesting, intructive, and in not a few cases an amusing occupation. I notice, with regret, the apparent return of birds to bonnets. I say birds, for not only is the whole bird put on, but in many cases there are two or even three. I remember the successful tirade that was made against the fashion last year, when the number of "birded" bonnets perceptibly diminished. It seems a pity that, with all the ornaments that milliners have at their command (and, in point of fact, simplicity is more beautiful than ostentation), they still persist in robbing the woods and fields of songsters. Another noticeable fact is the use of long hat pins. They are often put through the hats so that the point protrudes some inches in the air, and is likely to get in some one's eye. Short women should consider this. I was continually dodging, last Friday, a pin of this kind on a restless short woman's hat, and it even attracted the attention of my immediate neighbors—women themselves, who are supposed to be used to such things. I never heard of any accident happening from leaving this pin-point sticking out in the air, but I see no reason why, in a crowd, one could not happen. C. R. N.

Boston Daily Traveller.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1889.

The Fifth Symphony Concert—A Unique Programme.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert was:

Haydn. Symphony in G, No. 13. (B. & H.)
Mozart. Symphony in G minor. (K. 550.)
Beethoven. Symphony No. 5, in C minor.

There was no soloist.

There is no doubt that the first announcement of this programme startled the town; it was generally condemned. It was felt that as a community we had cast off our leading strings in music, that there was no need to receive so direct an object lesson on the form of the symphony, especially as Mr. Nikisch was passing the fifth out of twenty-four programmes without having shown as much tolerance towards composers other than German as did Mr. Gericke. But the programme found favor, the Friday afternoon audience crowded Music Hall, admission tickets even being at a premium some time before the hour of beginning the rehearsal, while the attendance on Saturday evening has seldom been equalled. Thus did Mr. Nikisch demonstrate not only that the regular habitues of Boston symphony concerts are music lovers, but that the city in general is so musically cultured and earnest as to eagerly grasp an opportunity to hear one of the plainest and strictest of programmes into which the personal element (as represented by the soloist) did not protrude. Let those who have heretofore cavilled at the sincerity of Boston symphony audiences forever hold their peace, and if the proceeding deprives some of our paragraphers of a principal resource it does not matter.

Mr. Nikisch, having planned a historical programme, made a wise juxtaposition of works. The less well-known Symphony in G by Haydn illustrates the eminent clearness of form, the melodic beauty, the naturalness and the gayety of the father of instrumental music; the G minor of Mozart is a lofty example of that composer's elegant musical diction, while its preponderating mood contrasted well with the example from happy Haydn, which it followed, and the noble Fifth of Beethoven, up to which it led. It would have been worth while to have transported Haydn from his Walhalla to hear his gentle music played as Mr. Nikisch played it; what would the old master, who ambled through thirty years of quiet life at Esterhaz, writing symphonies for an orchestra of sixteen, have said on hearing so much tone? Of course he would have been delighted. The G-minor Symphony, which was played as first written, namely, without clarinets, was, barring the too slow tempo of the first movement, exquisitely read. It is no wonder musical analysts disagree in ascribing a meaning to this work. Why go beneath the surface of the notes? Mozart does not invite such a procedure.

The reading of the Fifth Symphony was intensely vigorous, dramatic, and, at the entrance into the finale, of unparalleled dignity and breadth. The opening chords, in which Beethoven depicts the knocking of fate, were made very effective by Mr. Nikisch's manner of continuing the tone, and the way in which they were phrased on their repetition, though a departure from custom, has its justification in the free conception of the movement as a whole. The characteristics of emphasis, accent and elasticity of tempi, which are inseparable from Mr. Nikisch, were bestowed upon this interpretation of the symphony only, as it seemed to us, to make it more noble. Certainly the lead up to the finale, and the whole of that movement, were performed with extraordinary effect. The scherzo was a triumph for the basses, who not only gamboled in time and tune, but made a superb noise about it. The playing of the band throughout the concert calls for no adverse comment; in several departments, notably the 'cellos in the Haydn symphony, and the wood-wind in the andante of Beethoven's Fifth there was superlative excellence. The audience at the close of the concert recalled Mr. Nikisch several times with unwonted enthusiasm, many even cheering; the evening as a whole was an occasion to be remembered. The next programme contains three novelties, two of which will be presented by one of the new 'cello players of the orchestra, Mr. Leo Schulz, who came with Mr. Nikisch from Leipzig. In full it is: Cherubini, Overture, "Anacreon;" Eckert, concerto for violoncello (first time); Svendsen, Norwegian Rhapsody in A (first time); Bruch, Kol Nidrei for violoncello and orchestra (first time); Goetz, Symphony in F.

[CONTINUED FROM PAGE SEVEN.]

The practice of theatre people regarding the posting on their premises of announcements of coming attractions is to herald the new while the old is still saying farewell. This plan is followed by the manager of the new Opera House at Lowell, who on following nights last week had as guests the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Haverly's Minstrels. The orchestra played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony to close its concert, and as the work does not call for trombones one of the blowers upon this instrument of offence or defence thought he would improve spare minutes by strolling about Lowell. He left the theatre by a rear door and soon found himself in the main street. His eye caught sight of an attractive poster at a theatre entrance. Ha! said the mighty puckerer, this pleases me. His purse was lighter by fifty cents when he reached the inside of the Opera House where his confreres from Boston were playing the second movement of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony.

Hegner's second concert was well attended,

Boston Evening Transcript.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 13).
Mozart: Symphony in G minor (Köchel, 550).
Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor.

Mr. Nikisch's experiment of making up a programme of nothing but symphonies had, among others, one very singular result. That just those three symphonies, given in the order they were, would be hugely enjoyed by the larger part of the audience might have been foretold with tolerable certainty. The curious part of the matter was that, after all that had been said and written in various quarters about the unbearableness of more than one symphony at a concert, this programme drew an audience such as is seldom seen, even at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, except on nights when some exceptionally notable virtuoso is to perform. So far from this list of three symphonies having any terror in it, it proved to be positively an attraction, for the hall was literally thronged. This was pretty good proof of what pleasure the audience anticipated; and that they got what they came for was evidenced by their frequent and hearty applause. Seldom has the Music Hall been the scene of such enthusiasm; no high C of a robustious tenor; no breakneck antics of a strong-armed and nimble-fingered pianoforte smasher, would have called forth more ardent hand-clapping and vociferous shouting than were heard on Saturday evening. It was a great experience.

Of the performance of the Haydn symphony—our old, familiar friend of the Harvard Musical days—it can only be said that it was superb at every point; out and out the finest thing Mr. Nikisch has yet done here. It was a splendid example of immense effectiveness won by perfectly legitimate and relevant means. The playing was fiery and vigorous, without being melodramatic, and what of "romanticism" could be imparted to the music was shown forth by a well-directed incisiveness of accent and dynamic shading, not by any modern-transcendental fooling with the tempo. The effect was immediate; think of a Haydn minuet being all but encored!

With the Mozart symphony, however, we must take up once more our old complaint against modern romanticism poking its nose into places where it has no business. We are free to admit that the opening theme of the first movement sounds very lovely at the sentimentally slow tempo at which Mr. Nikisch takes it; so lovely, indeed, that one could almost forget the quite evident fact that Mozart had no notion of its going so slow (for no composer in his senses would have marked such a tempo as "Allegro molto"), were it not that this dragging out of the phrase knocks one of the most characteristic "points" in the movement fatally on the head. This is the energetic, pulsating accompaniment on the violas, the original and invigorating effect of which has long been famous. Here is a true story in point: Liszt, in his virtuoso days, once performed the daring feat of playing the whole of his own two-hand pianoforte transcription of Beethoven's pastoral symphony in the second part of a concert in Munich, immediately after the orchestra had played the same symphony in the first part. The effect was overwhelming. After the performance, Franz Lachner stepped up to Liszt and said to him, "You can do tremendous things with those wonderful ten fingers of yours; but complicated as the score of the Pastoral symphony is, and clearly as you play all its minutest details, I'll tell you one thing you can't do. You can't play the simple little first movement of Mozart's G minor symphony!" Liszt thought a moment, and then said, with one of his peculiar smiles: "Why, no! that's impossible! That viola accompaniment in the first sixteen measures would take up both my hands, and I should have nothing left to play the melody and bass with." This shows, at least, what importance two noted musicians, one of them a classicist, and the other a romantic come-outer, attributed to this viola accompaniment. Now, as Mr. Nikisch takes the leading theme, the pulsating vigor of this accompanying figure vanishes completely, and the whole impression is enfeebled and cheapened. For the rest, though, the wonderful symphony was superbly played, the minuet and finale being done the fullest justice.

Mr. Nikisch's reading of the first movement of Beethoven's C minor symphony, although wholly distasteful to us, has the authority of precedent. Would, though, that Ries (or was it Schindler?) had never given vent to that grandiose comparison of his between the first figure in this symphony and "Fate knocking at the gate!" Would also that Beethoven's reply, that his exegesis of those first four notes were of a sort that could be publicly repeated; it might act as a wholesome antidote to all highflown transcendentalism in musical interpretation. In the Andante con moto, Mr. Nikisch allowed himself to make some quite new, and, as the French say, "unpublished" effects. The most curious of these, perhaps, was the throwing into strong prominence of the second violin part, during the second variation of the principal theme, to the almost complete extinction of the theme itself. One could not help wondering whence this wholly new cantabile melody had come, and, upon the whole, what it was doing there. But the splendid manner in which Mr. Nikisch made the trumpets and horns bring out the martial second theme went far to console one for such little vagaries. The Scherzo went admirably, if the tempo was a little slow at times, and wherever Beethoven writes "un poco," Mr. Nikisch persists in reading "molto." But the Finale was glorious throughout, and carried everything before it. Anything more grandly exhilarating were hard to imagine. The audience clapped, stamped and shouted like mad.

The next programme is: Cherubini, overture to "Anacreon"; Eckert, concerto for 'cello; Svendsen, rhapsodie norvégienne; Bruch, Kol Nidrei, for 'cello and orchestra; Goetz, symphony in F. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist.

For the first concert in the popular series to be given on Wednesday afternoon, in the Music Hall, the programme includes four works for orchestra—Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; the "Siegfried Idyll" and overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Invitation to the Dance," Von Weber, instrumented by Berlioz. Mr. Molé will play a fantasia for flute and orchestra by Damersseman on themes from Von Weber's "Oberon." Mrs. Alves will sing an aria from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," with orchestra, and a group of songs with pianoforte.

[21]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1889.

THE same member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the best musicians of the Hub, whom we quoted in last Wednesday's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, supplements his remarks about Conductor Arthur Nikisch by the following interesting observations: "It would delight you to see how Nikisch carries everything in his memory; he conducts everything, be it old, new or in manuscript, without score and with a certainty and attention to the slightest details which are absolutely stunning. If in our orchestra, under Gericke's direction, warmth and power of expression were often wanting, you will certainly now be more than satisfied in this regard under Nikisch. With him the expression 'warmth' is no longer expressive enough, for Nikisch is absolutely 'fiery' when he conducts, and he inflames the orchestra. You should now hear our contrabassi and our long necked instruments; while formerly, as you well know, they always were kept nearly muzzled, they are now allowed to speak out loud, when the right for so doing is accorded them in the score. In fact, I am reminded of Münchhausen's old study of the tone that had been frozen in the postilion's bugle and which thawed out when he entered the warm inn."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch made his first "Young People's Popular" concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme in full was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria, "Samson and Dalila" ..... Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried idyll ..... Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert fantasia, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Mole.
Songs, with piano, Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner

Mr. Nikisch has evidently much to learn as a conductor of popular concerts, and he could sit at the feet of Adolp Neuendorff in this particular with great profit. To be sure, he made an attractive programme, but in doing so he selected compositions with which he has, apparently, little sympathy, and for which he has less admiration. His best work by far was in the overture to the "Barber"—which has rarely had a better hearing here. His reading of the somewhat long drawn out and uninteresting "Siegfried Idyll," was far from pleasing, its themes being given with but poor expression, and the composition as a whole suffering from a lack of finish and nicety of detail in its interpolation. The familiar "Invitation to Dance," which it is to be hoped will some time give way in these programmes to a good waltz by Strauss, Waldteufel, or even an American composer, was played roughly and without that rhythmical expression which many conductors of American propensities have given it. Even the "Rienzi" overture had a dull and spiritless performance, and altogether Mr. Nikisch did not add to his reputation by his first attempt at a popular programme. The disappointment in regard to the orchestral programme was, however, largely atoned for by the welcome surprise given in the singing of the vocalist of the day. Mme. Alves has not been known to the Boston concert stage before this occasion, but she will be a welcome assistant in future concert events. She has a thoroughly pleasing contralto voice, well rounded and of good volume, trained with skill and amply fitted to respond to all the singer's demands upon it. The lovely air from Saint-Saens "Sampson and Dalila" was sung with delightful expression and artistic finish in delivery, the phrasing of the number proving the singer to be a musician of good parts as well. The group of songs with piano accompaniment included Grieg's "The Old Song," Schumann's "It Cannot Be," and Rheinberger's "Wiederfinden," all of which were pleasingly sung, in the Grieg song the singer was particularly successful, and some good English ballads would have been heard with delight from one so conscientious in enunciating the vernacular. M. Mole gave great satisfaction in the fantasie on "Oberon" themes, and Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for affording an opportunity to hear this great artist in so pleasing a composition.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14.

MR. NIKISCH'S "POPULAR."

A Bright, Well-Arranged Programme Applauded at Music Hall.

All the resources of the superb Boston Symphony orchestra were drawn upon by Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon. It was the first "Young People's Popular" of the present season, and there was a large audience, though the Music Hall held no such throngs as at the symphony concerts. A programme of varied interest had been prepared for the occasion. That Mr. Nikisch's idea of "popular" music differed decidedly from that entertained by Mr. Gericke was made evident enough in the announcement of the offerings. That the Leipzic director is a firm believer in the maxim, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well," the brilliant performances of the orchestra demonstrated very clearly. The "Barber of Seville" overture was given with the true dash and spirit and brilliancy. Berlioz's effective setting of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with its rhythm and swing admirably maintained, found a most delicate interpretation. Wagner was represented on the programme by the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Rienzi" overture. It would be difficult to commend too highly the delicacy, grace and feeling imparted to the idyl; as for the latter, which closed the concert, every orchestral effect seemed to be brought into requisition. Whether Mr. Nikisch agrees or not in Wagner's opinion that "Rienzi" was a youthful sin, he certainly believes in giving the music of the opera its full value as the composer scored it. Mme. Carl Alves was heard with orchestral accompaniment in an aria from St. Saëns' opera, "Samson and Dalila," and was heard with piano-forte accompaniment in a group of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger. Mme. Alves has a fine contralto, and sang with expression

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889

THE FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In spite of the threatening weather yesterday afternoon, a great many people found their way to Music Hall for the first "Young People's Popular." The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria—("Samson and Dalila") ..... Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a). Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
(b). "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano—
"The Old Song" ..... Grieg
"It Cannot Be" ..... Schumann
"Wiederfinden" ..... Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture—"Rienzi" ..... Wagner

The concert was very satisfactory from beginning to end, with the possible exception of Mme. Alves's songs. This lady—who has, by the way, a most beautiful enunciation—sang the Saint-Saëns aria in an interesting manner, with pure intonation and sufficient dramatic force, although her voice itself sounds at times a trifle hard. The charming Rheinberger song was also admirably sung, but the Grieg song was not interpreted as one might have wished, while the beautiful "Ich kaunn's nicht fassen, nicht glauben"—one of Schumann' immortal songs—was rendered in the most disagreeable "English ballad" style, with abundance of cheap sentimentality and offensive phrasing; in short, the lady misunderstood it completely. Her accompanist—probably her husband—is the possessor of a piano technique which savors more strongly of the back parlor than the concert stage, and his collaboration was distinctly detrimental. Concert fantasies for solo wind instruments are apt to be merely a succession of chromatic fireworks and the like, without any musical value. M. Molé, however, in selecting the fantasy on themes from "Oberon," showed excellent taste, as the work is very well constructed and does not offend in any way. There is of course a cadenza which shows off the technical possibilities of the instrument, but, on the whole, it is arranged with good, musicianly taste and feeling. M. Molé played it astonishingly well. He has a wonderfully beautiful tone, and his technique is simply colossal. The work is exceptionally difficult, but he performed it as if it were mere child's play. He was loudly applauded at the end, which he thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers were all delightful; and one could not fail to be impressed with Mr. Nikisch's immense versatility. The delicate wood-wind effects in Rossini's familiar overture were brought out with wonderful precision, and the "Invitation to the Dance" was a perfect picture of orchestral coloring. The stirring "Rienzi" overture was—well one might justly say—gorgeously played, and at its close the brass played as if they intended to cancel five year of repression at one stroke. The chief interest of the programme, however, centred in the "Siegfried Idyll," and here Mr. Nikisch made good all the promises which his "Meistersinger Vorspiel" gave, of a most superior and almost living understanding and interpretation of the works of the Bayreuth master. The whole orchestra and especially the solo-wind players played throughout in the most finished and careful manner, and the reading was very beautiful with its warmth of color and its rich shadings. Mr. Nikisch was received with great applause.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14.

"Young People's Popular."

The first of three concerts in the afternoon, outside of the regular performances, was given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Carl Alves of New York and Mons. Mole, flutist. The house was packed, and it was a rare treat to hear familiar selections given in the splendid manner of this organization. Mrs. Alves had a pleasant reception, giving first the aria from Samson and Delilah, by Saint Saens, and afterward some songs with the piano. Mrs. Alves sings with a deal of musical expression. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and she gave great pleasure to the audience. She is an artist of much merit, and her renditions at the Music Hall concerts confirmed the good impression formed by her appearance at the Taunton festival. The flute solo was enthusiastically received, and there was no lack of enthusiasm during the entire performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

The Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon —The Two Soloists.

The symphony orchestra is by no means descending from its high mission in giving, once in a while a concert in which the lighter works of merit are presented, and those who enjoyed the "concert of the three symphonies" last Saturday had a great pleasure, even if it was of a different sort, in hearing Weber and Rossini yesterday afternoon. As I heard the overture to the "Barber of Seville" through closed doors, having arrived a trifle late, I will not attempt an analysis of its performance, but content myself with beginning with the second number on the programme, which was the celebrated mezzo soprano aria from St. Saëns "Samson and Delilah." Madame Alves has a broad voice well under control. Her intonation is excellent, her enunciation perfect, her shading artistic. She made a success in the aria, giving it with a sympathetic power and nobility that made it especially effective, nor must I omit to mention the excellence of the orchestral accompaniment in which the chromatic figure which constantly recurs was splendidly played. Now comes the finest part of the whole programme, two works of as much beauty and brilliancy as anything that has been heard at the symphony concerts. The first of these was Wagner's Siegfried Idylle, written for his wife, as a birthday surprise and first played in their little villa in Switzerland, it proves how thoroughly sincere Wagner was in his theories, for here was something not intended for the public eye (he for a long time refused to allow its publication), a celebration of his son Siegfried, of his wife, and of their happy life in Switzerland, yet every point of leit motif treatment and of freedom of modulation is present in it. In order that readers may understand the scope of the work more thoroughly I subjoin a translation (which I made some time ago for Mr. Gericke) of the poem with which Wagner dedicated the work to his wife:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming,
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising,
Which in this music I have now set free?

And, in the cadenee, I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee:
And all the harmonies I now am bringing
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

Under such circumstances it may readily be imagined that the score is not a very heavy one, yet the most beautiful effects are produced in it. Most appropriate are the themes used. The first one is the "Melody of Peace," and there is just an intimation of the heroism of love in the single appearance of the "Slumber motif" from "Die Walküre." The full beauty of the work shines forth when the sweet theme of "Siegfried des Welten-hortes" is reached, and is repeated again and again with that reiteration which only the genius of a Wagner could keep from monotony. The combination of this motif with the first one, and the touches upon the themes of "Love's Resolve" and the "Song of the Birds" make the whole work tell a succinct story. Most nobly did Mr. Nikisch interpret this, and the delicious augmentation at the close and the refined diminuendo were all that heart could wish.

Then came in scintillating splendor what Berlioz has made out of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the most brilliant piece of modern orchestration of its school. I cannot tell in detail how piccolo, harp, strings, etc., followed each other in obligato phases, and how dashingly yet poetically Mr. Nikisch read it; let all the lauditory adjectives be imagined here, they can hardly be made too strong. As usual, a large number of auditors were deceived by the double ending, and applauded too soon. It would be wise to omit these final regrets of the dancer altogether, for the full cadence before its time is really not much better than a practical joke made quite out of place. Mr. Molé, the great flutist, won a great success in a brilliant set of variations on the mermaid theme from Oberon. All the flouture were clear; trills, runs, and every kind of flute fireworks were given in a way that proved the flute player a virtuoso of the very first rank.

Then came Madame Alves in a group of three German lieder, in which a shade more of passion might have been demanded, and then as finale the overture to Rienzi, which was read with all the breadth and loftiness of which our new conductor is such a master. Decidedly the first popular concert of this season was a great, an overwhelming success. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The Adamowski Quartet.

Schumann's quartet in A minor opened the interesting programme at the first concert of the Adamowski quartet yesterday evening in Steinert Hall. The first and fourth movements were particularly well given, but the whole interpretation deserves to be characterized as artistic. Brahm's piano quartet, in A major, which closed the entertainment, proved rather an uninteresting work. It was too long for one thing, though nothing but praise can well be accorded the work of Miss Obrion, the pianist, and Messrs. Adamowski and Kuntz. It was a pleasure to listen to Eliot Hubbard's singing of the Franz songs. He was in very good voice and gained well deserved applause. J. Adamowski's 'cello solos were given with smoothness and expression, and the artist received evidences of very warm appreciation. A word should be said in commendation of the excellent piano accompaniment. Altogether, the Adamowski series certainly opened auspiciously.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being—

Rossini: Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
Saint-Saëns: Aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Weber-Berlioz: Invitation à la Valse.
Demerssemann: Concert fantasia for flute on themes from "Oberon."
Songs with pianoforte:
Grieg: The Old Song.
Schumann: "It cannot be."
Rheinberger: Wiederfinden.
Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

Mme. Carl Alvès was the singer, and M. Charles Molé the flutist.

It was good to hear that old theatre hack, which has been so often made to ring up the curtain on "tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited," played for once by a real orchestra, and superbly played, too. The Rossini brightness of melody could be given well enough by the little theatre bands that we have usually heard play the piece, but it took the Symphony Orchestra to show us the Rossini sensuousness and warmth of color—as in that voluptuous phrase in thirds, on the woodwind, just before the crescendo—ann the true Rossini vim, dash and sparkle, in the crescendo itself. Wagner's poetic Siegfried Idyll was exquisitely played, and produced, perhaps, a profounder impression than ever before. We missed only one charming effect, which, often as the Idyll has been played here, we have not heard emphasized for its full value since the piece was first given by the old Harvard Musical orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn. About the middle of the piece there is a little episode in which the first horn plays one of Siegfried's motives, which the flute and clarinet surround with reminiscences of the birds' song; these bird notes come thicker and thicker, as one after the other of the woodland choristers chimes in, until at last there comes a measure in which there is a general chorus of joyous twittering, such as you may sometimes hear on the Common when a hundred or so of English sparrows get together in one tree—we heard it yesterday afternoon on our way home from the concert. This delightful little imitative effect, produced by trills and tremolos on the wood-wind and strings, is one of the "points" of the Idyall; but yesterday it was passed over in a way that made it quite imperceptible. Berlioz's masterly orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," was splendidly played; and the audience, for the thousand-and-first time, spoilt the poetic close of the piece by premature applause, although Mr. Nikisch (prepared, doubtless, by experience for such an irruption), did his best to prevent them by indicating as plainly as plain could be, that something more was coming. These last measures of the "Invitation" seemed doomed to mishap, in one way or another. We remembers when Tausig played his brilliant arrangement of it at the Sing-Aka-demie in Berlin, and the opposite trouble occurred. Tausig's arrangement ends with the last fortissimo chord, omitting the little piano reminiscence of the theme of the Introduction; well, on this occasion the Berlin audience were so confidently expecting the usual piano peroration that, when Tausig had struck the last great D-flat chord, not a soul applauded, but every one waited in breathless expectation of the next few measures, until Tausig smilingly indicated that all was over; then the applause came like an avalanche. Wagner's brilliant, if in places rather vulgar, "Risnj" overture was grandly given, Mr. Nikisch producing a stupendous effect by his well graduated holding back of the tempo at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme. But, coarse and often trivial as much of this overture is, the slow Introduction certainly one of the grandest movements in all Wagner's earlier work; and it was played grandly as it deserved.

The aria from Saint-Saën's "Samson and Delilah" is one of the earnest and most dramatic things we have yet heard from his pen. The melody has, in places, all the intense dramatic power of Meyerbeer at his best, while the orchestra is all aglow with rich, warm color. These Frenchmen have a sense for tone-color that is wholly their own, and, as it would seem, inimitable. In matters of orchestration Wagner is, in sense, hors concours; but the other notable modern German masters of the orchestra certainly fall behind the French in one respect. Take Goldmark, for instance, weo can take rank with the best of his countrymen in his handling of the orchestra—his orchestration is rich and sensuous enaugh in all conscience, but, as Swinburne said of Ben Jonson's poetry, it has all the beauty of the rose, but no perfume, no individual aroma—and this the orcheftration of Frenchmen like Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Massenet, not to speak of Berlioz, almost invariably has. Per contra, Saint-Saëns shows, in this aria, the besetting vice of his countrfimen, an occasional tendency toward the trivial. That little chromatic run on the flute and clarinet that pervades the middle part of the aria is dramatically apposite and suggestive as possible—it is the ophidian fascination of Delilah, but it is not suggestive in a truly poetic way; its musical triviality is too apparent for that. Mme. Alvès, who has a contralto voice of surpassing richness, sang the aria with genuine maestria, in a word, magnificently; it was one of the finest bits of singing we have ever heard in the Music Hall. In the songs with pianoforte, however, it must be admitted that her conception of the music was wholly astray.

for in Florence, with an occasional visit to the larger European cities. Pall Mall Important events of the musical season will be the series of concerts to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the concerts by this superb organization seem to have become more popular than ever, and music lovers will look forward with pleasure to the four concerts in this city. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of seats, and will also receive by mail in advance of each concert a programme book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. The subscription will close on November 30.

[21]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1889.

THE same member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the best musicians of the Hub, whom we quoted in last Wednesday's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, supplements his remarks about Conductor Arthur Nikisch by the following interesting observations: "It would delight you to see how Nikisch carries everything in his memory; he conducts everything, be it old, new or in manuscript, without score and with a certainty and attention to the slightest details which are absolutely stunning. If in our orchestra, under Gericke's direction, warmth and power of expression were often wanting, you will certainly now be more than satisfied in this regard under Nikisch. With him the expression 'warmth' is no longer expressive enough, for Nikisch is absolutely 'fiery' when he conducts, and he inflames the orchestra. You should now hear our contrabassi and our long necked instruments; while formerly, as you well know, they always were kept nearly muzzled, they are now allowed to speak out loud, when the right for so doing is accorded them in the score. In fact, I am reminded of Münchhausen's old study of the tone that had been frozen in the postilion's bugle and which thawed out when he entered the warm inn."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch made his first "Young People's Popular" concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme in full was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried idyll.....Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert fantasia, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Mole.
Songs, with piano,
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

Mr. Nikisch has evidently much to learn as a conductor of popular concerts, and he could sit at the feet of Adolp Neuendorff in this particular with great profit. To be sure, he made an attractive programme, but in doing so he selected compositions with which he has, apparently, little sympathy, and for which he has less admiration. His best work by far was in the overture to the "Barber"—which has rarely had a better hearing here. His reading of the somewhat long drawn out and uninteresting "Siegfried Idyll," was far from pleasing, its themes being given with but poor expression, and the composition as a whole suffering from a lack of finish and nicety of detail in its interpolation. The familiar "Invitation to Dance," which it is to be hoped will some time give way in these programmes to a good waltz by Strauss, Waldteufel, or even an American composer, was played roughly and without that rhythmical expression which many conductors of American propensities have given it. Even the "Rienzi" overture had a dull and spiritless performance, and altogether Mr. Nikisch did not add to his reputation by this first attempt at a popular programme. The disappointment in regard to the orchestral programme was, however, largely atoned for by the welcome surprise given in the singing of the vocalist of the day. Mme. Alves has not been known to the Boston concert stage before this occasion, but she will be a welcome assistant in future concert events. She has a thoroughly pleasing contralto voice, well rounded and of good volume, trained with skill and amply fitted to respond to all the singer's demands upon it. The lovely air from Saint-Saens "Sampson and Dalila" was sung with delightful expression and artistic finish in delivery, the phrasing of the number proving the singer to be a musician of good parts as well. The group of songs with piano accompaniment included Greig's "The Old Song," Schumann's "It Cannot Be," and Rheinberger's "Wiederfinden," all of which were pleasingly sung. In the Greig song the singer was particularly successful, and some good English ballads would have been heard with delight from one so conscientious in enunciating the vernacular. M. Mole gave great satisfaction in the fantasie on "Oberon" themes, and Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for affording an opportunity to hear this great artist in so pleasing a composition.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14.

MR. NIKISCH'S "POPULAR."

A Bright, Well-Arranged Programme Applauded at Music Hall.

All the resources of the superb Boston Symphony orchestra were drawn upon by Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon. It was the first "Young People's Popular" of the present season, and there was a large audience, though the Music Hall held no such throngs as at the symphony concerts. A programme of varied interest had been prepared for the occasion. That Mr. Nikisch's idea of "popular" music differed decidedly from that entertained by Mr. Gericke was made evident enough in the announcement of the offering. That the Leipzic director is a firm believer in the maxim, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well," the brilliant performances of the orchestra demonstrated very clearly. The "Barber of Seville" overture was given with the true Rossini spirit and brilliancy. Berlioz's effective setting of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with its rhythm and swing perfectly maintained, found a most delightful interpretation. Wagner was represented on the programme by the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Rienzi" overture. It would be difficult to commend too highly the delicacy, grace and feeling imparted to the idyl; as for the overture, which closed the concert, every possible orchestral effect seemed to be brought into requisition. Whether Mr. Nikisch agrees or not in Wagner's opinion that "Rienzi" was a youthful sin, he certainly believes in giving the music of the opera its full value as the composer scored it. Mme. Carl Alves sang with orchestral accompaniment an air from St. Saens' opera, "Samson and Delilah," and was heard with piano-forte accompaniment in a brace of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger. Mme. Alves made a very agreeable impression. Her voice is a rich sympathetic contralto, and [illegible] artistic expression. [illegible] flute virtuoso, gained

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14 1889

THE FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In spite of the threatening weather yesterday afternoon, a great many people found their way to Music Hall for the first "Young People's Popular." The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria—("Samson and Dalila").....Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a). Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
(b). "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano—
"The Old Song".....Grieg
"It Cannot Be".....Schumann
"Wiederfinden".....Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture—"Rienzi".....Wagner

The concert was very satisfactory from beginning to end, with the possible exception of Mme. Alves's songs. This lady—who has, by the way, a most beautiful enunciation—sang the Saint-Saëns aria in an interesting manner, with pure intonation and sufficient dramatic force, although her voice itself sounds at times a trifle hard. The charming Rheinberger song was also admirably sung, but the Grieg song was not interpreted as one might have wished, while the beautiful "Ich kaunn's nicht fassen, nicht glauben"—one of Schumann' immortal songs—was rendered in the most disagreeable "English ballad" style, with abundance of cheap sentimentality and offensive phrasing; in short, the lady misunderstood it completely. Her accompanist—probably her husband—is the possessor of a piano technique which savors more strongly of the back parlor than the concert stage, and his collaboration was distinctly detrimental. Concert fantasies for solo wind instruments are apt to be merely a succession of chromatic fireworks and the like, without any musical value. M. Molé, however, in selecting the fantasy on themes from "Oberon," showed excellent taste, as the work is very well constructed and does not offend in any way. There is of course a cadenza which shows off the technical possibilities of the instrument, but, on the whole, it is arranged with good, musicianly taste and feeling. M. Molé played it astonishingly well. He has a wonderfully beautiful tone, and his technique is simply colossal. The work is exceptionally difficult, but he performed it as if it were mere child's play. He was loudly applauded at the end, which he thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers were all delightful; and one could not fail to be impressed with Mr. Nikisch's immense versatility. The delicate wood-wind effects in Rossini's familiar overture were brought out with wonderful precision, and the "Invitation to the Dance" was a perfect picture of orchestral coloring. The stirring "Rienzi" overture was—well one might justly say—gorgeously played, and at its close the brass played as if they intended to cancel five year of repression at one stroke. The chief interest of the programme, however, centred in the "Siegfried Idyll," and here Mr. Nikisch made good all the promises which his "Meistersinger Vorspiel" gave, of a most superior and almost living understanding and interpretation of the works of the Bayreuth master. The whole orchestra and especially the solo-wind players played throughout in the most finished and careful manner, and the reading was very beautiful with its warmth of color and its rich shadings. Mr. Nikisch was received with great applause.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14.

"Young People's Popular."

The first of three concerts in the afternoon, outside of the regular performances, was given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Carl Alves of New York and Mons. Mole, flutist. The house was packed, and it was a rare treat to hear familiar selections given in the splendid manner of this organization. Mrs. Alves had a pleasant reception, giving first the aria from Samson and Delilah, by Saint Saens, and afterward some songs with the piano. Mrs. Alves sings with a deal of musical expression. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and she gave great pleasure to the audience. She is an artist of much merit, and her renditions at the Music Hall concerts confirmed the good impression formed by her appearance at the Taunton festival. The flute solo was enthusiastically received, and there was no lack of enthusiasm during the entire performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

The Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon —The Two Soloists.

The symphony orchestra is by no means descending from its high mission in giving, once in a while a concert in which the lighter works of merit are presented, and those who enjoyed the "concert of the three symphonies" last Saturday had a great pleasure, even if it was of a different sort, in hearing Weber and Rossini yesterday afternoon. As I heard the overture to the "Barber of Seville" through closed doors, having arrived a trifle late, I will not attempt an analysis of its performance, but content myself with beginning with the second number on the programme, which was the celebrated mezzo soprano aria from St. Saëns "Samson and Delilah." Madame Alves has a broad voice well under control. Her intonation is excellent, her enunciation perfect, her shading artistic. She made a success in the aria, giving it with a sympathetic power and nobility that made it especially effective, nor must I omit to mention the excellence of the orchestral accompaniment in which the chromatic figure which constantly recurs was splendidly played. Now comes the finest part of the whole programme, two works of as much beauty and brilliancy as anything that has been heard at the symphony concerts. The first of these was Wagner's Siegfried Idylle, written for his wife, as a birthday surprise and first played in their little villa in Switzerland, it proves how thoroughly sincere Wagner was in his theories, for here was something not intended for the public eye (he for a long time refused to allow its publication), a celebration of his son Siegfried, of his wife, and of their happy life in Switzerland, yet every point of leit motif treatment and of freedom of modulation is present in it. In order that readers may understand the scope of the work more thoroughly I subjoin a translation (which I made some time ago for Mr. Gericke) of the poem with which Wagner dedicated the work to his wife:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.
Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming,
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising,
Which in this music I have now set free.

And, in the cadence, I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee;
And all the harmonies I now am bringing
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

Under such circumstances it may readily be imagined that the score is not a very heavy one, yet the most beautiful effects are produced in it. Most appropriate are the themes used. The first one is the "Melody of Peace," and there is just an intimation of the heroism of love in the single appearance of the "Slumber motif" from "Die Walküre." The full beauty of the work shines forth when the sweet theme of "Siegfried des Welten-hortes" is reached, and is repeated again and again with that reiteration which only the genius of a Wagner could keep from monotony. The combination of this motif with the first one, and the touches upon the themes of "Love's Resolve" and the "Song of the Birds" make the whole work tell a succinct story. Most nobly did Mr. Nikisch interpret this, and the delicious augmentation at the close and the refined diminuendo were all that heart could wish.

Then came in scintillating splendor what Berlioz has made out of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the most brilliant piece of modern orchestration of its school. I cannot tell in detail how piccolo, harp, strings, etc., followed each other in obligato phases, and how dashingly yet poetically Mr. Nikisch read it; let all the lauditory adjectives be imagined here, they can hardly be made too strong. As usual, a large number of auditors were deceived by the double ending, and applauded too soon. It would be wise to omit these final regrets of the dancer altogether, for the full cadence before its time is really not much better than a practical joke made quite out of place. Mr. Molé, the great flutist, won a great success in a brilliant set of variations on the mermaid theme from Oberon. All the flouture were clear; trills, runs, and every kind of flute fireworks were given in a way that proved the flute player a virtuoso of the very first rank.

Then came Madame Alves in a group of three German lieder, in which a shade more of passion might have been demanded, and then as finale the overture to Rienzi, which was read with all the breadth and loftiness of which our new conductor is such a master. Decidedly the first popular concert of this season was a great, an overwhelming success. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The Adamowski Quartet.

Schumann's quartet in A minor opened the interesting programme at the first concert of the Adamowski quartet yesterday evening in Steinert Hall. The first and fourth movements were particularly well given, but the whole interpretation deserves to be characterized as artistic. Brahm's piano quartet, in A major, which closed the entertainment, proved rather an uninteresting work. It was too long for one thing, though nothing but praise can well be accorded the work of Miss Obrion, the pianist, and Messrs. Adamowski and Kuntz. It was a pleasure to listen to Eliot Hubbard's singing of the Franz songs. He was in very good voice and gained well deserved applause. J. Adamowski's 'cello solos were given with smoothness and expression, and the artist received evidences of very warm appreciation. A word should be said in commendation of the excellent piano accompaniment. Altogether, the Adamowski series certainly opened auspiciously.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being—

Rossini: Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
Saint-Saëns: Aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Weber-Berlioz: Invitation à la Valse.
Demerssemann: Concert fantasia for flute on themes from "Oberon."
Songs with pianoforte:
Grieg: The Old Song.
Schumann: "It cannot be."
Rheinberger: Wiederfinden.
Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

Mme. Carl Alvès was the singer, and M. Charles Molé the flutist.

It was good to hear that old theatre hack, which has been so often made to ring up the curtain on "tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited," played for once by a real orchestra, and superbly played, too. The Rossini brightness of melody could be given well enough by the little theatre bands that we have usually heard play the piece, but it took the Symphony Orchestra to show us the Rossini sensuousness and warmth of color—as in that voluptuous phrase in thirds, on the woodwind, just before the crescendo—ann the true Rossini vim, dash and sparkle, in the crescendo itself. Wagner's poetic Siegfried Idyll was exquisitely played, and produced, perhaps, a profounder impression than ever before. We missed only one charming effect, which, often as the Idyll has been played here, we have not heard emphasized for its full value since the piece was first given by the old Harvard Musical orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn. About the middle of the piece there is a little episode in which the first horn plays one of Siegfried's motives, which the flute and clarinet surround with reminiscences of the birds' song; these bird notes come thicker and thicker, as one after the other of the woodland choristers chimes in, until at last there comes a measure in which there is a general chorus of joyous twittering, such as you may sometimes hear on the Common when a hundred or so of English sparrows get together in one tree—we heard it yesterday afternoon on our way home from the concert. This delightful little imitative effect, produced by trills and tremolos on the wood-wind and strings, is one of the "points" of the Idyall; but yesterday it was passed over in a way that made it quite imperceptible. Berlioz's masterly orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," was splendidly played; and the audience, for the thousand-and-first time, spoilt the poetic close of the piece by premature applause, although Mr. Nikisch (prepared, doubtless, by experience for such an irruption), did his best to prevent them by indicating as plainly as plain could be, that something more was coming. These last measures of the "Invitation" seemed doomed to mishap, in one way or another. We remembers when Tausig played his brilliant arrangement of it at the Sing-Aka-demie in Berlin, and the opposite trouble occurred. Tausig's arrangement ends with the last fortissimo chord, omitting the little piano reminiscence of the theme of the Introduction; well, on this occasion the Berlin audience were so confidently expecting the usual piano peroration that, when Tausig had struck the last great D-flat chord, not a soul applauded, but every one waited in breathless expectation of the next few measures, until Tausig smilingly indicated that all was over; then the applause came like an avalanche. Wagner's brilliant, if in places rather vulgar, "Risnj" overture was grandly given, Mr. Nikisch producing a stupendous effect by his well graduated holding back of the tempo at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme. But, coarse and often trivial as much of this overture is, the slow Introduction certainly one of the grandest movements in all Wagner's earlier work; and it was played grandly as it deserved.

The aria from Saint-Saën's "Samson and Delilah" is one of the earnest and most dramatic things we have yet heard from his pen. The melody has, in places, all the intense dramatic power of Meyerbeer at his best, while the orchestra is all aglow with rich, warm color. These Frenchmen have a sense for tone-color that is wholly their own, and, as it would seem, inimitable. In matters of orchestration Wagner is, in sense, hors concours; but the other notable modern German masters of the orchestra certainly fall behind the French in one respect. Take Goldmark, for instance, wee can take rank with the best of his countrymen in his handling of the orchestra—his orchestration is rich and sensuous enaugh in all conscience, but, as Swinburne said of Ben Jonson's poetry, it has all the beauty of the rose, but no perfume, no individual aroma—and this the orcheftration of Frenchmen like Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Massenet, not to speak of Berlioz, almost invariably has. Per contra, Saint-Saëns shows, in this aria, the besetting vice of his countrfimen, an occasional tendency toward the trivial. That little chromatic run on the flute and clarinet that pervades the middle part of the aria is dramatically apposite and suggestive as possible—it is the ophidian fascination of Delilah, but it is not suggestive in a truly poetic way; its musical triviality is too apparent for that. Mme. Alvès, who has a contralto voice of surpassing richness, sang the aria with genuine maestria, in a word, magnificently; it was one of the finest bits of singing we have ever heard in the Music Hall. In the songs with pianoforte, however, it must be admitted that her conception of the music was wholly astray.

[illegible] in Florence, with an occasional visit to the larger European cities. Pall Mall Important events of the musical season will be the series of concerts to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the concerts by this superb organization seem to have become more popular than ever, and music lovers will look forward with pleasure to the four concerts in this city. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of seats, and will also receive by mail in advance of each concert a programme book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. The subscription will close on November 30.

[21]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1889.

THE same member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the best musicians of the Hub, whom we quoted in last Wednesday's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, supplements his remarks about Conductor Arthur Nikisch by the following interesting observations: "It would delight you to see how Nikisch carries everything in his memory; he conducts everything, be it old, new or in manuscript, without score and with a certainty and attention to the slightest details which are absolutely stunning. If in our orchestra, under Gericke's direction, warmth and power of expression were often wanting, you will certainly now be more than satisfied in this regard under Nikisch. With him the expression 'warmth' is no longer expressive enough, for Nikisch is absolutely 'fiery' when he conducts, and he inflames the orchestra. You should now hear our contrabassi and our long necked instruments; while formerly, as you well know, they always were kept nearly muzzled, they are now allowed to speak out loud, when the right for so doing is accorded them in the score. In fact, I am reminded of Münchhausen's old study of the tone that had been frozen in the postilion's bugle and which thawed out when he entered the warm inn."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch made his first "Young People's Popular" concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme in full was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Dalila" ..... Saint-Saens
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried idyll ..... Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert fantasia, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersleman
(First time.)
M. Mole.
Songs, with piano,
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner

Mr. Nikisch has evidently much to learn as a conductor of popular concerts, and he could sit at the feet of Adolp Neuendorff in this particular with great profit. To be sure, he made an attractive programme, but in doing so he selected compositions with which he has, apparently, little sympathy, and for which he has less admiration. His best work by far was in the overture to the "Barber"—which has rarely had a better hearing here. His reading of the somewhat long drawn out and uninteresting "Siegfried Idyll," was far from pleasing, its themes being given with but poor expression, and the composition as a whole suffering from a lack of finish and nicety of detail in its interpolation. The familiar "Invitation to Dance," which it is to be hoped will some time give way in these programmes to a good waltz by Strauss, Waldteufel, or even an American composer, was played roughly and without that rhythmical expression which many conductors of American propensities have given it. Even the "Rienzi" overture had a dull and spiritless performance, and altogether Mr. Nikisch did not add to his reputation by this first attempt at a popular programme. The disappointment in regard to the orchestral programme was, however, largely atoned for by the welcome surprise given in the singing of the vocalist of the day. Mme. Alves has not been known to the Boston concert stage before this occasion, but she will be a welcome assistant in future concert events. She has a thoroughly pleasing contralto voice, well rounded and of good volume, trained with skill and amply fitted to respond to all the singer's demands upon it. The lovely air from Saint-Saens "Sampson and Dalila" was sung with delightful expression and artistic finish in delivery, the phrasing of the number proving the singer to be a musician of good parts as well. The group of songs with piano accompaniment included Greig's "The Old Song," Schumann's "It Cannot Be," and Rheinberger's "Wiederfinden," all of which were pleasingly sung. In the Greig song the singer was particularly successful, and some good English ballads would have been heard with delight from one so conscientious in enunciating the vernacular. M. Mole gave great satisfaction in the fantasie on "Oberon" themes, and Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for affording an opportunity to hear this great artist in so pleasing a composition.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14.

MR. NIKISCH'S "POPULAR."

A Bright, Well-Arranged Programme Applauded at Music Hall.

All the resources of the superb Boston Symphony orchestra were drawn upon by Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon. It was the first "Young People's Popular" of the present season, and there was a large audience, though the Music Hall held no such throngs as at the symphony concerts. A programme of varied interest had been prepared for the occasion. That Mr. Nikisch's idea of "popular" music differed decidedly from that entertained by Mr. Gericke was made evident enough in the announcement of the offering. That the Leipzic director is a firm believer in the maxim, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well," the brilliant performances of the orchestra demonstrated very clearly. The "Barber of Seville" overture was given with the true Rossini spirit and brilliancy. Berlioz's effective setting of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with its rhythm and swing perfectly maintained, found a most delightful interpretation. Wagner was represented on the programme by the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Rienzi" overture. It would be difficult to commend too highly the delicacy, grace and feeling imparted to the idyl; as for the overture, which closed the concert, every possible orchestral effect seemed to be brought into requisition. Whether Mr. Nikisch agrees or not in Wagner's opinion that "Rienzi" was a youthful sin, he certainly believes in giving the music of the opera its full value as the composer scored it. Mme. Carl Alves sang with orchestral accompaniment an air from St. Saens' opera, "Samson and Delilah," and was heard with piano-forte accompaniment in a brace of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger. Mme. Alves made a very agreeable impression. Her voice is a rich, sympathetic contralto, and she sings with true artistic expression. [illegible] the flute virtuoso, gained [illegible] by a brilliant performance [illegible] orchestra accompaniment.

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889

THE FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In spite of the threatening weather yesterday afternoon, a great many people found their way to Music Hall for the first "Young People's Popular." The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria—("Samson and Dalila") ..... Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a). Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
(b). "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano—
"The Old Song" ..... Grieg
"It Cannot Be" ..... Schumann
"Wiederfinden" ..... Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture—"Rienzi" ..... Wagner

The concert was very satisfactory from beginning to end, with the possible exception of Mme. Alves's songs. This lady—who has, by the way, a most beautiful enunciation—sang the Saint-Saëns aria in an interesting manner, with pure intonation and sufficient dramatic force, although her voice itself sounds at times a trifle hard. The charming Rheinberger song was also admirably sung, but the Grieg song was not interpreted as one might have wished, while the beautiful "Ich kaunn's nicht fassen, nicht glauben"—one of Schumann' immortal songs—was rendered in the most disagreeable "English ballad" style, with abundance of cheap sentimentality and offensive phrasing; in short, the lady misunderstood it completely. Her accompanist—probably her husband—is the possessor of a piano technique which savors more strongly of the back parlor than the concert stage, and his collaboration was distinctly detrimental. Concert fantasies for solo wind instruments are apt to be merely a succession of chromatic fireworks and the like, without any musical value. M. Molé, however, in selecting the fantasy on themes from "Oberon," showed excellent taste, as the work is very well constructed and does not offend in any way. There is of course a cadenza which shows off the technical possibilities of the instrument, but, on the whole, it is arranged with good, musicianly taste and feeling. M. Molé played it astonishingly well. He has a wonderfully beautiful tone, and his technique is simply colossal. The work is exceptionally difficult, but he performed it as if it were mere child's play. He was loudly applauded at the end, which he thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers were all delightful; and one could not fail to be impressed with Mr. Nikisch's immense versatility. The delicate wood-wind effects in Rossini's familiar overture were brought out with wonderful precision, and the "Invitation to the Dance" was a perfect picture of orchestral coloring. The stirring "Rienzi" overture was—well one might justly say—gorgeously played, and at its close the brass played as if they intended to cancel five year of repression at one stroke. The chief interest of the programme, however, centred in the "Siegfried Idyll," and here Mr. Nikisch made good all the promises which his "Meistersinger Vorspiel" gave, of a most superior and almost living understanding and interpretation of the works of the Bayreuth master. The whole orchestra and especially the solo-wind players played throughout in the most finished and careful manner, and the reading was very beautiful with its warmth of color and its rich shadings. Mr. Nikisch was received with great applause.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14,

"Young People's Popular."

The first of three concerts in the afternoon, outside of the regular performances, was given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Carl Alves of New York and Mons. Mole, flutist. The house was packed, and it was a rare treat to hear familiar selections given in the splendid manner of this organization. Mrs. Alves had a pleasant reception, giving first the aria from Samson and Delilah, by Saint Saens, and afterward some songs with the piano. Mrs. Alves sings with a deal of musical expression. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and she gave great pleasure to the audience. She is an artist of much merit, and her renditions at the Music Hall concerts confirmed the good impression formed by her appearance at the Taunton festival. The flute solo was enthusiastically received, and there was no lack of enthusiasm during the entire performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

The Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon —The Two Soloists.

The symphony orchestra is by no means descending from its high mission in giving, once in a while a concert in which the lighter works of merit are presented, and those who enjoyed the "concert of the three symphonies" last Saturday had a great pleasure, even if it was of a different sort, in hearing Weber and Rossini yesterday afternoon. As I heard the overture to the "Barber of Seville" through closed doors, having arrived a trifle late, I will not attempt an analysis of its performance, but content myself with beginning with the second number on the programme, which was the celebrated mezzo soprano aria from St. Saëns "Samson and Delilah." Madame Alves has a broad voice well under control. Her intonation is excellent, her enunciation perfect, her shading artistic. She made a success in the aria, giving it with a sympathetic power and nobility that made it especially effective, nor must I omit to mention the excellence of the orchestral accompaniment in which the chromatic figure which constantly recurs was splendidly played. Now comes the finest part of the whole programme, two works of as much beauty and brilliancy as anything that has been heard at the symphony concerts. The first of these was Wagner's Siegfried Idylle, written for his wife, as a birthday surprise and first played in their little villa in Switzerland, it proves how thoroughly sincere Wagner was in his theories, for here was something not intended for the public eye (he for a long time refused to allow its publication), a celebration of his son Siegfried, of his wife, and of their happy life in Switzerland, yet every point of leit motif treatment and of freedom of modulation is present in it. In order that readers may understand the scope of the work more thoroughly I subjoin a translation (which I made some time ago for Mr. Gericke) of the poem with which Wagner dedicated the work to his wife:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming.
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For Him and thee in tones I now am praising.
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising,
Which in this music I have now set free?

And, in the cadence, I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee;
And all the harmonies I now am blending
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

Under such circumstances it may readily be imagined that the score is not a very heavy one, yet the most beautiful effects are produced in it. Most appropriate are the themes used. The first one is the "Melody of Peace," and there is just an intimation of the heroism of love in the single appearance of the "Slumber motif" from "Die Walküre." The full beauty of the work shines forth when the sweet theme of "Siegfried des Welten-hortes" is reached, and is repeated again and again with that reiteration which only the genius of a Wagner could keep from monotony. The combination of this motif with the first one, and the touches upon the themes of "Love's Resolve" and the "Song of the Birds" make the whole work tell a succinct story. Most nobly did Mr. Nikisch interpret this, and the delicious augmentation at the close and the refined diminuendo were all that heart could wish.

Then came in scintillating splendor what Berlioz has made out of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the most brilliant piece of modern orchestration of its school. I cannot tell in detail how piccolo, harp, strings, etc., followed each other in obligato phases, and how dashingly yet poetically Mr. Nikisch read it; let all the lauditory adjectives be imagined here, they can hardly be made too strong. As usual, a large number of auditors were deceived by the double ending, and applauded too soon. It would be wise to omit these final regrets of the dancer altogether, for the full cadence before its time is really not much better than a practical joke made quite out of place. Mr. Molé, the great flutist, won a great success in a brilliant set of variations on the mermaid theme from Oberon. All the flouture were clear; trills, runs, and every kind of flute fireworks were given in a way that proved the flute player a virtuoso of the very first rank.

Then came Madame Alves in a group of three German lieder, in which a shade more of passion might have been demanded, and then as finale the overture to Rienzi, which was read with all the breadth and loftiness of which our new conductor is such a master. Decidedly the first popular concert of this season was a great, an overwhelming success. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The Adamowski Quartet.

Schumann's quartet in A minor opened the interesting programme at the first concert of the Adamowski quartet yesterday evening in Steinert Hall. The first and fourth movements were particularly well given, but the whole interpretation deserves to be characterized as artistic. Brahm's piano quartet, in A major, which closed the entertainment, proved rather an uninteresting work. It was too long for one thing, though nothing but praise can well be accorded the work of Miss Obrion, the pianist, and Messrs. Adamowski and Kuntz. It was a pleasure to listen to Eliot Hubbard's singing of the Franz songs. He was in very good voice and gained well-deserved applause. J. Adamowski's 'cello solos were given with smoothness and expression, and the artist received evidences of very warm appreciation. A word should be said in commendation of the excellent piano accompaniment. Altogether, the Adamowski series certainly opened auspiciously.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being—

Rossini: Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
Saint-Saëns: Aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Weber-Berlioz: Invitation à la Valse.
Demerssemann: Concert fantasia for flute on themes from "Oberon."
Songs with pianoforte:
Grieg: The Old Song.
Schumann: "It cannot be."
Rheinberger: Wiederfinden.
Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

Mme. Carl Alvès was the singer, and M. Charles Molé the flutist.

It was good to hear that old theatre hack, which has been so often made to ring up the curtain on "tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited," played for once by a real orchestra, and superbly played, too. The Rossini brightness of melody could be given well enough by the little theatre bands that we have usually heard play the piece, but it took the Symphony Orchestra to show us the Rossini sensuousness and warmth of color—as in that voluptuous phrase in thirds, on the woodwind, just before the crescendo—ann the true Rossini vim, dash and sparkle, in the crescendo itself. Wagner's poetic Siegfried Idyll was exquisitely played, and produced, perhaps, a profounder impression than ever before. We missed only one charming effect, which, often as the Idyll has been played here, we have not heard emphasized for its full value since the piece was first given by the old Harvard Musical orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn. About the middle of the piece there is a little episode in which the first horn plays one of Siegfried's motives, which the flute and clarinet surround with reminiscences of the birds' song; these bird notes come thicker and thicker, as one after the other of the woodland choristers chimes in, until at last there comes a measure in which there is a general chorus of joyous twittering, such as you may sometimes hear on the Common when a hundred or so of English sparrows get together in one tree—we heard it yesterday afternoon on our way home from the concert. This delightful little imitative effect, produced by trills and tremolos on the wood-wind and strings, is one of the "points" of the Idyall; but yesterday it was passed over in a way that made it quite imperceptible. Berlioz's masterly orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," was splendidly played; and the audience, for the thousand-and-first time, spoilt the poetic close of the piece by premature applause, although Mr. Nikisch (prepared, doubtless, by experience for such an irruption), did his best to prevent them by indicating as plainly as plain could be, that something more was coming. These last measures of the "Invitation" seemed doomed to mishap, in one way or another. We remembers when Tausig played his brilliant arrangement of it at the Sing-Aka-demie in Berlin, and the opposite trouble occurred. Tausig's arrangement ends with the last fortissimo chord, omitting the little piano reminiscence of the theme of the Introduction; well, on this occasion the Berlin audience were so confidently expecting the usual piano peroration that, when Tausig had struck the last great D-flat chord, not a soul applauded, but every one waited in breathless expectation of the next few measures, until Tausig smilingly indicated that all was over; then the applause came like an avalanche. Wagner's brilliant, if in places rather vulgar, "Risnj" overture was grandly given, Mr. Nikisch producing a stupendous effect by his well graduated holding back of the tempo at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme. But, coarse and often trivial as much of this overture is, the slow Introduction certainly one of the grandest movements in all Wagner's earlier work; and it was played grandly as it deserved.

The aria from Saint-Saën's "Samson and Delilah" is one of the earnest and most dramatic things we have yet heard from his pen. The melody has, in places, all the intense dramatic power of Meyerbeer at his best, while the orchestra is all aglow with rich, warm color. These Frenchmen have a sense for tone-color that is wholly their own, and, as it would seem, inimitable. In matters of orchestration Wagner is, in sense, hors concours; but the other notable modern German masters of the orchestra certainly fall behind the French in one respect. Take Goldmark, for instance, we can take rank with the best of his countrymen in his handling of the orchestra—his orchestration is rich and sensuous enaugh in all conscience, but, as Swinburne said of Ben Jonson's poetry, it has all the beauty of the rose, but no perfume, no individual aroma—and this the orcheftration of Frenchmen like Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Massenet, not to speak of Berlioz, almost invariably has. Per contra, Saint-Saëns shows, in this aria, the besetting vice of his countrfimen, an occasional tendency toward the trivial. That little chromatic run on the flute and clarinet that pervades the middle part of the aria is dramatically apposite and suggestive as possible—it is the ophidian fascination of Delilah, but it is not suggestive in a truly poetic way; its musical triviality is too apparent for that. Mme. Alvès, who has a contralto voice of surpassing richness, sang the aria with genuine maestria, in a word, magnificently; it was one of the finest bits of singing we have ever heard in the Music Hall. In the songs with pianoforte, however, it must be admitted that her conception of the music was wholly astray.

[illegible] in Florence, with an occasional visit to the larger European cities. Philadelphia

Important events of the musical season will be the series of concerts to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the concerts by this superb organization seem to have become more popular than ever, and music lovers will look forward with pleasure to the four concerts in this city. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of seats, and will also receive by mail in advance of each concert a programme book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. The subscription will close on November 30.

[21]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1889.

THE same member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the best musicians of the Hub, whom we quoted in last Wednesday's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, supplements his remarks about Conductor Arthur Nikisch by the following interesting observations: "It would delight you to see how Nikisch carries everything in his memory; he conducts everything, be it old, new or in manuscript, without score and with a certainty and attention to the slightest details which are absolutely stunning. If in our orchestra, under Gericke's direction, warmth and power of expression were often wanting, you will certainly now be more than satisfied in this regard under Nikisch. With him the expression 'warmth' is no longer expressive enough, for Nikisch is absolutely 'fiery' when he conducts, and he inflames the orchestra. You should now hear our contrabassi and our long necked instruments; while formerly, as you well know, they always were kept nearly muzzled, they are now allowed to speak out loud, when the right for so doing is accorded them in the score. In fact, I am reminded of Münchhausen's old study of the tone that had been frozen in the postilion's bugle and which thawed out when he entered the warm inn."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch made his first "Young People's Popular" concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme in full was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Dalila" ..... Saint-Saens
Mme. Alves.
[illegible] Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
"Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert fantasia, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano,
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner

Mr. Nikisch has evidently much to learn as a conductor of popular concerts, and he could sit at the feet of Adolp Neuendorff in this particular with great profit. To be sure, he made an attractive programme, but in doing so he selected compositions with which he has, apparently, little sympathy, and for which he has less admiration. His best work by far was in the overture to the "Barber"—which has rarely had a better hearing here. His reading of the somewhat long drawn out and uninteresting "Siegfried Idyll," was far from pleasing, its themes being given with but poor expression, and the composition as a whole suffering from a lack of finish and nicety of detail in its interpolation. The popular "Invitation to Dance," which it is to be hoped will some time give way in these programmes to a good waltz by Strauss, Waldteufel, or even an American composer, was played roughly and without that rhythmical expression which many conductors of American propensities have given it. Even the "Rienzi" overture had a dull and spiritless performance, and altogether Mr. Nikisch did not add to his reputation by this first attempt at a popular programme. The disappointment in regard to the orchestral programme was, however, largely atoned for by the welcome surprise given in the singing of the vocalist of the day. Mme. Alves has not been known to the Boston concert stage before this occasion, but she will be a welcome assistant in future concert events. She has a thoroughly pleasing contralto voice, well rounded and of good volume, trained with skill and amply fitted to respond to all the singer's demands upon it. The lovely air from Saint-Saens "Sampson and Dalila" was sung with delightful expression and artistic finish in delivery, the phrasing of the number proving the singer to be a musician of good parts as well. The group of songs with piano accompaniment included Grieg's "The Old Song," Schumann's "It Cannot Be," and Rheinberger's "Wiederfinden," all of which were pleasingly sung, in the Grieg song the singer was particularly successful, and some good English ballads would have been heard with delight from one so conscientious in enunciating the vernacular. M. Molé gave great satisfaction in the fantasie on "Oberon" themes, and Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for affording an opportunity to hear this great artist in so pleasing a composition.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14.

MR. NIKISCH'S "POPULAR."

A Bright, Well-Arranged Programme Applauded at Music Hall.

All the resources of the superb Boston Symphony orchestra were drawn upon by Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon. It was the first "Young People's Popular" of the present season, and there was a large audience, though the Music Hall held no such throngs as at the symphony concerts. A programme of varied interest had been prepared for the occasion. That Mr. Nikisch's idea of "popular" music differed decidedly from that entertained by Mr. Gericke was made evident enough in the announcement of the offering. That the Leipzic director is a firm believer in the maxim, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well," the brilliant performances of the orchestra demonstrated very clearly. The "Barber of Seville" overture was given with the true spirit and exuberancy. Berlioz's effective setting of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with its rhythm and swing ably maintained, found a most delightful interpretation. Wagner was represented on the programme by the "Siegfried" idyl—and the "Rienzi" overture. It would be difficult to commend too highly the delicacy, grace and feeling imparted to the idyl; as for the overture, which closed the concert, every orchestral effect seemed to be brought into requisition. Whether Mr. Nikisch is right or not in Wagner's opinion that "Rienzi" was a youthful sin, he certainly believes in giving the music of the opera its full value as the composer scored it. Mme. Carl Alves was heard with orchestral accompaniment, in the Saint-Saëns opera, "Samson and Dalila," and was heard with piano-forte accompaniment in a group of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger. Mme. Alves has a very agreeable impression. Her voice is a fine contralto and [illegible] artistic expression. [illegible]

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

THE FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In spite of the threatening weather yesterday afternoon, a great many people found their way to Music Hall for the first "Young People's Popular." The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria—("Samson and Dalila") ..... Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a). Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
(b). "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano—
"The Old Song" ..... Grieg
"It Cannot Be" ..... Schumann
"Wiederfinden" ..... Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture—"Rienzi" ..... Wagner

The concert was very satisfactory from beginning to end, with the possible exception of Mme. Alves's songs. This lady—who has, by the way, a most beautiful enunciation—sang the Saint-Saëns aria in an interesting manner, with pure intonation and sufficient dramatic force, although her voice itself sounds at times a trifle hard. The charming Rheinberger song was also admirably sung, but the Grieg song was not interpreted as one might have wished, while the beautiful "Ich kaunn's nicht fassen, nicht glauben"—one of Schumann' immortal songs—was rendered in the most disagreeable "English ballad" style, with abundance of cheap sentimentality and offensive phrasing; in short, the lady misunderstood it completely. Her accompanist—probably her husband—is the possessor of a piano technique which savors more strongly of the back parlor than the concert stage, and his collaboration was distinctly detrimental. Concert fantasies for solo wind instruments are apt to be merely a succession of chromatic fireworks and the like, without any musical value. M. Molé, however, in selecting the fantasy on themes from "Oberon," showed excellent taste, as the work is very well constructed and does not offend in any way. There is of course a cadenza which shows off the technical possibilities of the instrument, but, on the whole, it is arranged with good, musicianly taste and feeling. M. Molé played it astonishingly well. He has a wonderfully beautiful tone, and his technique is simply colossal. The work is exceptionally difficult, but he performed it as if it were mere child's play. He was loudly applauded at the end, which he thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers were all delightful; and one could not fail to be impressed with Mr. Nikisch's immense versatility. The delicate wood-wind effects in Rossini's familiar overture were brought out with wonderful precision, and the "Invitation to the Dance" was a perfect picture of orchestral coloring. The stirring "Rienzi" overture was—well one might justly say—gorgeously played, and at its close the brass played as if they intended to cancel five year of repression at one stroke. The chief interest of the programme, however, centred in the "Siegfried Idyll," and here Mr. Nikisch made good all the promises which his "Meistersinger Vorspiel" gave, of a most superior and almost living understanding and interpretation of the works of the Bayreuth master. The whole orchestra and especially the solo-wind players played throughout in the most finished and careful manner, and the reading was very beautiful with its warmth of color and its rich shadings. Mr. Nikisch was received with great applause.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14.

"Young People's Popular."

The first of three concerts in the afternoon, outside of the regular performances, was given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Carl Alves of New York and Mons. Mole, flutist. The house was packed, and it was a rare treat to hear familiar selections given in the splendid manner of this organization. Mrs. Alves had a pleasant reception, giving first the aria from Samson and Delilah, by Saint Saens, and afterward some songs with the piano. Mrs. Alves sings with a deal of musical expression. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and she gave great pleasure to the audience. She is an artist of much merit, and her renditions at the Music Hall concerts confirmed the good impression formed by her appearance at the Taunton festival. The flute solo was enthusiastically received, and there was no lack of enthusiasm during the entire performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

The Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon —The Two Soloists.

The symphony orchestra is by no means descending from its high mission in giving, once in a while a concert in which the lighter works of merit are presented, and those who enjoyed the "concert of the three symphonies" last Saturday had a great pleasure, even if it was of a different sort, in hearing Weber and Rossini yesterday afternoon. As I heard the overture to the "Barber of Seville" through closed doors, having arrived a trifle late, I will not attempt an analysis of its performance, but content myself with beginning with the second number on the programme, which was the celebrated mezzo soprano aria from St. Saëns "Samson and Delilah." Madame Alves has a broad voice well under control. Her intonation is excellent, her enunciation perfect, her shading artistic. She made a success in the aria, giving it with a sympathetic power and nobility that made it especially effective, nor must I omit to mention the excellence of the orchestral accompaniment in which the chromatic figure which constantly recurs was splendidly played. Now comes the finest part of the whole programme, two works of as much beauty and brilliancy as anything that has been heard at the symphony concerts. The first of these was Wagner's Siegfried Idylle, written for his wife, as a birthday surprise and first played in their little villa in Switzerland, it proves how thoroughly sincere Wagner was in his theories, for here was something not intended for the public eye (he for a long time refused to allow its publication), a celebration of his son Siegfried, of his wife, and of their happy life in Switzerland, yet every point of leit motif treatment and of freedom of modulation is present in it. In order that readers may understand the scope of the work more thoroughly I subjoin a translation (which I made some time ago for Mr. Gericke) of the poem with which Wagner dedicated the work to his wife:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming,
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising,
Which in this music I have now set free?

And, in the cadence, I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee;
And all the harmonies I now am bringing
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

Under such circumstances it may readily be imagined that the score is not a very heavy one, yet the most beautiful effects are produced in it. Most appropriate are the themes used. The first one is the "Melody of Peace," and there is just an intimation of the heroism of love in the single appearance of the "Slumber motif" from "Die Walküre." The full beauty of the work shines forth when the sweet theme of "Siegfried des Welten-hortes" is reached, and is repeated again and again with that reiteration which only the genius of a Wagner could keep from monotony. The combination of this motif with the first one, and the touches upon the themes of "Love's Resolve" and the "Song of the Birds" make the whole work tell a succinct story. Most nobly did Mr. Nikisch interpret this, and the delicious augmentation at the close and the refined diminuendo were all that heart could wish.

Then came in scintillating splendor what Berlioz has made out of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the most brilliant piece of modern orchestration of its school. I cannot tell in detail how piccolo, harp, strings, etc., followed each other in obligato phases, and how dashingly yet poetically Mr. Nikisch read it; let all the lauditory adjectives be imagined here, they can hardly be made too strong. As usual, a large number of auditors were deceived by the double ending, and applauded too soon. It would be wise to omit these final regrets of the dancer altogether, for the full cadence before its time is really not much better than a practical joke made quite out of place. Mr. Molé, the great flutist, won a great success in a brilliant set of variations on the mermaid theme from Oberon. All the flouture were clear; trilis, runs, and every kind of flute fireworks were given in a way that proved the flute player a virtuoso of the very first rank.

Then came Madame Alves in a group of three German lieder, in which a shade more of passion might have been demanded, and then as finale the overture to Rienzi, which was read with all the breadth and loftiness of which our new conductor is such a master. Decidedly the first popular concert of this season was a great, an overwhelming success. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The Adamowski Quartet.

Schumann's quartet in A minor opened the interesting programme at the first concert of the Adamowski quartet yesterday evening in Steinert Hall. The first and fourth movements were particularly well given, but the whole interpretation deserves to be characterized as artistic. Brahm's piano quartet, in A major, which closed the entertainment, proved rather an uninteresting work. It was too long for one thing, though nothing but praise can well be accorded the work of Miss Obrion, the pianist, and Messrs. Adamowski and Kuntz. It was a pleasure to listen to Eliot Hubbard's singing of the Franz songs. He was in very good voice and gained well deserved applause. J. Adamowski's 'cello solos were given with smoothness and expression, and the artist received evidences of very warm appreciation. A word should be said in commendation of the excellent piano accompaniment. Altogether, the Adamowski series certainly opened auspiciously.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being—

Rossini: Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
Saint-Saëns: Aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Weber-Berlioz: Invitation à la Valse.
Demerssemann: Concert fantasia for flute on themes from "Oberon."
Songs with pianoforte:
Grieg: The Old Song.
Schumann: "It cannot be."
Rheinberger: Wiederfinden.
Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

Mme. Carl Alvès was the singer, and M. Charles Molé the flutist.

It was good to hear that old theatre hack, which has been so often made to ring up the curtain on "tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited," played for once by a real orchestra, and superbly played, too. The Rossini brightness of melody could be given well enough by the little theatre bands that we have usually heard play the piece, but it took the Symphony Orchestra to show us the Rossini sensuousness and warmth of color—as in that voluptuous phrase in thirds, on the woodwind, just before the crescendo—ann the true Rossini vim, dash and sparkle, in the crescendo itself. Wagner's poetic Siegfried Idyll was exquisitely played, and produced, perhaps, a profounder impression than ever before. We missed only one charming effect, which, often as the Idyll has been played here, we have not heard emphasized for its full value since the piece was first given by the old Harvard Musical orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn. About the middle of the piece there is a little episode in which the first horn plays one of Siegfried's motives, which the flute and clarinet surround with reminiscences of the birds' song; these bird notes come thicker and thicker, as one after the other of the woodland choristers chimes in, until at last there comes a measure in which there is a general chorus of joyous twittering, such as you may sometimes hear on the Common when a hundred or so of English sparrows get together in one tree—we heard it yesterday afternoon on our way home from the concert. This delightful little imitative effect, produced by trills and tremolos on the wood-wind and strings, is one of the "points" of the Idyall; but yesterday it was passed over in a way that made it quite imperceptible. Berlioz's masterly orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," was splendidly played; and the audience, for the thousand-and-first time, spoilt the poetic close of the piece by premature applause, although Mr. Nikisch (prepared, doubtless, by experience for such an irruption), did his best to prevent them by indicating as plainly as plain could be, that something more was coming. These last measures of the "Invitation" seemed doomed to mishap, in one way or another. We remembers when Tausig played his brilliant arrangement of it at the Sing-Aka-demie in Berlin, and the opposite trouble occurred. Tausig's arrangement ends with the last fortissimo chord, omitting the little piano reminiscence of the theme of the Introduction; well, on this occasion the Berlin audience were so confidently expecting the usual piano peroration that, when Tausig had struck the last great D-flat chord, not a soul applauded, but every one waited in breathless expectation of the next few measures, until Tausig smilingly indicated that all was over; then the applause came like an avalanche. Wagner's brilliant, if in places rather vulgar, "Risnj" overture was grandly given, Mr. Nikisch producing a stupendous effect by his well graduated holding back of the tempo at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme. But, coarse and often trivial as much of this overture is, the slow Introduction certainly one of the grandest movements in all Wagner's earlier work; and it was played grandly as it deserved.

The aria from Saint-Saën's "Samson and Delilah" is one of the earnest and most dramatic things we have yet heard from his pen. The melody has, in places, all the intense dramatic power of Meyerbeer at his best, while the orchestra is all aglow with rich, warm color. These Frenchmen have a sense for tone-color that is wholly their own, and, as it would seem, inimitable. In matters of orchestration Wagner is, in sense, hors concours; but the other notable modern German masters of the orchestra certainly fall behind the French in one respect. Take Goldmark, for instance, woo can take rank with the best of his countrymen in his handling of the orchestra—his orchestration is rich and sensuous enaugh in all conscience, but, as Swinburne said of Ben Jonson's poetry, it has all the beauty of the rose, but no perfume, no individual aroma—and this the orcheftration of Frenchmen like Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Massenet, not to speak of Berlioz, almost invariably has. Per contra, Saint-Saëns shows, in this aria, the besetting vice of his countrfimen, an occasional tendency toward the trivial. That little chromatic run on the flute and clarinet that pervades the middle part of the aria is dramatically apposite and suggestive as possible—it is the ophidian fascination of Delilah, but it is not suggestive in a truly poetic way; its musical triviality is too apparent for that. Mme. Alvès, who has a contralto voice of surpassing richness, sang the aria with genuine maestria, in a word, magnificently; it was one of the finest bits of singing we have ever heard in the Music Hall. In the songs with pianoforte, however, it must be admitted that her conception of the music was wholly astray.

[illegible] Florence, with an occasional visit to the larger European cities. Pall Mall Important events of the musical season will be the series of concerts to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the concerts by this superb organization seem to have become more popular than ever, and music lovers will look forward with pleasure to the four concerts in this city. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of seats, and will also receive by mail in advance of each concert a programme book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. The subscription will close on November 30.

[21]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1889.

THE same member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the best musicians of the Hub, whom we quoted in last Wednesday's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, supplements his remarks about Conductor Arthur Nikisch by the following interesting observations: "It would delight you to see how Nikisch carries everything in his memory; he conducts everything, be it old, new or in manuscript, without score and with a certainty and attention to the slightest details which are absolutely stunning. If in our orchestra, under Gericke's direction, warmth and power of expression were often wanting, you will certainly now be more than satisfied in this regard under Nikisch. With him the expression 'warmth' is no longer expressive enough, for Nikisch is absolutely 'fiery' when he conducts, and he inflames the orchestra. You should now hear our contrabassi and our long necked instruments; while formerly, as you well know, they always were kept nearly muzzled, they are now allowed to speak out loud, when the right for so doing is accorded them in the score. In fact, I am reminded of Münchhausen's old study of the tone that had been frozen in the postilion's bugle and which thawed out when he entered the warm inn."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch made his first "Young People's Popular" concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme in full was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Dalila" ..... Saint-Saens
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried idyll ..... Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert fantasia, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Mole.
Songs, with piano,
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner

Mr. Nikisch has evidently much to learn as a conductor of popular concerts, and he could sit at the feet of Adolp Neuendorff in this particular with great profit. To be sure, he made an attractive programme, but in doing so he selected compositions with which he has, apparently, little sympathy, and for which he has less admiration. His best work by far was in the overture to the "Barber"—which has rarely had a better hearing here. His reading of the somewhat long drawn out and uninteresting "Siegfried Idyll," was far from pleasing, its themes being given with but poor expression, and the composition as a whole suffering from a lack of finish and nicety of detail in its interpolation. The familiar "Invitation to Dance," which it is to be hoped will some time give way in these programmes to a good waltz by Strauss, Waldteufel, or even an American composer, was played roughly and without that rhythmical expression which many conductors of American propensities have given it. Even the "Rienzi" overture had a dull and spiritless performance, and altogether Mr. Nikisch did not add to his reputation by this first attempt at a popular programme. The disappointment in regard to the orchestral programme was, however, largely atoned for by the welcome surprise given in the singing of the vocalist of the day. Mme. Alves has not been known to the Boston concert stage before this occasion, but she will be a welcome assistant in future concert events. She has a thoroughly pleasing contralto voice, well rounded and of good volume, trained with skill and amply fitted to respond to all the singer's demands upon it. The lovely air from Saint-Saens "Sampson and Dalila" was sung with delightful expression and artistic finish in delivery, the phrasing of the number proving the singer to be a musician of good parts as well. The group of songs with piano accompaniment included Greig's "The Old Song," Schumann's "It Cannot Be," and Rheinberger's "Wiederfinden," all of which were pleasingly sung, in the Greig song the singer was particularly successful, and some good English ballads would have been heard with delight from one so conscientious in enunciating the vernacular. M. Mole gave great satisfaction in the fantasie on "Oberon" themes, and Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for affording an opportunity to hear this great artist in so pleasing a composition.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14.

MR. NIKISCH'S "POPULAR."

A Bright, Well-Arranged Programme Applauded at Music Hall.

All the resources of the superb Boston Symphony orchestra were drawn upon by Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon. It was the first "Young People's Popular" of the present season, and there was a large audience, though the Music Hall held no such throngs as at the symphony concerts. A programme of varied interest had been prepared for the occasion. That Mr. Nikisch's idea of "popular" music differed decidedly from that entertained by Mr. Gericke was made evident enough in the announcement of the offering. That the Leipzic director is a firm believer in the maxim, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well," the brilliant performances of the orchestra demonstrated very clearly. The "Barber of Seville" overture was given with the true Rossini spirit and brilliancy. Berlioz's effective setting of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with its rhythm and swing perfectly maintained, found a most delightful interpretation. Wagner was represented on the programme by the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Rienzi" overture. It would be difficult to commend too highly the delicacy, grace and feeling imparted to the idyl; as for the overture, which closed the concert, every possible orchestral effect seemed to be brought into requisition. Whether Mr. Nikisch agrees or not in Wagner's opinion that "Rienzi" was a youthful sin, he certainly believes in giving the music of the opera its full value as the composer scored it. Mme. Carl Alves sang with orchestral accompaniment, an aria from St. Saens' opera, "Samson and Dalilah," and was heard with piano-forte accompaniment in a brace of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger. Mme. Alves made a very agreeable impression. Her voice is a rich, sympathetic contralto, and she sings with true artistic expression. M. Mole, the flute virtuoso, gained a brilliant performance [illegible]

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889

THE FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In spite of the threatening weather yesterday afternoon, a great many people found their way to Music Hall for the first "Young People's Popular." The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Aria—("Samson and Dalila") ..... Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a). Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
(b). "Invitation to Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon" ..... Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano—
"The Old Song" ..... Grieg
"It Cannot Be" ..... Schumann
"Wiederfinden" ..... Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture—"Rienzi" ..... Wagner

The concert was very satisfactory from beginning to end, with the possible exception of Mme. Alves's songs. This lady—who has, by the way, a most beautiful enunciation—sang the Saint-Saëns aria in an interesting manner, with pure intonation and sufficient dramatic force, although her voice itself sounds at times a trifle hard. The charming Rheinberger song was also admirably sung, but the Grieg song was not interpreted as one might have wished, while the beautiful "Ich kaunn's nicht fassen, nicht glauben"—one of Schumann' immortal songs—was rendered in the most disagreeable "English ballad" style, with abundance of cheap sentimentality and offensive phrasing; in short, the lady misunderstood it completely. Her accompanist—probably her husband—is the possessor of a piano technique which savors more strongly of the back parlor than the concert stage, and his collaboration was distinctly detrimental. Concert fantasies for solo wind instruments are apt to be merely a succession of chromatic fireworks and the like, without any musical value. M. Molé, however, in selecting the fantasy on themes from "Oberon," showed excellent taste, as the work is very well constructed and does not offend in any way. There is of course a cadenza which shows off the technical possibilities of the instrument, but, on the whole, it is arranged with good, musicianly taste and feeling. M. Molé played it astonishingly well. He has a wonderfully beautiful tone, and his technique is simply colossal. The work is exceptionally difficult, but he performed it as if it were mere child's play. He was loudly applauded at the end, which he thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers were all delightful; and one could not fail to be impressed with Mr. Nikisch's immense versatility. The delicate wood-wind effects in Rossini's familiar overture were brought out with wonderful precision, and the "Invitation to the Dance" was a perfect picture of orchestral coloring. The stirring "Rienzi" overture was—well one might justly say—gorgeously played, and at its close the brass played as if they intended to cancel five year of repression at one stroke. The chief interest of the programme, however, centred in the "Siegfried Idyll," and here Mr. Nikisch made good all the promises which his "Meistersinger Vorspiel" gave, of a most superior and almost living understanding and interpretation of the works of the Bayreuth master. The whole orchestra and especially the solo-wind players played throughout in the most finished and careful manner, and the reading was very beautiful with its warmth of color and its rich shadings. Mr. Nikisch was received with great applause.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14.

"Young People's Popular."

The first of three concerts in the afternoon, outside of the regular performances, was given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Carl Alves of New York and Mons. Mole, flutist. The house was packed, and it was a rare treat to hear familiar selections given in the splendid manner of this organization. Mrs. Alves had a pleasant reception, giving first the aria from Samson and Dehlah, by Saint Saens, and afterward some songs with the piano. Mrs. Alves sings with a deal of musical expression. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and she gave great pleasure to the audience. She is an artist of much merit, and her renditions at the Music Hall concerts confirmed the good impression formed by her appearance at the Taunton festival. The flute solo was enthusiastically received, and there was no lack of enthusiasm during the entire performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

The Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon —The Two Soloists.

The symphony orchestra is by no means descending from its high mission in giving, once in a while a concert in which the lighter works of merit are presented, and those who enjoyed the "concert of the three symphonies" last Saturday had a great pleasure, even if it was of a different sort, in hearing Weber and Rossini yesterday afternoon. As I heard the overture to the "Barber of Seville" through closed doors, having arrived a trifle late, I will not attempt an analysis of its performance, but content myself with beginning with the second number on the programme, which was the celebrated mezzo soprano aria from St. Saëns "Samson and Delilah." Madame Alves has a broad voice well under control. Her intonation is excellent, her enunciation perfect, her shading artistic. She made a success in the aria, giving it with a sympathetic power and nobility that made it especially effective, nor must I omit to mention the excellence of the orchestral accompaniment in which the chromatic figure which constantly recurs was splendidly played. Now comes the finest part of the whole programme, two works of as much beauty and brilliancy as anything that has been heard at the symphony concerts. The first of these was Wagner's Siegfried Idylle, written for his wife, as a birthday surprise and first played in their little villa in Switzerland, it proves how thoroughly sincere Wagner was in his theories, for here was something not intended for the public eye (he for a long time refused to allow its publication), a celebration of his son Siegfried, of his wife, and of their happy life in Switzerland, yet every point of leit motif treatment and of freedom of modulation is present in it. In order that readers may understand the scope of the work more thoroughly I subjoin a translation (which I made some time ago for Mr. Gericke) of the poem with which Wagner dedicated the work to his wife:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim.
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming.
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising.
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising,
Which in this music I have now set free?

And, in the cadence, I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee;
And all the harmonies I now am bringing
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

Under such circumstances it may readily be imagined that the score is not a very heavy one, yet the most beautiful effects are produced in it. Most appropriate are the themes used. The first one is the "Melody of Peace," and there is just an intimation of the heroism of love in the single appearance of the "Slumber motif" from "Die Walküre." The full beauty of the work shines forth when the sweet theme of "Siegfried des Welten-hortes" is reached, and is repeated again and again with that reiteration which only the genius of a Wagner could keep from monotony. The combination of this motif with the first one, and the touches upon the themes of "Love's Resolve" and the "Song of the Birds" make the whole work tell a succinct story. Most nobly did Mr. Nikisch interpret this, and the delicious augmentation at the close and the refined diminuendo were all that heart could wish.

Then came in scintillating splendor what Berlioz has made out of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the most brilliant piece of modern orchestration of its school. I cannot tell in detail how piccolo, harp, strings, etc., followed each other in obligato phases, and how dashingly yet poetically Mr. Nikisch read it; let all the lauditory adjectives be imagined here, they can hardly be made too strong. As usual, a large number of auditors were deceived by the double ending, and applauded too soon. It would be wise to omit these final regrets of the dancer altogether, for the full cadence before its time is really not much better than a practical joke made quite out of place. Mr. Molé, the great flutist, won a great success in a brilliant set of variations on the mermaid theme from Oberon. All the flouture were clear; trills, runs, and every kind of flute fireworks were given in a way that proved the flute player a virtuoso of the very first rank.

Then came Madame Alves in a group of three German lieder, in which a shade more of passion might have been demanded, and then as finale the overture to Rienzi, which was read with all the breadth and loftiness of which our new conductor is such a master. Decidedly the first popular concert of this season was a great, an overwhelming success. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The Adamowski Quartet.

Schumann's quartet in A minor opened the interesting programme at the first concert of the Adamowski quartet yesterday evening in Steinert Hall. The first and fourth movements were particularly well given, but the whole interpretation deserves to be characterized as artistic. Brahm's piano quartet, in A major, which closed the entertainment, proved rather an uninteresting work. It was too long for one thing, though nothing but praise can well be accorded the work of Miss Obrion, the pianist, and Messrs. Adamowski and Kuntz. It was a pleasure to listen to Eliot Hubbard's singing of the Franz songs. He was in very good voice and gained well deserved applause. J. Adamowski's 'cello solos were given with smoothness and expression, and the artist received evidences of very warm appreciation. A word should be said in commendation of the excellent piano accompaniment. Altogether, the Adamowski series certainly opened auspiciously.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being—

Rossini: Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
Saint-Saëns: Aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Weber-Berlioz: Invitation à la Valse.
Demerssemann: Concert fantasia for flute on themes from "Oberon."
Songs with pianoforte:
Grieg: The Old Song.
Schumann: "It cannot be."
Rheinberger: Wiederfinden.
Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

Mme. Carl Alvès was the singer, and M. Charles Molé the flutist.

It was good to hear that old theatre hack, which has been so often made to ring up the curtain on "tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited," played for once by a real orchestra, and superbly played, too. The Rossini brightness of melody could be given well enough by the little theatre bands that we have usually heard play the piece, but it took the Symphony Orchestra to show us the Rossini sensuousness and warmth of color—as in that voluptuous phrase in thirds, on the woodwind, just before the crescendo—ann the true Rossini vim, dash and sparkle, in the crescendo itself. Wagner's poetic Siegfried Idyll was exquisitely played, and produced, perhaps, a profounder impression than ever before. We missed only one charming effect, which, often as the Idyll has been played here, we have not heard emphasized for its full value since the piece was first given by the old Harvard Musical orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn. About the middle of the piece there is a little episode in which the first horn plays one of Siegfried's motives, which the flute and clarinet surround with reminiscences of the birds' song; these bird notes come thicker and thicker, as one after the other of the woodland choristers chimes in, until at last there comes a measure in which there is a general chorus of joyous twittering, such as you may sometimes hear on the Common when a hundred or so of English sparrows get together in one tree—we heard it yesterday afternoon on our way home from the concert. This delightful little imitative effect, produced by trills and tremolos on the wood-wind and strings, is one of the "points" of the Idyall; but yesterday it was passed over in a way that made it quite imperceptible. Berlioz's masterly orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," was splendidly played; and the audience, for the thousand-and-first time, spoilt the poetic close of the piece by premature applause, although Mr. Nikisch (prepared, doubtless, by experience for such an irruption), did his best to prevent them by indicating as plainly as plain could be, that something more was coming. These last measures of the "Invitation" seemed doomed to mishap, in one way or another. We remembers when Tausig played his brilliant arrangement of it at the Sing-Aka-demie in Berlin, and the opposite trouble occurred. Tausig's arrangement ends with the last fortissimo chord, omitting the little piano reminiscence of the theme of the Introduction; well, on this occasion the Berlin audience were so confidently expecting the usual piano peroration that, when Tausig had struck the last great D-flat chord, not a soul applauded, but every one waited in breathless expectation of the next few measures, until Tausig smilingly indicated that all was over; then the applause came like an avalanche. Wagner's brilliant, if in places rather vulgar, "Risnj" overture was grandly given, Mr. Nikisch producing a stupendous effect by his well graduated holding back of the tempo at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme. But, coarse and often trivial as much of this overture is, the slow Introduction certainly one of the grandest movements in all Wagner's earlier work; and it was played grandly as it deserved.

The aria from Saint-Saën's "Samson and Delilah" is one of the earnest and most dramatic things we have yet heard from his pen. The melody has, in places, all the intense dramatic power of Meyerbeer at his best, while the orchestra is all aglow with rich, warm color. These Frenchmen have a sense for tone-color that is wholly their own, and, as it would seem, inimitable. In matters of orchestration Wagner is, in sense, hors concours; but the other notable modern German masters of the orchestra certainly fall behind the French in one respect. Take Goldmark, for instance, weo can take rank with the best of his countrymen in his handling of the orchestra—his orchestration is rich and sensuous enaugh in all conscience, but, as Swinburne said of Ben Jonson's poetry, it has all the beauty of the rose, but no perfume, no individual aroma—and this the orcheftration of Frenchmen like Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Massenet, not to speak of Berlioz, almost invariably has. Per contra, Saint-Saëns shows, in this aria, the besetting vice of his countrfimen, an occasional tendency toward the trivial. That little chromatic run on the flute and clarinet that pervades the middle part of the aria is dramatically apposite and suggestive as possible—it is the ophidian fascination of Delilah, but it is not suggestive in a truly poetic way; its musical triviality is too apparent for that. Mme. Alvès, who has a contralto voice of surpassing richness, sang the aria with genuine maestria, in a word, magnificently; it was one of the finest bits of singing we have ever heard in the Music Hall. In the songs with pianoforte, however, it must be admitted that her conception of the music was wholly astray.

[illegible] in Florence, with an occasional visit to the larger European cities. Palladium

Important events of the musical season will be the series of concerts to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the concerts by this superb organization seem to have become more popular than ever, and music lovers will look forward with pleasure to the four concerts in this city. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of seats, and will also receive by mail in advance of each concert a programme book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. The subscription will close on November 30.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1889.

THE same member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the best musicians of the Hub, whom we quoted in last Wednesday's issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, supplements his remarks about Conductor Arthur Nikisch by the following interesting observations: "It would delight you to see how Nikisch carries everything in his memory; he conducts everything, be it old, new or in manuscript, without score and with a certainty and attention to the slightest details which are absolutely stunning. If in our orchestra, under Gericke's direction, warmth and power of expression were often wanting, you will certainly now be more than satisfied in this regard under Nikisch. With him the expression 'warmth' is no longer expressive enough, for Nikisch is absolutely 'fiery' when he conducts, and he inflames the orchestra. You should now hear our contrabassi and our long necked instruments; while formerly, as you well know, they always were kept nearly muzzled, they are now allowed to speak out loud, when the right for so doing is accorded them in the score. In fact, I am reminded of Münchhausen's old study of the tone that had been frozen in the postilion's bugle and which thawed out when he entered the warm inn."

BOSTON HERALD.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch made his first "Young People's Popular" concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme in full was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Mme. Alves.
(a) Siegfried idyll.....Wagner
(b) "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert fantasia, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Mole.
Songs, with piano,
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

Mr. Nikisch has evidently much to learn as a conductor of popular concerts, and he could sit at the feet of Adolp Neuendorff in this particular with great profit. To be sure, he made an attractive programme, but in doing so he selected compositions with which he has, apparently, little sympathy, and for which he has less admiration. His best work by far was in the overture to the "Barber"—which has rarely had a better hearing here. His reading of the somewhat long drawn out and uninteresting "Siegfried Idyll," was far from pleasing, its themes being given with but poor expression, and the composition as a whole suffering from a lack of finish and nicety of detail in its interpolation. The familiar "Invitation to Dance," which it is to be hoped will some time give way in these programmes to a good waltz by Strauss, Waldteufel, or even an American composer, was played roughly and without that rhythmical expression which many conductors of American propensities have given it. Even the "Rienzi" overture had a dull and spiritless performance, and altogether Mr. Nikisch did not add to his reputation by this first attempt at a popular programme. The disappointment in regard to the orchestral programme was, however, largely atoned for by the welcome surprise given in the singing of the vocalist of the day. Mme. Alves has not been known to the Boston concert stage before this occasion, but she will be a welcome assistant in future concert events. She has a thoroughly pleasing contralto voice, well rounded and of good volume, trained with skill and amply fitted to respond to all the singer's demands upon it. The lovely air from Saint-Saens "Sampson and Dalila" was sung with delightful expression and artistic finish in delivery, the phrasing of the number proving the singer to be a musician of good parts as well. The group of songs with piano accompaniment included Greig's "The Old Song," Schumann's "It Cannot Be," and Rheinberger's "Wiederfinden," all of which were pleasingly sung. In the Greig song the singer was particularly successful, and some good English ballads would have been heard with delight from one so conscientious in enunciating the vernacular. M. Mole gave great satisfaction in the fantasie on "Oberon" themes, and Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for affording an opportunity to hear this great artist in so pleasing a composition.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 14.

MR. NIKISCH'S "POPULAR."

A Bright, Well-Arranged Programme Applauded at Music Hall.

All the resources of the superb Boston Symphony orchestra were drawn upon by Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon. It was the first "Young People's Popular" of the present season, and there was a large audience, though the Music Hall held no such throngs as at the symphony concerts. A programme of varied interest had been prepared for the occasion. That Mr. Nikisch's idea of "popular" music differed decidedly from that entertained by Mr. Gericke was made evident enough in the announcement of the offering. That the Leipzic director is a firm believer in the maxim, "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well," the brilliant performances of the orchestra demonstrated very clearly. The "Barber of Seville" overture was given with the true Rossini spirit and brilliancy. Berlioz's effective setting of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with its rhythm and swing perfectly maintained, found a most delightful interpretation. Wagner was represented on the programme by the "Siegfried" idyl and the "Rienzi" overture. It would be difficult to commend too highly the delicacy, grace and feeling imparted to the idyl; as for the overture, which closed the concert, every possible orchestral effect seemed to be brought into requisition. Whether Mr. Nikisch agrees or not in Wagner's opinion that "Rienzi" was a youthful sin, he certainly believes in giving the music of the opera its full value as the composer scored it. Mme. Carl Alves sang with orchestral accompaniment an air from St. Saens' opera, "Samson and Delilah," and was heard with piano-forte accompaniment in a brace of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger. Mme. Alves made a very agreeable impression. Her voice is a rich, sympathetic contralto, and she sings with true artistic expression. Charles Mole, the flute virtuoso, gained much applause by a brilliant performance of a fantasy, the orchestra accompanying in a manner worthy of all praise. All in all, the concert was well done.

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889

THE FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In spite of the threatening weather yesterday afternoon, a great many people found their way to Music Hall for the first "Young People's Popular." The programme was as follows:

Overture—"Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria—("Samson and Dalila").....Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
(a). Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
(b). "Invitation to Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie, for flute and orchestra, on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
M. Molé.
Songs, with piano—
"The Old Song".....Grieg
"It Cannot Be".....Schumann
"Wiederfinden".....Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture—"Rienzi".....Wagner

The concert was very satisfactory from beginning to end, with the possible exception of Mme. Alves's songs. This lady—who has, by the way, a most beautiful enunciation—sang the Saint-Saëns aria in an interesting manner, with pure intonation and sufficient dramatic force, although her voice itself sounds at times a trifle hard. The charming Rheinberger song was also admirably sung, but the Grieg song was not interpreted as one might have wished, while the beautiful "Ich kaunn's nicht fassen, nicht glauben"—one of Schumann' immortal songs—was rendered in the most disagreeable "English ballad" style, with abundance of cheap sentimentality and offensive phrasing; in short, the lady misunderstood it completely. Her accompanist—probably her husband—is the possessor of a piano technique which savors more strongly of the back parlor than the concert stage, and his collaboration was distinctly detrimental. Concert fantasies for solo wind instruments are apt to be merely a succession of chromatic fireworks and the like, without any musical value. M. Molé, however, in selecting the fantasy on themes from "Oberon," showed excellent taste, as the work is very well constructed and does not offend in any way. There is of course a cadenza which shows off the technical possibilities of the instrument, but, on the whole, it is arranged with good, musicianly taste and feeling. M. Molé played it astonishingly well. He has a wonderfully beautiful tone, and his technique is simply colossal. The work is exceptionally difficult, but he performed it as if it were mere child's play. He was loudly applauded at the end, which he thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers were all delightful; and one could not fail to be impressed with Mr. Nikisch's immense versatility. The delicate wood-wind effects in Rossini's familiar overture were brought out with wonderful precision, and the "Invitation to the Dance" was a perfect picture of orchestral coloring. The stirring "Rienzi" overture was—well one might justly say—gorgeously played, and at its close the brass played as if they intended to cancel five year of repression at one stroke. The chief interest of the programme, however, centred in the "Siegfried Idyll," and here Mr. Nikisch made good all the promises which his "Meistersinger Vorspiel" gave, of a most superior and almost living understanding and interpretation of the works of the Bayreuth master. The whole orchestra and especially the solo-wind players played throughout in the most finished and careful manner, and the reading was very beautiful with its warmth of color and its rich shadings. Mr. Nikisch was received with great applause.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14,

"Young People's Popular."

The first of three concerts in the afternoon, outside of the regular performances, was given yesterday afternoon in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Carl Alves of New York and Mons. Mole, flutist. The house was packed, and it was a rare treat to hear familiar selections given in the splendid manner of this organization. Mrs. Alves had a pleasant reception, giving first the aria from Samson and Delilah, by Saint Saens, and afterward some songs with the piano. Mrs. Alves sings with a deal of musical expression. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, and she gave great pleasure to the audience. She is an artist of much merit, and her renditions at the Music Hall concerts confirmed the good impression formed by her appearance at the Taunton festival. The flute solo was enthusiastically received, and there was no lack of enthusiasm during the entire performance.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

THURSDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1889.

The Popular Concert Yesterday Afternoon —The Two Soloists.

The symphony orchestra is by no means descending from its high mission in giving, once in a while a concert in which the lighter works of merit are presented, and those who enjoyed the "concert of the three symphonies" last Saturday had a great pleasure, even if it was of a different sort, in hearing Weber and Rossini yesterday afternoon. As I heard the overture to the "Barber of Seville" through closed doors, having arrived a trifle late, I will not attempt an analysis of its performance, but content myself with beginning with the second number on the programme, which was the celebrated mezzo soprano aria from St. Saëns "Samson and Delilah." Madame Alves has a broad voice well under control. Her intonation is excellent, her enunciation perfect, her shading artistic. She made a success in the aria, giving it with a sympathetic power and nobility that made it especially effective, nor must I omit to mention the excellence of the orchestral accompaniment in which the chromatic figure which constantly recurs was splendidly played. Now comes the finest part of the whole programme, two works of as much beauty and brilliancy as anything that has been heard at the symphony concerts. The first of these was Wagner's Siegfried Idylle, written for his wife, as a birthday surprise and first played in their little villa in Switzerland, it proves how thoroughly sincere Wagner was in his theories, for here was something not intended for the public eye (he for a long time refused to allow its publication), a celebration of his son Siegfried, of his wife, and of their happy life in Switzerland, yet every point of leit motif treatment and of freedom of modulation is present in it. In order that readers may understand the scope of the work more thoroughly I subjoin a translation (which I made some time ago for Mr. Gericke) of the poem with which Wagner dedicated the work to his wife:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming,
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For Him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising,
Which in this music I have now set free?

And, in the cadence, I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee;
And all the harmonies I now am brinzing
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

Under such circumstances it may readily be imagined that the score is not a very heavy one, yet the most beautiful effects are produced in it. Most appropriate are the themes used. The first one is the "Melody of Peace," and there is just an intimation of the heroism of love in the single appearance of the "Slumber motif" from "Die Walküre." The full beauty of the work shines forth when the sweet theme of "Siegfried des Welten-hortes" is reached, and is repeated again and again with that reiteration which only the genius of a Wagner could keep from monotony. The combination of this motif with the first one, and the touches upon the themes of "Love's Resolve" and the "Song of the Birds" make the whole work tell a succinct story. Most nobly did Mr. Nikisch interpret this, and the delicious augmentation at the close and the refined diminuendo were all that heart could wish.

Then came in scintillating splendor what Berlioz has made out of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the most brilliant piece of modern orchestration of its school. I cannot tell in detail how piccolo, harp, strings, etc., followed each other in obligato phases, and how dashingly yet poetically Mr. Nikisch read it; let all the lauditory adjectives be imagined here, they can hardly be made too strong. As usual, a large number of auditors were deceived by the double ending, and applauded too soon. It would be wise to omit these final regrets of the dancer altogether, for the full cadence before its time is really not much better than a practical joke made quite out of place. Mr. Molé, the great flutist, won a great success in a brilliant set of variations on the mermaid theme from Oberon. All the flouture were clear; trills, runs, and every kind of flute fireworks were given in a way that proved the flute player a virtuoso of the very first rank.

Then came Madame Alves in a group of three German lieder, in which a shade more of passion might have been demanded, and then as finale the overture to Rienzi, which was read with all the breadth and loftiness of which our new conductor is such a master. Decidedly the first popular concert of this season was a great, an overwhelming success. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The Adamowski Quartet.

Schumann's quartet in A minor opened the interesting programme at the first concert of the Adamowski quartet yesterday evening in Steinert Hall. The first and fourth movements were particularly well given, but the whole interpretation deserves to be characterized as artistic. Brahm's piano quartet, in A major, which closed the entertainment, proved rather an uninteresting work. It was too long for one thing, though nothing but praise can well be accorded the work of Miss Obrion, the pianist, and Messrs. Adamowski and Kuntz. It was a pleasure to listen to Eliot Hubbard's singing of the Franz songs. He was in very good voice and gained well-deserved applause. J. Adamowski's 'cello solos were given with smoothness and expression, and the artist received evidences of very warm appreciation. A word should be said in commendation of the excellent piano accompaniment. Altogether, the Adamowski series certainly opened auspiciously.

Boston Evening Transcript.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Young People's Popular Concert in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being—

Rossini: Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
Saint-Saëns: Aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from "Samson and Delilah."
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Weber-Berlioz: Invitation à la Valse.
Demerssemann: Concert fantasia for flute on themes from "Oberon."
Songs with pianoforte:
Grieg: The Old Song.
Schumann: "It cannot be."
Rheinberger: Wiederfinden.
Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."

Mme. Carl Alvès was the singer, and M. Charles Molé the flutist.

It was good to hear that old theatre hack, which has been so often made to ring up the curtain on "tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited," played for once by a real orchestra, and superbly played, too. The Rossini brightness of melody could be given well enough by the little theatre bands that we have usually heard play the piece, but it took the Symphony Orchestra to show us the Rossini sensuousness and warmth of color—as in that voluptuous phrase in thirds, on the woodwind, just before the crescendo—ann the true Rossini vim, dash and sparkle, in the crescendo itself. Wagner's poetic Siegfried Idyll was exquisitely played, and produced, perhaps, a profounder impression than ever before. We missed only one charming effect, which, often as the Idyll has been played here, we have not heard emphasized for its full value since the piece was first given by the old Harvard Musical orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn. About the middle of the piece there is a little episode in which the first horn plays one of Siegfried's motives, which the flute and clarinet surround with reminiscences of the birds' song; these bird notes come thicker and thicker, as one after the other of the woodland choristers chimes in, until at last there comes a measure in which there is a general chorus of joyous twittering, such as you may sometimes hear on the Common when a hundred or so of English sparrows get together in one tree—we heard it yesterday afternoon on our way home from the concert. This delightful little imitative effect, produced by trills and tremolos on the wood-wind and strings, is one of the "points" of the Idyall; but yesterday it was passed over in a way that made it quite imperceptible. Berlioz's masterly orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," was splendidly played; and the audience, for the thousand-and-first time, spoilt the poetic close of the piece by premature applause, although Mr. Nikisch (prepared, doubtless, by experience for such an irruption), did his best to prevent them by indicating as plainly as plain could be, that something more was coming. These last measures of the "Invitation" seemed doomed to mishap, in one way or another. We remembers when Tausig played his brilliant arrangement of it at the Sing-Aka-demie in Berlin, and the opposite trouble occurred. Tausig's arrangement ends with the last fortissimo chord, omitting the little piano reminiscence of the theme of the Introduction; well, on this occasion the Berlin audience were so confidently expecting the usual piano peroration that, when Tausig had struck the last great D-flat chord, not a soul applauded, but every one waited in breathless expectation of the next few measures, until Tausig smilingly indicated that all was over; then the applause came like an avalanche. Wagner's brilliant, if in places rather vulgar, "Risnj" overture was grandly given, Mr. Nikisch producing a stupendous effect by his well graduated holding back of the tempo at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme. But, coarse and often trivial as much of this overture is, the slow Introduction certainly one of the grandest movements in all Wagner's earlier work; and it was played grandly as it deserved.

The aria from Saint-Saën's "Samson and Delilah" is one of the earnest and most dramatic things we have yet heard from his pen. The melody has, in places, all the intense dramatic power of Meyerbeer at his best, while the orchestra is all aglow with rich, warm color. These Frenchmen have a sense for tone-color that is wholly their own, and, as it would seem, inimitable. In matters of orchestration Wagner is, in sense, hors concours; but the other notable modern German masters of the orchestra certainly fall behind the French in one respect. Take Goldmark, for instance, weo can take rank with the best of his countrymen in his handling of the orchestra—his orchestration is rich and sensuous enaugh in all conscience, but, as Swinburne said of Ben Jonson's poetry, it has all the beauty of the rose, but no perfume, no individual aroma—and this the orcheftration of Frenchmen like Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Massenet, not to speak of Berlioz, almost invariably has. Per contra, Saint-Saëns shows, in this aria, the besetting vice of his countrfimen, an occasional tendency toward the trivial. That little chromatic run on the flute and clarinet that pervades the middle part of the aria is dramatically apposite and suggestive as possible—it is the ophidian fascination of Delilah, but it is not suggestive in a truly poetic way; its musical triviality is too apparent for that. Mme. Alvès, who has a contralto voice of surpassing richness, sang the aria with genuine maestria, in a word, magnificently; it was one of the finest bits of singing we have ever heard in the Music Hall. In the songs with pianoforte, however, it must be admitted that her conception of the music was wholly astray.

...ser in Florence, with an occasional visit to the larger European cities. Palladium Important events of the musical season will be the series of concerts to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra. Under its new conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the concerts by this superb organization seem to have become more popular than ever, and music lovers will look forward with pleasure to the four concerts in this city. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of seats, and will also receive by mail in advance of each concert a programme book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. The subscription will close on November 30.

[22]

...People's Popular Concert—The Russ...tonians in "Mignon."

The first of Mr. Nikisch's afternoon popular programmes, given yesterday in Music Hall, with the assistance of Mrs. Carl Alves, contralto, and Mr. Charles Molé, flute, was:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, My heart opens to thy voice ("Samson and Dalila").....Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner.
Invitation to Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demersseman
(First time.)
Mons. Molé.
Songs with piano.
The Old Song.....Grieg
It Cannot Be.....Schumann
Wiederfinden.....Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

An interesting programme, though without principal novelties. Mr. Nikisch brought to its interpretation his well-known characteristics. Unfortunately shut out from hearing Rossini's tuneful overture, there was character, potency and force in the three other numbers for orchestra sufficient to make partial amends. The exquisite voicings in the Siegfried Idyll were displayed as by the hand of the sympathetic analyst. The contrasts of the Invitation were strongly marked, while the "Rienzi" overture was superbly vigorous and exciting.

In the fantasie by Demersseman, Mr. Molé gave an exhibition of virtuosity which was simply extraordinary; his phrasing was masterly, and his execution of the difficult cadenzas was as true and finished as his tone in the quieter passages was pure and sweet. Mrs. Alves has a fine voice which she uses well. She sang the melodious excerpt from "Samson and Dalila" very well, the passionate chief theme—and how expressive it is—being excellently phrased. The songs, sung to her husband's accompaniment, were also well sung. Mrs. Alves only needs more emotion to give her a leading place. The audience, despite the rain, was large and responsive.

THE BEACON:

, NOVEMBER 16,

THE FIRST "POPULAR."

For the beginning and end of his first "Young People's Populars" Mr. Nikisch brought forward overtures which are favorites and yet are not often heard; certainly it is rare indeed when they can be heard to such perfection as in his renderings. The first was the exquisitely finished one of Rossini which goes by the name of "The Barber of Seville," although it was not written for that opera, and the other was the grandiose, clangorous and sometime almost coarse "Rienzi" of Wagner. Mr. Nikisch enhanced in the first all its subtle beauties of color and ornament, and in the latter commandingly maintained the juste milieu of brilliancy, power and sonority, holding the more turbulent passages enough in check to preserve them from blatancy or other excess. In the "Barber" the pure fluency and ease of the wooden wind were particularly gratifying, as in the "Rienzi" the full volume and genuine quality of the brass were welcomed, especially as the largest tones were kept smooth and not allowed to crush out the string voices. Other orchestral numbers, no less discriminatingly given were Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," which went on with real élan, and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," which, beautiful and poetic as it is, yet must seem to the unbiassed listener as too protracted. Like other evolutions—and we hold the word to be a fair one—of its author, there seems no particular reason why it should not stop long before it does or why it should stop when it does, for the manner of it is such that it might undoubtedly have been stretched out to twice or thrice its present length; if one can resolve to listen to it without thought, he can lose himself in sensation and be satisfied, or if he be musician enough to follow its meanderings without book he may be profited, but the average hearer, if he be honest, will undoubtedly say that the last third fails to hold his attention and to please him. A new singer was heard in the person of Mme. Alvés of New York, who displayed a large, even, extended and rich contralto voice; a few of the lowest tones were forced into hardness in production, and she was not always up to the key, but there were unusual qualities more than sufficient to atone for these remediable defects. She sang to orchestral accompaniment and with full intellectual and dramatic appreciation, Delilah's air of fascination from Saint-Saëns's opera of "Samson and Delilah," and added later three chamber songs which had little but their beautifully clear enunciation to commend them, and were distracted by the wretched accompaniment of a strange pianist. M. Molé also appeared as a soloist, playing with limpid and even tone, fine taste and almost astounding mastery of technical difficulties, a showy but still musicianly fantasy for flute by De Mersseman upon themes from "Oberon." The audience was very large and composed of genuine music-lovers, a good many regular Symphony patrons being present.

Symphony Concerts.

Four grand concerts are announced to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at the Hyperion theater on Monday evenings, December 16, January 13, February 10 and March 17. Soloists will appear with the orchestra at each concert and it is safe to predict a series of brilliant performances. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of tickets and will receive by mail in advance of each concert a program book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 16, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme of last Saturday and its performance proved an instant and immense success with the public, although some of the critics are still inclined to condemn a reading of Beethoven after which the audience remained en masse to cheer and recall the conductor. On that evening, as at the rehearsal on the preceding afternoon, the limit set for the sale of admission tickets was reached before the hour of beginning arrived, and more persons were present than at the previous concerts when such a favorite as Herr Fischer was the vocalist. While it is easily possible to exaggerate and be indiscreet in what may be called an "impressionist" reading of the great masters, yet there is much to be said in favor of a confession of his own sentiments and susceptibilities by a conductor. Music is primarily intended to influence the feelings; so also is the drama, and if in the advance of the world men cease to be impressed by what influenced their fathers, if their mental attitude and nervous temperaments change with their modes of life, and their whole being deviates in a thousand minor particulars from elder types, why should not all the expressive arts be modified so that they may retain their duly proportionable power among the influences which act upon men's minds and spirits? We would not for one instant allow any fantistic trifling or eccentric variability in the treatment of the essential and fundamental elements of a great and reverend work; but nevertheless we do believe that it is possible to preserve these in a firm and faithful grasp and yet modify many of the secondary features which are attendant upon them, so that substantially new effects are obtained, rather in the way of coloring lights than in alterations of outline.

The moment, however, that interpretation passes beyond such permissible modification of a hard-and-fast reading of episodical and transitional matter or loses dignity in romanticism and clear-cut even exposition of thought in over-wrought emphasis of contrast, approval must cease and censure take its turn. If a work of Mozart and Beethoven impresses people more vividly, while yet keeping a reasonable proportion between its component parts, through a performance into which modern methods are allowed to enter, then such treatment should be admitted; just as the pianforte and organ of today must be accepted and welcomed instead of the imperfect instruments by which the old masters studied the effects of their compositions. That there is danger that Mr. Nikisch may go too far in directing by his own sensations is true, as it is also true that the clamor of an audience is no proof of perfection in performance; but on the other hand it certainly seems as if the conservatively critical cannot be altogether right and five thousand intelligent and instructed listeners altogether wrong in respectively condemning and extolling such a rendering of Beethoven's fifth symphony as that of last Saturday night, which thrilled, elevated and delighted multitudes and made them attribute to Beethoven greater glory, honor and passionate power than ever before. The departure from old standards was unquestionably too wide at times, and what was intended to be dramatic came perilously near melodramatic excess; but the intimation that all the fire, strength, sweep and sway of Beethoven's inspiration had not hitherto been shown was worth learning, even at the cost of some extravagance which time and judgment can easily correct.

The programme of tonight has standard works at its head and foot—Cherubim's beautiful "Anacreon" overture, which was read at the rehearsal nearly according to old standards, special care being shown in the sweet Mozart-like passages, and Goetz's agreeable, bright and easily followed symphony in F, which we could not stay to hear. A work by Svendsen, called "A Norwegian Rhapsody," occupied the central place, this being new to these concerts, although the Orchestral Club had a hearing of it some four years ago. It is based on three natural melodies, which are related to each other as an opening and a closing allegro, with an andantino between, the first melody having an odd suggestion about it of the old negro tune, "Fly roun', Jinny, git yer hoecake done." The several phases, varying from the gay beginning, which comes in on tiptoe, as it were, and the chastened richness of the slower movement, to the bright and elaborate conclusion, were all distinctly presented, and the special bits of coloring and phrasing, such as the dull drone of the basses, the penetrating lines for the woodwind, and the incisive crescendos of the strings in the finals, were brought out charmingly.

The other two numbers were also new, being solos for the introduction of another new 'cellist, M. Leo Schutz,—first a concerto by Ecdert, and second, Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" fantasy. The concerto might almost be called a fantasy also; for although it has four movements, three of these run on without a break, and are so closely united in temper, in spite of variations in tempo, that they seem like the sympathetic thoughts of one dreaming hour, so stated as to be sweetest and most attractive. The last movement is in dance-measure, and is vivacious enough to balance the mellifluous tranquility of the preceding portions. The Bruch piece is founded on a slow air which belongs in the service of the synagogue on Atonement Day, and is divided into two short but connected sections, the latter a little more animated than the former. It is all grave, calm, solemn and even pathetic in the solo part, and the quiet but richly moulded accompaniment sustains it at every point. Mr. Schulz, played these with great richness and volume of tone, which was especially broad and satisfying in the lower register. He had not much opportunity for technical display, but in the concerto he showed that his technique must be easy and fine, one long cadenza serving for this demonstration. He gave deep tenderness and substantial feeling to the Bruch, and after each number was warmly recalled.

For next week there are promised Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, a new suite for strings by Mr. Arthur Foote and songs by Miss Gertrude Edmands.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1889

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Haydn.....Symphony in G. No. 13.
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5

The Haydn symphony (No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Haertel Catalogue and the fifty-eighth in chronological order) was written in 1787 for Paris, where it was engraved by Sieber. It follows the six written for the society of La Loge Olympique, whose concerts were given at the Tuileries under the patronage of Marie Antoinette. Written for a foreign orchestra and for a foreign taste, this symphony is better adapted to the modern orchestra with its full complement of strings than many which precede it in date of composition.

"The art of art," says Walt Whitman, "the glory of expression . . . is simplicity. Nothing is better than simplicity, nothing can make up for excess or for the lack of definiteness." And right here is seen the genius of Haydn. He takes a simple, sportive melody and in its thematic treatment, great as is his mastery over counterpoint, uses his knowledge to cunningly conceal his art and to italicize as it were the chosen subject. His was the simplicity of Carissimi, who, when some one complimented him upon the "easiness" of his music, replied, "Oh, how hard it is to write simply."

This particular symphony, played last week for the first time by the orchestra, is throughout a thing of beauty, a pure delight. It is hard to say which number is the more pleasing: the fresh and brilliant opening, the solemn largo with its rich color, or the trio of the minuet with drone bass, and melody given to the violins and oboe. Pohl calls the finale, the crown of the work, simple as is apparently its rondo form.

There are critics of the present day who sneer at Haydn and despise his works. They call his masses, frivolous; his piano pieces, childish; his quartets, old-fashioned. They dismiss his symphonies as "uninteresting," and they shudder at the idea of being obliged to listen to "The Seasons." His works are not deep enough for them; they "mean" nothing; they "portray" nothing. In his scores they find no "yearnings," no "struggles against fate," etc., etc. Poor Haydn and Mozart were foolish enough to believe in "an ideal and independent musical beauty, owing its existence to musical sounds alone, free of any literary, philosophical, or psychological program." But ask the cultivated musician who plays or sings the music of Haydn whether his task is child's play or drudgery. Ask the amateur who without preconceived theories simply goes to a concert to listen, whether the music of Haydn is "uninteresting."

The performance of this symphony was a triumph for the players and the conductor. It was the artistic triumph of the evening, and indeed of the career of Mr. Nikisch up to this date; for his "reading" was as artfully simple as the music itself. It was apparently natural and spontaneous, without any labored attempt at theatrical display. David Strauss, in his "Old and New Faith," acutely remarks, that if you go to a concert where a symphony of Haydn is upon the program, you may be sure that if you are disappointed in it, the fault is in its performance. "And it can easily happen that the so-called 'best' orchestras will play it the worst. For they delight in spending their means of effect, such as rough and sudden changes in strength of tone and tempo (upon which so many modern compositions depend), upon a music to which only the simplest execution does justice."

Nowhere in music is this simplicity more imperatively demanded than in the works of Mozart. His melodies are so free, so perfectly balanced, his harmonies are so constructed, that they lose instead of gain by any attempt to give to them increased "expression." Now Mr. Nikisch has taken liberties in overtures by Beethoven and Weber for which he has been severely criticized. These were chiefly slight changes in tempo, generally found in connection with second motives and episodes. These liberties have found, on the other hand, warm admirers and earnest defenders; and the reasons for applauding instead of condemning are many. But take the first movement of the G minor symphony as played under Mr. Nikisch, was it as beautiful to the ear that night as it is to the eye upon the printed pages? This wonderful child of inspiration and science is an allegro molto beginning with a melody given in octaves to the violins; the accompaniment is played by the other stringed instruments. It is an Italian song of restrained passion, of quiet intensity, such as is found in the first movement of Mozart's G minor quintet; it is direct, going straight to the mark, as terribly in earnest as many of the musical sentences of the old man Verdi. It stands at the very beginning of the symphony. Mr. Nikisch treated it sentimentally; he coquetted with it. It was beautiful, but it had as it were an artificial beauty; it was a woman bedizened and bedecked instead of the naked goddess, rosy and palpitating. Had this been the second motive instead of the first, there might then have been a reasonable excuse; but surely at the beginning of a composition written so frankly and honestly, the rhythm should have been more sharply defined, and the melody given with more directness. I do not speak of any "traditions," I do not speak of the "composer's intentions"; it seems to me looking at the score that in this case Mr. Nikisch failed to find the proper rhythm, and so the melody suffered; its sensuous warmth cooled and it became lukewarm. And the whole movement halted a little, and it seemed as though Mozart had put on airs of affectation.

Yes, if the proper tempo is not found, the melody is ruined. How beautiful, for example, was the trio of the minuet in the same symphony; where if the "time" had been hurried one jot, the exquisite phrases allotted to the wind instruments would have been meaningless and confused. The minuets of Mozart and Haydn are often spoiled through the inability of conductors to discriminate between a scherzo and a minuet.

How should the first five measures of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony be played? Perhaps there is no passage in instrumental music about which conductors so essentially differ. Colonne of Paris who gives a singularly virile "reading" of this first movement, declaims the first phrases with the eighth notes heavily and deliberately detached; while his "holds" are as long sustained as the "holds" of Mr. Nikisch. With Wagner they hear Beethoven's voice crying, "Hold my fermate for a long time, so as to inspire awe. I do not write them merely for a joke, or as though I wanted time to ponder on what comes after." (And our orchestra held the long sustained tones without wavering; no easy task.) Mr. Nikisch's performance of the symphony has brought out much adverse criticism; it certainly was remarkable, at times curious and almost perplexing; it was radically different from others which have been heard and applauded. Was it therefore wrong? Were all the others right? Now it is easy to say the conception of Mr. Nikisch was bombastic and "un-Beethovenish," and to call down upon his head all the curses uttered by Dr. Slop when he could not untie the knot. But this fifth symphony abounds in daring violations of rules: there are passages of great difficulty which were once thought impossible and were omitted; there are mysterious and overwhelming things hinted at darkly which are followed suddenly by grotesque ideas. It is a Gothic cathedral where grinning gargoyles squat by the side of the statue of the Virgin.

There were passages which under Mr. Nikisch's direction assumed new and unpleasing forms. Perhaps a second hearing would confirm this opinion; perhaps it would remove it. In hearing a work which has been so often given, a musician must necessarily have preconceived ideas of its proper performance; if the performance agrees with them he is apt to praise the conductor. But his ideas may be erroneous. Are there any formulas for directing the fifth symphony? Is there any carefully prepared receipt which no conductor should be without?

And there were portions of the work which were grandly worked up by the conductor and superbly played by the men. How full of beauty was the opening of the scherzo! How exciting was the approach to the finale, and how imposing was the declamation of the first pages of that finale!

The great audience, which had given hearty signs of approval after each number of the symphonies, at the end of the concert broke out in wild and long continued applause. And the orchestra deserved this tribute; for although there was at times a noticeable lack of precision and unity, the individual and ensemble playing as a whole was remarkably good. In this connection it may be proper to remark that the orchestra, while it has gained in fire and swing and all the details necessary for producing great effects, has apparently lost a little of that exquisite and delicate finish which characterized the concerts of Mr. Gericke. This is spoken of the orchestra as a whole, and not of the individual members, for nothing could have excelled the work of the double-basses, bassoons, and in fact all the individual playing heard last Saturday. To combine the qualities of finish and power may appear an impossible task; yet the superb orchestra of M. Lamoureux comes very near to this perfection. Better than unrelieved polish and such careful attention to detail that the effect of the whole is lost, is a performance full of virility, manly beauty and dramatic intensity, even though exaggeration may enter and annoy.

Six programs have thus far been presented to the music lovers of this city; and not one of them includes the work of a French composer. Is Mr. Nikisch acquainted with any of the compositions of the French school?

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1889

FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.—The program of Wednesday's Popular Concert was:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Mon coeur s'ouvre" ..... Saint Saens
Mrs. Alves.
Siegfried Idyll .....Wagner
Invitation to Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie "Oberon".....Demersseman
Mr. Ch. Mole.
Songs with piano.
"The old song" ....Grieg
"It cannot be".....Schumann
"Wiederfinden".....Rheinberger
Mrs. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner.

The first of the "popular" concerts of the Symphony Orchestra was largely attended and thoroughly enjoyed. The "Siegfried Idyll" was exceedingly well-played, the balancing of the parts being admirably preserved; and if here the conductor fails, the composition soon becomes unendurable. It is surprising that Mr. Nikisch should waste his time and talents upon such a blatant and brutal potpourri-overture as "Rienzi," which has been aptly described as "giant like in dimensions, dwarfish in musical ideas, deafening with its battle-crash and din."

"Samson et Dalila," a biblical drama by Saint-Saëns, was first brought out at Weimar in '77. The aria sung with rare expression by Mrs. Alves, is a most favorable example of Saint Saëns' vocal writing. This man, who as composer and pianist, is remarkable for technique, taste and versatility, has been often justly reproached for a want of heaven-born melody. It is true, he is not in this respect a Mozart or Rossini; yet no amount of talent alone could create this sensuous and simple melody to which he has given such an exquisite and original accompaniment. This and the "three songs with piano" suffered from a wretched translation. A song should always be sung in the language for which the music was written. The accentuation, the musical sentences suffer sadly, though the translator may show the utmost care. Mrs. Alves has a warm and sympathetic voice, and upon the whole, she sang with taste and intelligence. But the more I hear Grieg's "Old Song" the more I prefer the setting of Rubinstein.

The fantasie for flute and orchestra by Demersseman was an agreeable surprise. Too often are flute solos a dreary waste of bravura rubbish. But Jules Auguste Edouard Demersseman (1833–1866) was a most remarkable virtuoso. At the age of twelve he took the first prize of the Paris Conservatory for flute playing. And a few years later he showed marked talent for composition and received high honors for fugue writing. Besides fantasies and a concerto for his instrument, he wrote an operetta, songs, and several compositions for orchestra. The playing of Mr. Molé was musicianly in phrasing and in artistic self control; and although he has a marvelous technique, he does not sacrifice everything for its display. For this and for the clearness and purity of his tone, he deserves the highest praise. He was heartily applauded.

PHILIP HALE.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1889.

Young People's Popular Concert—The Bertonians in "Mignon."

The first of Mr. Nikisch's afternoon popular programmes, given yesterday in Music Hall, with the assistance of Mrs. Carl Alves, contralto, and Mr. Charles Molé, flute, was:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria. My heart opens to thy voice ("Samson and Dalila").....Saint-Saëns
Mme. Alves.
a. Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
b. Invitation to Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie for flute and orchestra on themes from the opera "Oberon".....Demarsseman
(First time.)
Mons. Molé.
Songs with piano.
The Old Song.....Grieg
It Cannot Be.....Schumann
Wiederfinden.....Rheinberger
Mme. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

An interesting programme, though without principal novelties. Mr. Nikisch brought to its interpretation his well-known characteristics. Unfortunately shut out from hearing Rossini's tuneful overture, there was character, potency and force in the three other numbers for orchestra sufficient to make partial amends. The exquisite voicings in the Siegfried Idyll were displayed as by the hand of the sympathetic analyst. The contrasts of the Invitation were strongly marked, while the "Rienzi" overture was superbly vigorous and exciting.

In the fantasie by Demersseman, Mr. Molé gave an exhibition of virtuosity which was simply extraordinary; his phrasing was masterly, and his execution of the difficult cadenzas was as true and finished as his tone in the quieter passages was pure and sweet. Mrs. Alves has a fine voice which she uses well. She sang the melodious excerpt from "Samson and Dalila" very well, the passionate chief theme—and how expressive it is—being excellently phrased. The songs, sung to her husband's accompaniment, were also well sung. Mrs. Alves only needs more emotion to give her a leading place. The audience, despite the rain, was large and responsive.

THE BEACON:

, NOVEMBER 16,

THE FIRST "POPULAR."

For the beginning and end of his first "Young People's Populars" Mr. Nikisch brought forward overtures which are favorites and yet are not often heard; certainly it is rare indeed when they can be heard to such perfection as in his renderings. The first was the exquisitely finished one of Rossini which goes by the name of "The Barber of Seville," although it was not written for that opera, and the other was the grandiose, clangorous and sometime almost coarse "Rienzi" of Wagner. Mr. Nikisch enhanced in the first all its subtle beauties of color and ornament, and in the latter commandingly maintained the juste milieu of brilliancy, power and sonority, holding the more turbulent passages enough in check to preserve them from blatancy or other excess. In the "Barber" the pure fluency and ease of the wooden wind were particularly gratifying, as in the "Rienzi" the full volume and genuine quality of the brass were welcomed, especially as the largest tones were kept smooth and not allowed to crush out the string voices. Other orchestral numbers, no less discriminatingly given were Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," which went on with real élan, and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," which, beautiful and poetic as it is, yet must seem to the unbiassed listener as too protracted. Like other evolutions—and we hold the word to be a fair one—of its author, there seems no particular reason why it should not stop long before it does or why it should stop when it does, for the manner of it is such that it might undoubtedly have been stretched out to twice or thrice its present length; if one can resolve to listen to it without thought, he can lose himself in sensation and be satisfied, or if he be musician enough to follow its meanderings without book he may be profited, but the average hearer, if he be honest, will undoubtedly say that the last third fails to hold his attention and to please him. A new singer was heard in the person of Mme. Alvés of New York, who displayed a large, even, extended and rich contralto voice; a few of the lowest tones were forced into hardness in production, and she was not always up to the key, but there were unusual qualities more than sufficient to atone for these remediable defects. She sang to orchestral accompaniment and with full intellectual and dramatic appreciation, Delilah's air of fascination from Saint-Saëns's opera of "Samson and Delilah," and added later three chamber songs which had little but their beautifully clear enunciation to commend them, and were distracted by the wretched accompaniment of a strange pianist. M. Molé also appeared as a soloist, playing with limpid and even tone, fine taste and almost astounding mastery of technical difficulties, a showy but still musicianly fantasy for flute by De Mersseman upon themes from "Oberon." The audience was very large and composed of genuine music-lovers, a good many regular Symphony patrons being present.

Symphony Concerts.

Four grand concerts are announced to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at the Hyperion theater on Monday evenings, December 16, January 13, February 10 and March 17. Soloists will appear with the orchestra at each concert and it is safe to predict a series of brilliant performances. A subscription list is now open at M. Steinert & Sons. Subscribers will have first choice of tickets and will receive by mail in advance of each concert a program book with analytical notes on the selections to be performed. N. Y. Harmonic 11/13

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 16, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme of last Saturday and its performance proved an instant and immense success with the public, although some of the critics are still inclined to condemn a reading of Beethoven after which the audience remained en masse to cheer and recall the conductor. On that evening, as at the rehearsal on the preceding afternoon, the limit set for the sale of admission tickets was reached before the hour of beginning arrived, and more persons were present than at the previous concerts when such a favorite as Herr Fischer was the vocalist. While it is easily possible to exaggerate and be indiscreet in what may be called an "impressionist" reading of the great masters, yet there is much to be said in favor of a confession of his own sentiments and susceptibilities by a conductor. Music is primarily intended to influence the feelings; so also is the drama, and if in the advance of the world men cease to be impressed by what influenced their fathers, if their mental attitude and nervous temperaments change with their modes of life, and their whole being deviates in a thousand minor particulars from elder types, why should not all the expressive arts be modified so that they may retain their duly proportionable power among the influences which act upon men's minds and spirits? We would not for one instant allow any fantistic trifling or eccentric variability in the treatment of the essential and fundamental elements of a great and reverend work; but nevertheless we do believe that it is possible to preserve these in a firm and faithful grasp and yet modify many of the secondary features which are attendant upon them, so that substantially new effects are obtained, rather in the way of coloring lights than in alterations of outline.

The moment, however, that interpretation passes beyond such permissible modification of a hard-and-fast reading of episodical and transitional matter or loses dignity in romanticism and clear-cut even exposition of thought in over-wrought emphasis of contrast, approval must cease and censure take its turn. If a work of Mozart and Beethoven impresses people more vividly, while yet keeping a reasonable proportion between its component parts, through a performance into which modern methods are allowed to enter, then such treatment should be admitted; just as the pianforte and organ of today must be accepted and welcomed instead of the imperfect instruments by which the old masters studied the effects of their compositions. That there is danger that Mr. Nikisch may go too far in directing by his own sensations is true, as it is also true that the clamor of an audience is no proof of perfection in performance; but on the other hand it certainly seems as if the conservatively critical cannot be altogether right and five thousand intelligent and instructed listeners altogether wrong in respectively condemning and extolling such a rendering of Beethoven's fifth symphony as that of last Saturday night, which thrilled, elevated and delighted multitudes and made them attribute to Beethoven greater glory, honor and passionate power than ever before. The departure from old standards was unquestionally too wide at times, and what was intended to be dramatic came perilously near melodramatic excess; but the intimation that all the fire, strength, sweep and sway of Beethoven's inspiration had not hitherto been shown was worth learning, even at the cost of some extravagance which time and judgment can easily correct.

The programme of tonight has standard works at its head and foot—Cherubim's beautiful "Anacreon" overture, which was read at the rehearsal nearly according to old standards, special care being shown in the sweet Mozart-like passages, and Goetz's agreeable, bright and easily followed symphony in F, which we could not stay to hear. A work by Svendsen, called "A Norwegian Rhapsody," occupied the central place, this being new to these concerts, although the Orchestral Club had a hearing of it some four years ago. It is based on three natural melodies, which are related to each other as an opening and a closing allegro, with an andantino between, the first melody having an odd suggestion about it of the old negro tune, "Fly roun', Jinny, git yer hoecake done." The several phases, varying from the gay beginning, which comes in on tiptoe, as it were, and the chastened richness of the slower movement, to the bright and elaborate conclusion, were all distinctly presented, and the special bits of coloring and phrasing, such as the dull drone of the basses, the penetrating lines for the woodwind, and the incisive crescendos of the strings in the finals, were brought out charmingly.

The other two numbers were also new, being solos for the introduction of another new 'cellist, M. Leo Schutz,—first a concerto by Ecdert, and second, Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" fantasy. The concerto might almost be called a fantasy also; for although it has four movements, three of these run on without a break, and are so closely united in temper, in spite of variations in tempo, that they seem like the sympathetic thoughts of one dreaming hour, so stated as to be sweetest and most attractive. The last movement is in dance-measure, and is vivacious enough to balance the mellifluous tranquility of the preceding portions. The Bruch piece is founded on a slow air which belongs in the service of the synagogue on Atonement Day, and is divided into two short but connected sections, the latter a little more animated than the former. It is all grave, calm, solemn and even pathetic in the solo part, and the quiet but richly moulded accompaniment sustains it at every point. Mr. Schulz, played these with great richness and volume of tone, which was especially broad and satisfying in the lower register. He had not much opportunity for technical display, but in the concerto he showed that his technique must be easy and fine, one long cadenza serving for this demonstration. He gave deep tenderness and substantial feeling to the Bruch, and after each number was warmly recalled.

For next week there are promised Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, a new suite for strings by Mr. Arthur Foote and songs by Miss Gertrude Edmands.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1889

The Fifth Symphony Concert.

Haydn.....Symphony in G. No. 13.
Mozart.....Symphony in G minor
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5

The Haydn symphony (No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Haertel Catalogue and the fifty-eighth in chronological order) was written in 1787 for Paris, where it was engraved by Sieber. It follows the six written for the society of La Loge Olympique, whose concerts were given at the Tuileries under the patronage of Marie Antoinette. Written for a foreign orchestra and for a foreign taste, this symphony is better adapted to the modern orchestra with its full complement of strings than many which precede it in date of composition.

"The art of art," says Walt Whitman, "the glory of expression . . . is simplicity. Nothing is better than simplicity, nothing can make up for excess or for the lack of definiteness." And right here is seen the genius of Haydn. He takes a simple, sportive melody and in its thematic treatment, great as is his mastery over counterpoint, uses his knowledge to cunningly conceal his art and to italicize as it were the chosen subject. His was the simplicity of Carissimi, who, when some one complimented him upon the "easiness" of his music, replied, "Oh, how hard it is to write simply."

This particular symphony, played last week for the first time by the orchestra, is throughout a thing of beauty, a pure delight. It is hard to say which number is the more pleasing: the fresh and brilliant opening, the solemn largo with its rich color, or the trio of the minuet with drone bass, and melody given to the violins and oboe. Pohl calls the finale, the crown of the work, simple as is apparently its rondo form.

There are critics of the present day who sneer at Haydn and despise his works. They call his masses, frivolous; his piano pieces, childish; his quartets, old-fashioned. They dismiss his symphonies as "uninteresting," and they shudder at the idea of being obliged to listen to "The Seasons." His works are not deep enough for them; they "mean" nothing; they "portray" nothing. In his scores they find no "yearnings," no "struggles against fate," etc., etc. Poor Haydn and Mozart were foolish enough to believe in "an ideal and independent musical beauty, owing its existence to musical sounds alone, free of any literary, philosophical, or psychological program." But ask the cultivated musician who plays or sings the music of Haydn whether his task is child's play or drudgery. Ask the amateur who without preconceived theories simply goes to a concert to listen, whether the music of Haydn is "uninteresting."

The performance of this symphony was a triumph for the players and the conductor. It was the artistic triumph of the evening, and indeed of the career of Mr. Nikisch up to this date; for his "reading" was as artfully simple as the music itself. It was apparently natural and spontaneous, without any labored attempt at theatrical display. David Strauss, in his "Old and New Faith," acutely remarks, that if you go to a concert where a symphony of Haydn is upon the program, you may be sure that if you are disappointed in it, the fault is in its performance. "And it can easily happen that the so-called 'best' orchestras will play it the worst. For they delight in spending their means of effect, such as rough and sudden changes in strength of tone and tempo (upon which so many modern compositions depend), upon a music to which only the simplest execution does justice."

Nowhere in music is this simplicity more imperatively demanded than in the works of Mozart. His melodies are so free, so perfectly balanced, his harmonies are so constructed, that they lose instead of gain by any attempt to give to them increased "expression." Now Mr. Nikisch has taken liberties in overtures by Beethoven and Weber for which he has been severely criticized. These were chiefly slight changes in tempo, generally found in connection with second motives and episodes. These liberties have found, on the other hand, warm admirers and earnest defenders; and the reasons for applauding instead of condemning are many. But take the first movement of the G minor symphony as played under Mr. Nikisch, was it as beautiful to the ear that night as it is to the eye upon the printed pages? This wonderful child of inspiration and science is an allegro molto beginning with a melody given in octaves to the violins; the accompaniment is played by the other stringed instruments. It is an Italian song of restrained passion, of quiet intensity, such as is found in the first movement of Mozart's G minor quintet; it is direct, going straight to the mark, as terribly in earnest as many of the musical sentences of the old man Verdi. It stands at the very beginning of the symphony. Mr. Nikisch treated it sentimentally; he coquetted with it. It was beautiful, but it had as it were an artificial beauty; it was a woman bedizened and bedecked instead of the naked goddess, rosy and palpitating. Had this been the second motive instead of the first, there might then have been a reasonable excuse; but surely at the beginning of a composition written so frankly and honestly, the rhythm should have been more sharply defined, and the melody given with more directness. I do not speak of any "traditions," I do not speak of the "composer's intentions"; it seems to me looking at the score that in this case Mr. Nikisch failed to find the proper rhythm, and so the melody suffered; its sensuous warmth cooled and it became lukewarm. And the whole movement halted a little, and it seemed as though Mozart had put on airs of affectation.

Yes, if the proper tempo is not found, the melody is ruined. How beautiful, for example, was the trio of the minuet in the same symphony; where if the "time" had been hurried one jot, the exquisite phrases allotted to the wind instruments would have been meaningless and confused. The minuets of Mozart and Haydn are often spoiled through the inability of conductors to discriminate between a scherzo and a minuet.

How should the first five measures of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony be played? Perhaps there is no passage in instrumental music about which conductors so essentially differ. Colonne of Paris who gives a singularly virile "reading" of this first movement, declaims the first phrases with the eighth notes heavily and deliberately detached; while his "holds" are as long sustained as the "holds" of Mr. Nikisch. With Wagner they hear Beethoven's voice crying, "Hold my fermate for a long time, so as to inspire awe. I do not write them merely for a joke, or as though I wanted time to ponder on what comes after." (And our orchestra held the long sustained tones without wavering; no easy task.) Mr. Nikisch's performance of the symphony has brought out much adverse criticism; it certainly was remarkable, at times curious and almost perplexing; it was radically different from others which have been heard and applauded. Was it therefore wrong? Were all the others right? Now it is easy to say the conception of Mr. Nikisch was bombastic and "un-Beethovenish," and to call down upon his head all the curses uttered by Dr. Slop when he could not untie the knot. But this fifth symphony abounds in daring violations of rules: there are passages of great difficulty which were once thought impossible and were omitted; there are mysterious and overwhelming things hinted at darkly which are followed suddenly by grotesque ideas. It is a Gothic cathedral where grinning gargoyles squat by the side of the statue of the Virgin.

There were passages which under Mr. Nikisch's direction assumed new and unpleasing forms. Perhaps a second hearing would confirm this opinion; perhaps it would remove it. In hearing a work which has been so often given, a musician must necessarily have preconceived ideas of its proper performance; if the performance agrees with them he is apt to praise the conductor. But his ideas may be erroneous. Are there any formulas for directing the fifth symphony? Is there any carefully prepared receipt which no conductor should be without?

And there were portions of the work which were grandly worked up by the conductor and superbly played by the men. How full of beauty was the opening of the scherzo! How exciting was the approach to the finale, and how imposing was the declamation of the first pages of that finale!

The great audience, which had given hearty signs of approval after each number of the symphonies, at the end of the concert broke out in wild and long continued applause. And the orchestra deserved this tribute; for although there was at times a noticeable lack of precision and unity, the individual and ensemble playing as a whole was remarkably good. In this connection it may be proper to remark that the orchestra, while it has gained in fire and swing and all the details necessary for producing great effects, has apparently lost a little of that exquisite and delicate finish which characterized the concerts of Mr. Gericke. This is spoken of the orchestra as a whole, and not of the individual members, for nothing could have excelled the work of the double-basses, bassoons, and in fact all the individual playing heard last Saturday. To combine the qualities of finish and power may appear an impossible task; yet the superb orchestra of M. Lamoureux comes very near to this perfection. Better than unrelieved polish and such careful attention to detail that the effect of the whole is lost, is a performance full of virility, manly beauty and dramatic intensity, even though exaggeration may enter and annoy.

Six programs have thus far been presented to the music lovers of this city; and not one of them includes the work of a French composer. Is Mr Nikisch acquainted with any of the compositions of the French school?

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1889

First Young People's Popular.—The program of Wednesday's Popular Concert was:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Mon coeur s'ouvre" ..... Saint Saens
Mrs. Alves.
Siegfried Idyll .....Wagner
Invitation to Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Concert Fantasie "Oberon" .....Demersseman
Mr. Ch. Mole.
Songs with piano.
"The old song" ....Grieg
"It cannot be". .....Schumann
"Wiederfinden".....Rheinberger
Mrs. Alves.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner.

The first of the "popular" concerts of the Symphony Orchestra was largely attended and thoroughly enjoyed. The "Siegfried Idyll" was exceedingly well-played, the balancing of the parts being admirably preserved; and if here the conductor fails, the composition soon becomes unendurable. It is surprising that Mr. Nikisch should waste his time and talents upon such a blatant and brutal potpourri-overture as "Rienzi," which has been aptly described as "giant like in dimensions, dwarfish in musical ideas, deafening with its battle-crash and din."

"Samson et Dalila," a biblical drama by Saint-Saëns, was first brought out at Weimar in '77. The aria sung with rare expression by Mrs. Alves, is a most favorable example of Saint Saëns' vocal writing. This man, who as composer and pianist, is remarkable for technique, taste and versatility, has been often justly reproached for a want of heaven-born melody. It is true, he is not in this respect a Mozart or Rossini; yet no amount of talent alone could create this sensuous and simple melody to which he has given such an exquisite and original accompaniment. This and the "three songs with piano" suffered from a wretched translation. A song should always be sung in the language for which the music was written. The accentuation, the musical sentences suffer sadly, though the translator may show the utmost care. Mrs. Alves has a warm and sympathetic voice, and upon the whole, she sang with taste and intelligence. But the more I hear Grieg's "Old Song" the more I prefer the setting of Rubinstein.

The fantasie for flute and orchestra by Demersseman was an agreeable surprise. Too often are flute solos a dreary waste of bravura rubbish. But Jules Auguste Edouard Demersseman (1833–1866) was a most remarkable virtuoso. At the age of twelve he took the first prize of the Paris Conservatory for flute playing. And a few years later he showed marked talent for composition and received high honors for fugue writing. Besides fantasies and a concerto for his instrument, he wrote an operetta, songs, and several compositions for orchestra. The playing of Mr. Molé was musicianly in phrasing and in artistic self control; and although he has a marvelous technique, he does not sacrifice everything for its display. For this and for the clearness and purity of his tone, he deserves the highest praise. He was heartily applauded.

PHILIP HALE.

[22]

[23]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1889.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTH CONCERT.

The Symphony concert last evening effectively opened with that most famous of the Cherubini overtures, the ever welcome "Anacreon." It is not surprising that this overture so gloriously holds its own and comparing so favorably, as it does, with the best modern work of its class. For once, Cherubini was moved to treat melody so as to have it come upon the ear in the clearest and most effective way, and at the same time lead an irresistible flow of sterling harmony into the heart of his themes. The overture in fact, is one of the sublimest efforts of which music, at the time in which it was written, was capable.

The soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz, created a highly favorable impression by his performance of the Eckert concerto in A minor. His playing is that of an uncommonly well-schooled artist, is rich and voluminous in tone, and masterly as regards style. In a praiseworthy sense he is the very antithesis of a sentimental performer; yet it would be unfair to imply that he is to any extent unmusical. He seemed thoroughly in his element with the Bruch adagio, his performance of which was received with unusual manifestations of approval.

The Svendsen "Rhapsodie Norvegienne" is a work that very justly bears its title, grotesque in conception and thoroughly characteristic, yet of no more than passing interest as regards scholarly merit and melodious detail.

The concert ended with the Goetz symphony in F, which has once before (in 1887) been heard here. A more poetic and at the same time genial symphony it would be difficult to name. Although not so evenly profound as a number of its more important contemporaries, it is nevertheless a brilliant and impressive work, and was finely rendered.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In selecting a programme for the first Young People's Popular concert of the season Mr. Nikisch showed commendable judgment. The selections performed by the orchestra included the overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville;" the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber; and overture to "Rienzi;" Wagner. The soloists were Mme. Carl Alves and Mons. Ch. Mole.

The delight that the occasion afforded, especially to the younger portion of the audience, was apparently unlimited. Rossini's melodious and popular overture received able and effective treatment. The Siegfried motive was taken at a somewhat faster tempo than our public has been accustomed to hear it, but with no diminution of that entrancing effect that it invariably creates.

Mme. Alves with the aria from Saint Saëns's "Samson" proved herself to be an artist of the first rank, not only by the dramatic richness and sympathy of her voice, but by the fervency and integrity of her musical expression. She was not so successful with the songs by Grieg, Schumann, and Rheinberger, being somewhat inconsistent and careless in her interpretation.

Mr. Mole's selections were rendered with all his characteristic mastery, and the entire concert afforded as little opportunity for fault-finding as could be reasonably desired.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 17, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Comparatively Dull Programme Presented Last Evening.

While it has moments of beauty and interest, the scherzo, the best of the four movements claiming most of these, Goetz' symphony in F is not a work that appeals to the ordinary music lover. Even Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra could not remove the feeling of dulness that prevailed, and there was much more of an exodus before the symphony was concluded than has been noticeable the present season. It is to be understood, of course, that the interpretation was all that could well be desired; only there were a good many who would greatly have preferred another symphony to round out the programme. On the whole, the Goetz symphony may as well be left to musical analysists for the future, we think. It can hardly be said that the programme as a whole aroused much enthusiasm. The well-known Cherubini "Anacreon" overture and Svendsen's "Norwegian Rhapsody" were played with care and great intelligence, the characteristic themes of the Christiania composer particularly being brought out very clearly and effectively. Leo Shulz, the 'cellist, contributed the novelties on the programme. Eckert's concerto proved more interesting than Bruch's adagio, founded on an old Jewish chant. The soloist, while not by any means the most accomplished of 'cello performers, plays with skill and expression. There is observable at times a certain harshness or roughness of tone, but in the pianissimo passages his work is always delightful to hear, especially with such artistic accompaniment as that provided by Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra.

Boston composers are honored again in this week's programme, which includes Arthur Foote's suite for strings, first time here. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's Eighth symphony are also assigned for the concert, and Miss Gertrude Edmands is to sing Raff's "Dream King and his Love," as well as other selections. This is sure to be a "popular" concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

A Symphony Concert of Contrasts—The Hegner Matinee—"Bohemian Girl."

From grave to gay, from lively to severe, might have been the motto for Saturday's programme. The severe school began the concert, and Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture afforded a glimpse of a style where all modern sensationalism, and even the rich glow of tone color, to which we have become accustomed in these latter days, was absent, yet which charmed none the less, by its clear form, its purity of harmony, and its direct themes in masterly contrast. Mr. Nikisch read the work with a conservative style that would have pleased the composer.

Upon the heels of the debut of Mr. Hekking came another violoncellist, Mr. Leo Schuz, and again proved that the loss of Mr. Giese cannot readily be made good. His tone was thin, his intonation not always secure, but he was expressive, not to say sentimental, at almost all times, and his shading and phrasing were refined. The Eckert concerto, with which he began, was a peculiar work in two very distinct moods. It was sombre and dark in its earlier portions, and dashing and vigorous at its close. In these moods it but reflected the character of Scandinavian and Russian music, particularly as it ended with a Cossack folk song. The violoncellist certainly won a popular success and was recalled enthusiastically. His second number was a peculiar one, it was an arrangement of an ancient Hebrew melody—"Kol Nidrei"—by Max Bruch. The Jewish music has always been an interesting study to musical antiquarians, and many have endeavored to find in Hebraic tunes some trace of the music of ancient Jerusalem. In this direction, however, their efforts have been fruitless, for, in almost every case, the music of the modern Jews is tinged in a large degree by that of the nation where they reside. I may mention, in parentheses, that we have inferential proof that the scriptural music was by no means so beautiful as many clergymen, in enthusiastic metaphor, make it out to be. "Sing joyfully and clap your hands," "play skilfully and with a loud noise!" and many other scriptural phrases, as well as several passages in Josephus, show us that power and a strongly marked rhythm were the chief elements of the ancient Hebraic music. "Kol Nidrei" is an exception to the statement made above, in that it has retained something of its purity, having the same melody in synagogues most widely separated from each other. It retains, too, a very evident touch of Oriental character in its progressions, and it is generally sung without any harmony, having thus the monophonic character of the mediæval times. "Kol Nidrei" therefore may stand as the most ancient tune in the Hebrew ritual, as it certainly is the most impressive. In the Bruch arrangement it becomes more musical but less characteristic. The German composer has managed to eliminate the Hebraic character from the melody as he has washed out the Gaelic flavor from some of the Scotch songs which he has treated. Mr. Schulz played the work with sentimental languor rather than with any breadth.

It was in a marked degree a concert of national and folk music. Here we have seen the Cossack and the Hebrew touching elbows in the programme, and it now remains to speak of the Norwegian, who was represented in the list by Svendsen. Some years ago this Lion of the North played to me two of his scores in his residence, on the street with the unpronounceable name, in Copenhagen, and intimated that he proposed to do with the Scandinavian melodies what Liszt had done with the Hungarian. Right nobly has he achieved it. The wild "Halling" in two quarter rhythm and the graceful "spring dance" in triple rhythm, form an admirable contrast. The orchestration is something exquisite. Berlioz himself could not have excelled that effect of an oboe melody against violins in the highest position. The work was played by the orchestra in magnificent style, and Mr. Nikisch read it superbly, with all the abandon that a dance, where the men try to kick the overhanging rafters in a barn, demanded.

The one symphony of the poor genius who was so recently devoured by the wolf of poverty, in Winterthur, ended the programme. It is a beautiful work, as clear as the symphonies of Volkmann, but possessing more richness of elaboration and more breadth of theme than these. Most beautiful was the figure treatment in the first movement, extending even to the contrabass, and most clearly was it given. The second movement (contrary to the usual succession, in which the second is the slow movement) is a modern intermezzo, and has some very fine effects for wind instruments. The horn began this splendidly, and the antiphonal effects between this instrument and the woodwind, were also beyond reproach, nor must I forget to mention the clear tones of the trumpet and the effect of the condensed recapitulation of themes at the end—a remarkable coda. The third movement gave the first violins an opportunity to show their breadth of tone, and they employed it royally. I do not think the last movement as powerful as the rest of the work, but it was more than usually impressive because of the breadth and majesty with which Mr. Nikisch read it, and the perfect ensemble with which it was played. The concert was therefore throughout a most interesting one, and the programmes already show a greater degree of catholicity than they have possessed since the Henschelian days.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1889.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch made his bow to a very large audience on Saturday evening, and for the sixth concert he offered the following decidedly modern programme:

Overture to "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Concerto for violoncello, A minor, op. 26.....Eckert
Norwegian rhapsody, No. 2 in A, op. 19.....Svendsen
"Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra, op. 47.....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

The overture was very finely played, a beautiful balance being preserved in the orchestra, and the difficult passages for strings were very clear and distinct. Considerable interest was felt in Mr. Leo Schulz, the soloist, who came to this country at the wish of Mr. Nikisch. He is quite a young man, having been born in 1865 in Posen; he studied chiefly at the Hoch-Schule in Berlin under Joachim's direction, and the immediate instruction of Professors Müller and Hausmann. He made several successful tournées, especially one through Russia, and finally settled in Leipsec as soloist of both the Gewandhaus and the theatre orchestras, which place he left to seek his fortunes in America with his old conductor. He has not a strikingly strong tone, but its quality is exquisitely beautiful, and he has an easy command over almost infinitisimal nuances of power. His technique is remarkable, and his intonation very pure and true. The chief point of his playing, however, is the evident strength of his artistic individuality. He is one of those men who are musicians evidently because it would have been utterly impossible for them to have been anything else; and it is easy to see that he loves every note he produces from his instrument, and plays for the music alone, without thought of effect. The concerto was an interesting work of a rather higher grade—musically—than the majority of 'cello concertos, and Mr. Schulz did it full justice. A little scherzo which is introduced in the middle of the andante is particularly charming. The melancholy but beautiful "Kol Nidrei" (founded on a Jewish chant) seemed rather more in harmony with Mr. Schulz's especial style, and he played it with chaste and noble simplicity. The Svendsen number was probably more interesting to the student of instrumentation than to the public at large; and as an exemplification of possible orchestral combinations it was very striking. The Goetz symphony is a singular work. The adagio is the only number that shows signs of the same master hand that wrote the "Taming of the Shrew," which is one of the most beautiful romantic operas in the language. The first movement is not very clear, but this is perhaps owing to the indefinite character of the themes. The instrumentation is thick and muddy throughout the movement, especially at the opening. The intermezzo is on a much higher musical plane and has a little trio of exquisite beauty. The adagio, however, is a nobly lovely piece of writing, wonderfully scored and overflowing with passion and thoughtful sadness, but no trace of melancholy. It was superbly played by the orchestra, and it does not seem as if strings could acquit themselves better than did our players in this number. The last movement is bright and vivacious, and very melodious, but rather light in character. The whole work—as indeed the whole programme—was interpreted by Mr. Nikisch in the same thoughtful and consistently musical manner which characterizes all his work. Miss Gertrude Edmands will be the soloist at the next concert, and a novelty of Arthur Foote's—suite for strings—will be played.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

The lovers of novelties, or those who are clamoring for them, could not fail of satisfaction with Mr. Nikisch's programme of Saturday night. There were two pieces for the 'cello, with Mr. Leo Schultz as soloist, one a concerto by Eckert, the other a piece by Max Bruch, founded on a Jewish hymn, each given for the first time in this city, a Norwegian rhapsody by Svensden, for the first time in the Symphony concerts, and a symphony by Goetz which is very seldom given.

The only thing not a novelty was the overture "Anacreon," by Cherubini, and this was given a very clear and characteristic rendering by the conductor. Mr. Schultz, the second 'cello soloist of the season, made his first appearance before these audiences, and he was given a pleasant greeting. The concerto gives him opportunity to show an admirable technique, particularly in the last movement, which is in strong contrast with the very slow tempo of the opening numbers. The second selection showed the clear tone of his instrument, and the work was given tenderly and sympathetically. The audience was surely pleased with Mr. Schultz and his playing.

Mr. Nikisch gave a brilliant rendering of the Norwegian rhapsody and there was much interest manifest in the symphony. There was abundant material for the display of the technique of the flutes, the horns and the 'cellos, and it was made the most of. The shading was excellent, and the transitions from pianissimo to forte were done gracefully, under the conductor's baton. The symphony is one of the best things of Goetz and gave much pleasure to the auditors, particularly the "intermezzo" and "adagio." There was the usual large audience and the usual absence of departures from the hall in large numbers before the close of the concert. Mr. Nikisch has a faculty of moving the concert along: he does not leave the stage prior to the symphony, and cause a wait of from 10 to 15 minutes, but after a pleasant chat with some of his orchestra he proceeds at once to the work in hand. We think his method pleases the audience, and the concerts are ended in season sufficiently early to allow suburban patrons to take their trains. The next concert is to close with Beethoven's 8th Symphony, and, at last, we are to have a lady soloist—Boston's favorite contralto, Miss Gertrude Edmands.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 17, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as a programme, with Mr. Leo Schulz as soloist, the following list of selections:

Overture (Anacreon).....Cherubini
Concerto for violoncello.....Eckert
Rhapsodie Norvegienne.....Svendsen
Kol Nidrei, for violoncello and orchestra.....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

There was no lack of novelties in this programme, the numbers by Eckert, Svendsen and Bruch all having a first hearing in these concerts on this occasion, and each of these novelties was well chosen. The chief charm in the Eckert concerto was the final movements, in which the Cossaque dance theme is treated in a very brilliant fashion, affording equal prominence to the solo instrument and the varied orchestral combination of the accompaniment. The "Norwegian Rhapsody" made, also, a very pleasing feature of the programme, and Mr. Nikisch gave it a most fascinating performance, his rendering of the fanciful composition bringing out all the quaint beauty of the simple melodies upon which it is based with charming effect. The composition by Bruch, founded upon a Jewish melody used in the service of the synagogue, is another of the many satisfactory works that this composer has contributed to these programmes, and it was greatly enjoyed. The solo playing by Mr. Schulz proved him to be a well schooled musician and a very competent master of the technique of his instrument, though he falls somewhat below the high standard set by the 'cello soloists at these concerts in recent years. His tone is not always as pure as is desirable, and his playing lack the feeling and expression demanded in such compositions as that by Bruch. The Cherubini overture was finely read, and the beauties of the Goetz symphony were admirably brought out in this performance. The audience was again inclined to give the conductor ample praise for all the good work done under his baton, and the soloist of the evening was similarly appreciated.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Anacréon."
Eckert: Concerto for 'cello in A minor, Op. 26.
Svendsen: Rhapsodie norvégienne, No. 2, in A, Op. 19.
Bruch: Kol Nidrei, for 'cello and orchestra. Op. 47.
Goetz: Symphony in F.

Mr. Leo Schulz was the 'cellist.

Cherubini's "Anacréon" overture, not the most interesting of the composer's overtures, but a work which is, nevertheless, full of charming details, was admirably played. The Svendsen Rhapsodie, an unpleasant composition, and to our ears, at least, disagreeably scored, was also played with immense verve and spirit. Hermann Goetz's symphony has not been given here ntire for several years; the delightful Intermezzo has been given separately, now and then, and has always made a fine impression. This Intermezzo is probably the one movement by which the symphony is destined to live; it is charming from beginning to end. The first movement has much that is fine in it, as have also the Adagio and the Finale, albeit that, in these last two movements, the modern and the classical elements are not very well amalgamated, and they lack unity of mood and style. The performance was in every way superb.

Mr. Schulz, who appeared for the first time in these concerts as a solo player, has a finished, brilliant technique, and plays with great sentiment and charm. His phrasing is particularly graceful and musical, and his intonation excellent. His tone is a little veiled, but this may be the fault of his instrument. He made a distinctly fine impression. The Eckert concerto that he played has the advantoge over most 'cello concertos we have heard here, that Kapellmeistermusik has over Virtuosenmusik; if it have nothing in it to interest one especially, it at least does not sicken one by pretentious silliness. Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" stands on a decidedly higher plane, and shows the composer in one of his characteristic impressive moods; yet one can not but feel that the 'cello, with its warm, sweet tone, has rather the effect of weakening and sentimentalizing the austere solemnity of the great chant of atonement which the composer has taken for his theme. Upon the whole, the programme was the dullest we have had this season; there was overmuch 'cello in it, to begin with—and heaven knows that a very little 'cello solo goes a longish way—and there was a lamentable lack of anything that could be called really great.

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Genoveva"; Raff, song, "Der Traumkönig und sein Lieb"; Foote, suite for strings; songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F. Miss Gertrude Edmands will be the singer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889.

The Adamowski Concert.

The first concert by the Adamowski Quartet was given last night in Steinert Hall, with the assistance of Miss Obrion and Mr. Eliot Hubbard. The programme included the Schumann Quartet in A minor for strings, and the Brahms in A major for piano and strings, both of these numbers being calculated to test the musical abilities of this new organization. The playing, under the careful lead of Mr. Adamowski, may be commended for a delicate finish and careful ensemble, the scherzo and finale of the Brahms number being given with a good degree of dash and brilliancy, while the effect of all the various movements was satisfactory. The concert introduced to a Boston audience the 'cellist, Mr. J. Adamowski, who furnished two solo numbers and gave an artistic rendition, ranking with any of the recent concert work on that instrument. The programme was also varied by a group of Frang lieder, sung by Mr. Hubbard.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTH CONCERT.

The Symphony concert last evening effectively opened with that most famous of the Cherubini overtures, the ever welcome "Anacreon." It is not surprising that this overture so gloriously holds its own and comparing so favorably, as it does, with the best modern work of its class. For once, Cherubini was moved to treat melody so as to have it come upon the ear in the clearest and most effective way, and at the same time lead an irresistible flow of sterling harmony into the heart of his themes. The overture in fact, is one of the sublimest efforts of which music, at the time in which it was written, was capable.

The soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz, created a highly favorable impression by his performance of the Eckert concerto in A minor. His playing is that of an uncommonly well-schooled artist, is rich and voluminous in tone, and masterly as regards style. In a praiseworthy sense he is the very antithesis of a sentimental performer; yet it would be unfair to imply that he is to any extent unmusical. He seemed thoroughly in his element with the Bruch adagio, his performance of which was received with unusual manifestations of approval.

The Svendsen "Rhapsodie Norvegienne" is a work that very justly bears its title, grotesque in conception and thoroughly characteristic, yet of no more than passing interest as regards scholarly merit and melodious detail.

The concert ended with the Goetz symphony in F, which has once before (in 1887) been heard here. A more poetic and at the same time genial symphony it would be difficult to name. Although not so evenly profound as a number of its more important contemporaries, it is nevertheless a brilliant and impressive work, and was finely rendered.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

In selecting a programme for the first Young People's Popular concert of the season Mr. Nikisch showed commendable judgment. The selections performed by the orchestra included the overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville;" the Siegfried Idyll of Wagner; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber; and overture to "Rienzi;" Wagner. The soloists were Mme. Carl Alves and Mons. Ch. Mole.

The delight that the occasion afforded, especially to the younger portion of the audience, was apparently unlimited. Rossini's melodious and popular overture received able and effective treatment. The Siegfried motive was taken at a somewhat faster tempo than our public has been accustomed to hear it, but with no diminution of that entrancing effect that it invariably creates.

Mme. Alves with the aria from Saint Saëns's "Samson" proved herself to be an artist of the first rank, not only by the dramatic richness and sympathy of her voice, but by the fervency and integrity of her musical expression. She was not so successful with the songs by Grieg, Schumann, and Rheinberger, being somewhat inconsistent and careless in her interpretation.

Mr. Mole's selections were rendered with all his characteristic mastery, and the entire concert afforded as little opportunity for fault-finding as could be reasonably desired.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, NOV. 17, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Comparatively Dull Programme Presented Last Evening.

While it has moments of beauty and interest, the scherzo, the best of the four movements claiming most of these, Goetz' symphony in F is not a work that appeals to the ordinary music lover. Even Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra could not remove the feeling of dulness that prevailed, and there was much more of an exodus before the symphony was concluded than has been noticeable the present season. It is to be understood, of course, that the interpretation was all that could well be desired; only there were a good many who would greatly have preferred another symphony to round out the programme. On the whole, the Goetz symphony may as well be left to musical analysists for the future, we think. It can hardly be said that the programme as a whole aroused much enthusiasm. The well-known Cherubini "Anacreon" overture and Svendsen's "Norwegian Rhapsody" were played with care and great intelligence, the characteristic themes of the Christiania composer particularly being brought out very clearly and effectively. Leo Shulz, the 'cellist, contributed the novelties on the programme. Eckert's concerto proved more interesting than Bruch's adagio, founded on an old Jewish chaut. The soloist, while not by any means the most accomplished of 'cello performers, plays with skill and expression. There is observable at times a certain harshness or roughness of tone, but in the pianissimo passages his work is always delightful to hear, especially with such artistic accompaniment as that provided by Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra.

Boston composers are honored again in this week's programme, which includes Arthur Foote's suite for strings, first time here. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's Eighth symphony are also assigned for the concert, and Miss Gertrude Edmands is to sing Raff's "Dream King and his Love," as well as other selections. This is sure to be a "popular" concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

A Symphony Concert of Contrasts—The Hegner Matinee—"Bohemian Girl."

From grave to gay, from lively to severe, might have been the motto for Saturday's programme. The severe school began the concert, and Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture afforded a glimpse of a style where all modern sensationalism, and even the rich glow of tone color, to which we have become accustomed in these latter days, was absent, yet which charmed none the less, by its clear form, its purity of harmony, and its direct themes in masterly contrast. Mr. Nikisch read the work with a conservative style that would have pleased the composer.

Upon the heels of the debut of Mr. Hekking came another violoncellist, Mr. Leo Schuz, and again proved that the loss of Mr. Giese cannot readily be made good. His tone was thin, his intonation not always secure, but he was expressive, not to say sentimental, at almost all times, and his shading and phrasing were refined. The Eckert concerto, with which he began, was a peculiar work in two very distinct moods. It was sombre and dark in its earlier portions, and dashing and vigorous at its close. In these moods it but reflected the character of Scandinavian and Russian music, particularly as it ended with a Cossack folk song. The violoncellist certainly won a popular success and was recalled enthusiastically. His second number was a peculiar one, it was an arrangement of an ancient Hebrew melody—"Kol Nidrei"—by Max Bruch. The Jewish music has always been an interesting study to musical antiquarians, and many have endeavored to find in Hebraic tunes some trace of the music of ancient Jerusalem. In this direction, however, their efforts have been fruitless, for, in almost every case, the music of the modern Jews is tinged in a large degree by that of the nation where they reside. I may mention, in parentheses, that we have inferential proof that the scriptural music was by no means so beautiful as many clergymen, in enthusiastic metaphor, make it out to be. "Sing joyfully and clap your hands," "play skilfully and with a loud noise!" and many other scriptural phrases, as well as several passages in Josephus, show us that power and a strongly marked rhythm were the chief elements of the ancient Hebraic music. "Kol Nidrei" is an exception to the statement made above, in that it has retained something of its purity, having the same melody in synagogues most widely separated from each other. It retains, too, a very evident touch of Oriental character in its progressions, and it is generally sung without any harmony, having thus the monophonic character of the mediæval times. "Kol Nidrei" therefore may stand as the most ancient tune in the Hebrew ritual, as it certainly is the most impressive. In the Bruch arrangement it becomes more musical but less characteristic. The German composer has managed to eliminate the Hebraic character from the melody as he has washed out the Gaelic flavor from some of the Scotch songs which he has treated. Mr. Schulz played the work with sentimental languor rather than with any breadth.

It was in a marked degree a concert of national and folk music. Here we have seen the Cossack and the Hebrew touching elbows in the programme, and it now remains to speak of the Norwegian, who was represented in the list by Svendsen. Some years ago this Lion of the North played to me two of his scores in his residence, on the street with the unpronounceable name, in Copenhagen, and intimated that he proposed to do with the Scandinavian melodies what Liszt had done with the Hungarian. Right nobly has he achieved it. The wild "Halling" in two quarter rhythm and the graceful "spring dance" in triple rhythm, form an admirable contrast. The orchestration is something exquisite. Berlioz himself could not have excelled that effect of an oboe melody against violins in the highest position. The work was played by the orchestra in magnificent style, and Mr. Nikisch read it superbly, with all the abandon that a dance, where the men try to kick the overhanging rafters in a barn, demanded.

The one symphony of the poor genius who was so recently devoured by the wolf of poverty, in Winterthur, ended the programme. It is a beautiful work, as clear as the symphonies of Volkmann, but possessing more richness of elaboration and more breadth of theme than these. Most beautiful was the figure treatment in the first movement, extending even to the contrabass, and most clearly was it given. The second movement (contrary to the usual succession, in which the second is the slow movement) is a modern intermezzo, and has some very fine effects for wind instruments. The horn began this splendidly, and the antiphonal effects between this instrument and the wood-wind, were also beyond reproach, nor must I forget to mention the clear tones of the trumpet and the effect of the condensed recapitulation of themes at the end—a remarkable coda. The third movement gave the first violins an opportunity to show their breadth of tone, and they employed it royally. I do not think the last movement as powerful as the rest of the work, but it was more than usually impressive because of the breadth and majesty with which Mr. Nikisch read it, and the perfect ensemble with which it was played. The concert was therefore throughout a most interesting one, and the programmes already show a greater degree of catholicity than they have possessed since the Henschelian days.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1889

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch made his bow to a very large audience on Saturday evening, and for the sixth concert he offered the following decidedly modern programme:

Overture to "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Concerto for violoncello, A minor, op. 26 .....Eckert
Norwegian rhapsody, No. 2 in A, op. 19 .....Svendsen
"Kol Nidrei," for violoncello and orchestra, op. 47.....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

The overture was very finely played, a beautiful balance being preserved in the orchestra, and the difficult passages for strings were very clear and distinct. Considerable interest was felt in Mr. Leo Schulz, the soloist, who came to this country at the wish of Mr. Nikisch. He is quite a young man, having been born in 1865 in Posen; he studied chiefly at the Hoch-Schule in Berlin under Joachim's direction, and the immediate instruction of Professors Müller and Hausmann. He made several successful tournées, especially one through Russia, and finally settled in Leipsec as soloist of both the Gewandhaus and the theatre orchestras, which place he left to seek his fortunes in America with his old conductor. He has not a strikingly strong tone, but its quality is exquisitely beautiful, and he has an easy command over almost infinitisimal nuances of power. His technique is remarkable, and his intonation very pure and true. The chief point of his playing, however, is the evident strength of his artistic individuality. He is one of those men who are musicians evidently because it would have been utterly impossible for them to have been anything else; and it is easy to see that he loves every note he produces from his instrument, and plays for the music alone, without thought of effect. The concerto was an interesting work of a rather higher grade—musically—than the majority of 'cello concertos, and Mr. Schulz did it full justice. A little scherzo which is introduced in the middle of the andante is particularly charming. The melancholy but beautiful "Kol Nidrei" (founded on a Jewish chant) seemed rather more in harmony with Mr. Schulz's especial style, and he played it with chaste and noble simplicity. The Svendsen number was probably more interesting to the student of instrumentation than to the public at large; and as an exemplification of possible orchestral combinations it was very striking. The Goetz symphony is a singular work. The adagio is the only number that shows signs of the same master hand that wrote the "Taming of the Shrew," which is one of the most beautiful romantic operas in the language. The first movement is not very clear, but this is perhaps owing to the indefinite character of the themes. The instrumentation is thick and muddy throughout the movement, especially at the opening. The intermezzo is on a much higher musical plane and has a little trio of exquisite beauty. The adagio, however, is a nobly lovely piece of writing, wonderfully scored and overflowing with passion and thoughtful sadness, but no trace of melancholy. It was superbly played by the orchestra, and it does not seem as if strings could acquit themselves better than did our players in this number. The last movement is bright and vivacious, and very melodious, but rather light in character. The whole work—as indeed the whole programme—was interpreted by Mr. Nikisch in the same thoughtful and consistently musical manner which characterizes all his work. Miss Gertrude Edmands will be the soloist at the next concert, and a novelty of Arthur Foote's—suite for strings—will be played.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 18, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

The lovers of novelties, or those who are clamoring for them, could not fail of satisfaction with Mr. Nikisch's programme of Saturday night. There were two pieces for the 'cello, with Mr. Leo Schultz as soloist, one a concerto by Eckert, the other a piece by Max Bruch, founded on a Jewish hymn, each given for the first time in this city, a Norwegian rhapsody by Svensden, for the first time in the Symphony concerts, and a symphony by Goetz which is very seldom given.

The only thing not a novelty was the overture "Anacreon," by Cherubini, and this was given a very clear and characteristic rendering by the conductor. Mr. Schultz, the second 'cello soloist of the season, made his first appearance before these audiences, and he was given a pleasant greeting. The concerto gives him opportunity to show an admirable technique, particularly in the last movement, which is in strong contrast with the very slow tempo of the opening numbers. The second selection showed the clear tone of his instrument, and the work was given tenderly and sympathetically. The audience was surely pleased with Mr. Schultz and his playing.

Mr. Nikisch gave a brilliant rendering of the Norwegian rhapsody and there was much interest manifest in the symphony. There was abundant material for the display of the technique of the flutes, the horns and the 'cellos, and it was made the most of. The shading was excellent, and the transitions from pianissimo to forte were done gracefully, under the conductor's baton. The symphony is one of the best things of Goetz and gave much pleasure to the auditors, particularly the "intermezzo" and "adagio." There was the usual large audience and the usual absence of departures from the hall in large numbers before the close of the concert. Mr. Nikisch has a faculty of moving the concert along: he does not leave the stage prior to the symphony, and cause a wait of from 10 to 15 minutes, but after a pleasant chat with some of his orchestra he proceeds at once to the work in hand. We think his method pleases the audience, and the concerts are ended in season sufficiently early to allow suburban patrons to take their trains. The next concert is to close with Beethoven's 8th Symphony, and, at last, we are to have a lady soloist—Boston's favorite contralto, Miss Gertrude Edmands.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 17, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as a programme, with Mr. Leo Schulz as soloist, the following list of selections:

Overture (Anacreon).....Cherubini
Concerto for violoncello.....Eckert
Rhapsodie Norvegienne.....Svendsen
Kol Nidrei, for violoncello and orchestra....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

There was no lack of novelties in this programme, the numbers by Eckert, Svendsen and Bruch all having a first hearing in these concerts on this occasion, and each of these novelties was well chosen. The chief charm in the Eckert concerto was the final movements, in which the Cosaque dance theme is treated in a very brilliant fashion, affording equal prominence to the solo instrument and the varied orchestral combination of the accompaniment. The "Norwegian Rhapsody" made, also, a very pleasing feature of the programme, and Mr. Nikisch gave it a most fascinating performance, his rendering of the fanciful composition bringing out all the quaint beauty of the simple melodies upon which it is based with charming effect. The composition by Bruch, founded upon a Jewish melody used in the service of the synagogue, is another of the many satisfactory works that this composer has contributed to these programmes, and it was greatly enjoyed. The solo playing by Mr. Schulz proved him to be a well schooled musician and a very competent master of the technique of his instrument, though he falls somewhat below the high standard set by the 'cello soloists at these concerts in recent years. His tone is not always as pure as is desirable, and his playing lacks the feeling and expression demanded in such compositions as that by Bruch. The Cherubini overture was finely read, and the beauties of the Goetz symphony were admirably brought out in this performance. The audience was again inclined to give the conductor ample praise for all the good work done under his baton, and the soloist of the evening was similarly appreciated.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert was as follows:

Cherubini: Overture to "Anacréon."
Eckert: Concerto for 'cello in A minor, Op. 26.
Svendsen: Rhapsodie norvégienne, No. 2, in A, Op. 19.
Bruch: Kol Nidrei, for 'cello and orchestra. Op. 47.
Goetz: Symphony in F.

Mr. Leo Schulz was the 'cellist.

Cherubini's "Anacréon" overture, not the most interesting of the composer's overtures, but a work which is, nevertheless, full of charming details, was admirably played. The Svendsen Rhapsodie, an unpleasant composition, and to our ears, at least, disagreeably scored, was also played with immense verve and spirit. Hermann Goetz's symphony has not been given here ntire for several years; the delightful Intermezzo has been given separately, now and then, and has always made a fine impression. This Intermezzo is probably the one movement by which the symphony is destined to live; it is charming from beginning to end. The first movement has much that is fine in it, as have also the Adagio and the Finale, albeit that, in these last two movements, the modern and the classical elements are not very well amalgamated, and they lack unity of mood and style. The performance was in every way superb.

Mr. Schulz, who appeared for the first time in these concerts as a solo player, has a finished, brilliant technique, and plays with great sentiment and charm. His phrasing is particularly graceful and musical, and his intonation excellent. His tone is a little veiled, but this may be the fault of his instrument. He made a distinctly fine impression. The Eckert concerto that he played has the advantoge over most 'cello concertos we have heard here, that Kapellmeistermusik has over Virtuosenmusik; if it have nothing in it to interest one especially, it at least does not sicken one by pretentious silliness. Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" stands on a decidedly higher plane, and shows the composer in one of his characteristic impressive moods; yet one can not but feel that the 'cello, with its warm, sweet tone, has rather the effect of weakening and sentimentalizing the austere solemnity of the great chant of atonement which the composer has taken for his theme. Upon the whole, the programme was the dullest we have had this season; there was overmuch 'cello in it, to begin with—and heaven knows that a very little 'cello solo goes a longish way—and there was a lamentable lack of anything that could be called really great.

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Genoveva"; Raff, song, "Der Traumkönig und sein Lieb"; Foote, suite for strings; songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F. Miss Gertrude Edmands will be the singer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889.

The Adamowski Concert.

The first concert by the Adamowski Quartet was given last night in Steinert Hall, with the assistance of Miss Obrion and Mr. Eliot Hubbard. The programme included the Schumann Quartet in A minor for strings, and the Brahms in A major for piano and strings, both of these numbers being calculated to test the musical abilities of this new organization. The playing, under the careful lead of Mr. Adamowski, may be commended for a delicate finish and careful ensemble, the scherzo and finale of the Brahms number being given with a good degree of dash and brilliancy, while the effect of all the various movements was satisfactory. The concert introduced to a Boston audience the 'cellist, Mr. J. Adamowski, who furnished two solo numbers and gave an artistic rendition, ranking with any of the recent concert work on that instrument. The programme was also varied by a group of Frang lieder, sung by Mr. Hubbard.

BOSTON HERALD.
SUNDAY, NOV. 18, 1889.

THAT FIFTH SYMPHONY.

Was Mr. Nikisch Right in Its Interpretation?

Warren Davenport Dissents, and Tells Why—The Character of the Work Done by the Orchestra Freely Discussed—The Bad Effect of Such Performances Pointed Out.

The effort of Mr. Nikisch at his fifth concert to show the development of the symphony as illustrated in the works of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, was well intended upon his part, no doubt, but his audience did not require the demonstration as a lesson in such advancement, for during the past eight years it has had the works of these masters so frequently and so happily presented that it were bringing coals to Newcastle, if it was his intention to be instructive, to add his contribution, even had it been of a quality that deserved serious attention. Possibly Mr. Nikisch was more anxious to show the audience what his idea of an interpretation of the classics was, and made this historical representation the pretext for such an offering. Be this as it may, he embraced the opportunity to present this illustrious trio of old masters; but with what success? For the past 30 years Boston has had the classics presented through the efforts of musicians well equipped in the art, conversant in what has been regarded as the traditional rendering of the various forms of compositions of the old school. Many of them possessed breadth and cultivation in the art sufficient for a complete mastery of the modern modes of composition as well, and a consequent thorough appreciation of the works of the more recent and contemporary writers of the romantic and dramatic schools. Among these interpreters have been musicians of eminent degree and world wide reputation, whose conceptions of the older masters so generally agree that it has resulted in establishing a standard of so high a value that the meretricious endeavors of an innovation now and then has not prevailed in the least in disturbing it in the estimation of competent and unbiased listeners. Such a standard must necessarily pass current as the "tradition" so trivially commented upon by our younger and less reverential artists and critics. That the models given us here in Boston by such musicians as Rubenstein, Von Bulow, Theodore Thomas, Gericke and many other noted ones, should so clearly present the spirit of the old school compositions in the same light, would seem to be sufficient in impressing less gifted musicians and doubting critics of the importance of accepting such a standard. In the matter of tempi the above named may slightly disagree with each other, and sometimes vary the same in their individual efforts at different times, but the character of the interpretation was virtually the same in every case. How Mr. Nikisch became possessed of his peculiar ideas regarding the rendition of the classics I am at a loss to conceive, unless they are creations of his own brain. It couldn't have been the result of listening to the models in pedantic Leipsic; or from the standard at Vienna, or anywhere else in Europe where a competent conductor has charge of affairs. How much a theatrical career has been accountable for the excentricities and exaggerations of his tawdry display I cannot say, but that he has mistaken the symphonic for the dramatic in musical art cannot be denied. I would say to those younger listeners who attended this demonstration of Mr. Nikisch, that if they wish to discover the characteristics of the three old masters which he intended to display, they had better continue to study the composition through the medium of their piano scores and wait a more favorable opportunity for an orchestral revelation of the same. There are a number of musicians and some of the critics who are in accord with this bizarre specimen Mr. Nikisch offered as his conception of the three symphonies, who, in casting about for a cloak to cover its strangeness, have fallen upon the words of the mighty Wagner, and thus sought to defend their doubtful position. It were foolish to bolster this vagary of Mr. Nikisch by claiming that Wagner would sanction such a sensational effort as was witnessed upon the occasion in question. It is true that Wagner has said that some scope must be left to the performer in his conception of the author's intention. This meant no more than a comparatively discreet liberty in the interpretation. A comparative liberty is one thing and an unbridled license is quite another thing. Had Wagner witnessed the almost brutal treatment that his beloved

Beethoven's Immortal Symphony

received at the hands of Mr. Nikisch, he would have administered a rebuke that would have startled the obsequious followers of his own theories who are striving to find excuses for the idiosyncrasies of Mr. Nikisch, whose new broom has swept them, with their whims and notions, into the rubbish heap of his own caprice. If the works of any master will permit of the full swing of the musical pendulum in the delineation thereof, such opportunities exist in the music dramas of Wagner. And yet, woe be unto the conductor who, in the great master's presence, had allowed his orchestra to rasp, blow and pound the orchestral structure, regardless of the unity of its design. The modifying influence of the inclosed and sunken orchestra is as much a part of Wagner's effort to temper and blend all orchestral effects as are any of the other devices upon the stage employed in the presentation of his dramas. It is only through this tempering accessory that the brilliancy, power, sonority, yes, the violence, of his indications can be fully delivered, and yet reach the ears of the listeners in a perfect ensemble, the result of an acoustical condition that could not exist if the orchestra was above board. And all this modifying influence in the most dramatic form of composition identical with musical art. There is a long distance between the character of a symphony of Beethoven and the music drama of Wagner, and to attempt any form of miscegenation in their reunion must cause Wagner's spirit to look down in pity upon its perpetrators, and the effort to quote the great master of modern orchestration in support of Mr. Nikisch's perversion of symphonic art is a narrow means to a meagre end. But to return to Mr. Nikisch's demonstration. Let us pass over the performance of Haydn's symphony, which, although not exactly rank, nevertheless left little or nothing of the simple charm that is inseparable with his genius, also the uncouth rasping that attended the playing of Mozart's incomparable G minor symphony, and see what havoc was played with the noble fifth symphony of Beethoven! I hardly know where to begin to speak of the brutal treatment of this work at the hands of the players under the whip of their conductors' enthusi-

[illegible] once the production of normal tone [illegible] to the level

[illegible] respect the performance [illegible] of combined effort, [illegible] and rosin was reached. The wood wind was strained to its utmost, the brass was forced to a point that was course and ragged in the extreme, while the drums were pounded out of all reason.

When we regard the automatic perfection the orchestra had gained under Mr. Gericke it is easy to place the blame for this vulgar display. Unisfluenced, it would take a long time for such a well drilled body of players to fall so low from their high standard of excellence. Here was an exemplification of the one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, or, more particularly expressed, from the normal to the abnormal. To ask a horn player to force his instrument until the individuality of its tone is destroyed and a hoarse blast emitted instead does not reflect much credit on the taste or judgment of the conductor who would do such a thing. Mr. Reiter and his companions have never before been guilty of such coarse and unseemly sounds as they blasted forth under the baton of Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Reiter is a wonderful artist, and produces a large, voluminous tone that he can modulate to the least whisper and expand at his will to the most gratifying magnitude. It is different in quality from the tone that we have been accustomed to in the efforts of the many able performers upon that noble instrument that have been with us at various times, Mr. Reiter's tone being more like that which one gets from the saxhorn type of instrument. I do not say that it resembles it exactly, but, rather, that it leans in that direction. This is not so much because of the heroic element in the player as that he probably uses the high B horn instead of the F horn. Mr. Reiter's equal has never appeared in Boston, and in his greatest moments, under Mr. Gericke's baton, he displayed a mastery of the instrument and played with a broad and noble conception of his part that disarmed all criticism. I would impress upon my readers that never before this

Mutilation of the Fifth Symphony under Mr. Nikisch, not even in his most emotional efforts have I ever heard Mr. Reiter overblow his instrument. It almost seemed on this occasion as if he and his companion horn player blew their fearful blasts in clear ridicule of the situation. A kindred effort was the blasts from the trombones in the last movement of the Schuman D minor symphony at a previous concert. Mr. Gericke had repressed the brass always, sometimes to the advantage of the score and sometimes to its detriment. Mr. Nikisch has so far exceeded the demands to an unfortunate degree. Up to the present time, the programmes have not called for the trombones, except in two or three numbers all told. We may have been fortunate, perhaps, in this direction, if we are to judge by what we have already experienced. As regards the efforts of all the instruments in this performance of Beethoven symphony, the best that can be said is that the effect was coarse. If this coarseness and violence had been only at stated intervals, at natural climaxes, it would have, in a degree, mitigated the offence to the sensitive listeners, all of whom are kindly disposed toward Mr. Nikisch for his geniality and modest demeanor have already endeared him to his new-made friends and to the members of his orchestra, and this enviable reputation is abroad among his audience generally. But the difficulty was that the exaggeration was continuous almost throughout the work. It was one of those occasions when distance lent enchantment. Such a thing is a gradation of tone, did not appear once—p, pp, ppp, were all alike. So also f, ff, fff. Never once did he reach a point of repose. It was all oversized, except the short cadenza for the oboe, which, to the critical listener, although of only one measure's duration, came like a breath from heaven. The general effect was one fiendish rasp and blow, with an occasional lull. There was not even an attempt made at shading. I trust I may never be subjected to another such an effort. If Mr. Nikisch presents this as his conception of Beethoven's intentions, he had best reform altogether through a serious study of symphonic, music versus dramatic music. In the former all sentimentality must be avoided. The purity of the former, the equal sustaining of the theme and the accessory work, an almost metronomic exactitude of the time except when otherwise indicated, and the care that the slower movements shall not be so slow as to drag, and the faster ones so fast as to become blurred in the execution, are requisites that must absolutely exist, else its symphonic character is lost. The conductor who will exaggerate or sentimentalize the classics is akin to him who would flesh tint the pure marble, or hang garments upon a statue. Symphonic art and the dramatic in music stand in the relative position of Grecian art to the modern painting. The line must be sharply drawn between them. Let Mr. Nikisch consider well before he repeats his error by again demonstrating his confusion of the symphonic and dramatic in musical art. What can be said of an audience that can go wild with enthusiasm over such a musical bull fight? When we remember the wonderfully perfect performance that Mr. Gericke gave of this same work on the night of his farewell concert, the offspring of his exceptional taste in the classics, its integrity to the composer, his refined conception, his command of the whole gamut of dynamical expression, the delicacy of the shading, the clearness of the themes, and a corresponding value to the accessory work, all a unit of accord, and then consider for a moment the rankness of his successor's effort; it staggers one's faith in the intelligence of an audience that will applaud both equally. It is the greatest satire upon the boasted musical culture of a Boston audience that one can imagine. I also saw musicians of standing who were as excited and enthusiastic as were the general listeners. I cannot but think that they must feel ashamed of themselves when they stop and calmly think how this boisterous, vulgar display of noise had for the time being paralyzed their better judgment. Some of the critics expressed their delight with this effort of Mr. Nikisch, others discouraged it mildly, while the able critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette condemned it in fitting terms, branding it as art, not to use so harsh a word as impertinent. I will also add that some of the most liberal and worthy musicians have remarked to me that they regarded it in the light of a desecration, almost, of the great master who brought symphonic art to perfection. There are many traits in Mr. Nikisch that point to the acquirement of eminent ability as a conductor, and it is to be regretted that he should erect such a barrier to a universal aknowledgment of his competency to fill the position that Mr. Higginson has given him. It may be a fine thing to have a good memory and thus retain the outline of a composition and some particular points for emphasis sufficiently to enable one to conduct without the score. It is safe also to do it with such a well drilled and competent body of players before you as the Boston Symphony orchestra, who could not go astray or break down if the conductor did not indicate the time even in one out of one hundred measures. The "cues" he would receive in the confident execution of their parts would refresh such a memory if it faltered. But it is a much better thing to look into the soul of the composer by minutely following the intricate design of his score, and thus reveal the expression of his intention by an acute attention to the nuances of the work. This is what Mr. Gericke could do par excellence, and at the same time command the most exacting attention and most skilful efforts of his players. This insight and ability Mr. Nikisch has not as yet revealed in his performances. But a great conductor must do more [illegible] must [illegible] the effort was his own [illegible] Gericke may [illegible] the composer. [illegible] Mr. Gericke rarely succeeded. Mr. Nikisch evidently has the fire and enthusiasm to reach the height of an emotional rendering, but he lacks the elements of a master of technical and dynamic perfection to temper and control his enthusiasm. Let him put himself in rigid training, and acquire this first of all to be acquired requisites, the perfect drillmaster, and then he will outshine his predecessor. The opportunity is in his very hands. Let him embrace it, and he will prove a success, if he combines with it a liberal spirit toward the schools of all nations of musical value, and exhibits the same by performing works from each in a reasonable proportion.

Vulgar and Tasteless

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[24]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

HYPERION THEATRE, NEW HAVEN,

MONDAY EVENINGS, AT 8.

December 16th, January 13th, February 10th, March 17th.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1889-90

PROGRAMME

I

Subscription now open at the warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons. Season tickets, with reserved seats for the four Concerts, $5.00. Subscription closes Saturday evening, Nov. 30th. Tickets delivered, to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, on Monday and Tuesday, Dec. 2d and 3d.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Sixth Symphony Concert, Mr. Leo Schultz, Soloist.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert was:

Cherubini.	Overture, "Anacreon."
Eckert.	Concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 26, Allegro moderato.—Andante; Scherzo vivace; Andante—Allegro non troppo (Rondo a la Cosaque). (First time in Boston.)
Svendsen.	Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2, in A, op. 19, (First time at these concerts.)
Bruch.	"Kol Nidrei" for violoncello and orchestra, op. 47. (First time in Boston.)
Goetz.	Symphony in F.

The soloist was Mr. Leo Schultz, a new member of the orchestra this season, who formerly played in Leipzig under Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Schultz has the credit of introducing two interesting novelties. The Eckert concerto is genial music, not strikingly original but artistic throughout and, in the solo portions, quite skilful. The last movement is rhythmically interesting. Bruch's piece is an arrangement of a Hebrew chant. It is in two sections, the second by reason of a warmer accompaniment in which the harp plays a part being more important. Mr. Schultz's playing is correct and musical his tone is not large, but the superior expressive quality of his performances is undeniable. The orchestra accompanied both selections carefully and sympathetically. Mr. Schultz was recalled after each.

In the three pieces for orchestra Mr. Nikisch showed how fine a colorist he is, especially in the lovely Goetz symphony, under whose glowing instrumentation is revealed great emotional force. The symphony was splendidly played, the brilliant finale being accorded a magnificent reading. Svendsen has an individuality of his own, and we are glad Mr. Nikisch is so well acquainted with it. Mr. Cherubini's straight-laced sentences had to bend a little under our conductor's flexible elbow, but no one was harmed, and Mr. Cherubini's music sounded all the better. Everybody in the audience on Saturday night seemed happy. Was it because there was no "tradition breaking" going on? Next Saturday the programme will contain Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, a new suite for strings by Arthur Foote. Miss Gertrude Edmands

BOSTON HERALD.
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

This recently organized quartet, consisting of the well known players, T. Adamowski, 1st violin; A. Moldauer, 2d violin; D. Kuntz, viola and J. Adamowski, violoncello, gave the first concert of a series of three, last night in Steinert Hall, before a select and fashionable audience.

The programme opened with the familiar Schumann quartet in A minor, op 41, first of the three dedicated to Mendelssohn. Though a little unsteady in the opening movement and scherzo, the general excellent result was indicative of great care, being highly commendable, notably the rendering by Mr. Kuntz of the difficult viola part. Mr. Eliot Hubbard's contribution of the following songs by Franz, (a) "Madchen mit dem rothen Mundchen," (b) "Am leuchten den Sommermorgen," (c) Gewittemacht, was an enjoyable addition to the instrumental music. Mr. Josef Adamowski followed with two soli for 'cello; No. 1 a lengthy and somewhat monotonous andante by Molligne, and Davidoff's "Am Springbrunnen," the latter consisting principally of rapid spicato passages, varied by an occasional cantabile, was played with grace and ease, and served admirably to display the player's technique. The concert closed with Brahms' great A major piano quartet, Miss Mary E. Obrion being the pianist. The originality of the adagio, the contrasting qualities of the scherzo and the exuberant, though scholarly, finale, were made the utmost of by Mr. T. Adamowski and his able assistants. The remaining concerts are announced for Dec. 9 and Jan. 6.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

NOVEMBER 16, 18

New Lamps for Old!

By this time it may be fairly presumed that the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, has afforded as favorable an opportunity as we shall have for making a general estimate of his gifts and methods as a conductor. It is possible that he may have qualities that he has not as yet manifested here, and it is also likely that he may have some pleasurable surprises in store for us; but, on the whole, it is reasonable to believe that he has shown us all that he has to show of the artistic impulses that guide him when standing before his orchestra, baton in hand. That he has exhibited any very marked talent for carrying the good work of his immediate predecessor forward to still better achievements can scarcely be conceded. On the contrary, the orchestra is beginning to show the unfavorable results of a discipline that are not sufficiently exacting, and its performances are slowly but surely losing, not only the high, perhaps too high, finish that formerly characterized them, but are falling in their earlier precision, clearness and fine balance of tone color. It seems to be a principle with Mr. Nikisch to interpret in one invariable vein, and that a vein inspired by his own feeling of the moment. The result is a mannerism of style that must at last become oppressive by its monotony, and which must inevitably suggest too much of Mr. Nikisch and too little of Beethoven, of Mozart or of Mendelssohn, and so on through the long list of composers of the older school. The ritardandos, the ritenutos and the rubatos in which he indulges to excess are becoming wearisome, and a sugary Beethoven and a treacly Mendelssohn whom we do not know, must, in the end, disagree seriously with the musical stomach.

Already do we begin to yearn for the composers, pure and simple, unadorned of a pretty anachronistic tricking out of which they could have had no conception, and in which, therefore, they could not have desired to have their music decked. The style in which a sentimental, virtuoso soloist is likely to interpret sentimental Chopin is hardly the style suited to the reading of more vigorous composers who lived and wrote before Chopinism was impressed upon musical art and musical taste. Surely to interpolate into virile Beethoven the feeling that permeates effeminate Chopin is not only a mistake but a perversion of artistic propriety; and yet this is what Mr. Nikisch does constantly. With all of Mendelssohn's delicacy, tenderness and dilletantism he had a horror of the super-sentimental; but Mr. Nikisch feels Mendelssohn otherwise than Mendelssohn felt himself, and therefore subjects him to that sweetening process and that disjointed rubato treatment which, combined, reduce him to a species of musical broken candy. Where the composer seasons his own music, and no one was more careful and more rigid than was Beethoven in putting into his works just that quantity and quality of seasoning he desired, it is scarcely justifiable to change the flavor of his music for the mere sake of imparting a new taste to it. Beethoven was constantly quarrelling with his publishers for carelessness in omitting or misplacing the expression marks in his music, and he was so particular in placing a mark wherever it could in anywise indicate his intentions regarding any work as a whole, that he left but little room for misunderstanding, and as little necessity for reading between the lines. A composer who marked as f eely and as fluently as Beethoven did would never have omitted to indicate a slower tempo for the second theme in the "Coriolanus" overture, or a pesante on each of the first three notes of the C-minor symphony if he had desired them. Therefore would it be wiser in Mr. Nikisch to refrain from further enlightening us upon the way in which he feels Beethoven, upon the manner in which he thinks the composer ought to have marked his music, and to let us hear it as it was written and colored by Beethoven himself.

Some stress has been laid in certain quarters upon the license that Weber accorded to conductors in interpreting a work; but, though Weber was undoubtedly entitled to the right of giving such license to readers of his own music, he had no such right, nor did he exercise it, to give like license to readers of Beethoven. Moreover, Weber had no very great admiration for Beethoven, and his authority is the very last to bring to bear upon the interpretations of the greater master. In this connection we may make a passing reference to the impatience shown by young and inexperienced critics toward those older and wiser critics who insist upon hearing a composer in his integrity. These meet adverse criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's interpretations with allusions to "dryasdusts," meaning the conservative critics. But this is no argument, and there is nothing more convincing in stigmatizing a criticism that insists upon the older method of interpreting Beethoven, as the work of a "dryasdust," than there would be in emphasizing the criticism that favors the newer method as the work of a "moist-as-pap." In such things the truth is not to be reached by calling names, or by insisting that what is a matter of fact is merely a matter of opinion.

We object to have Beethoven modernized, just as we should object to have a modern mansarde roof placed upon a Greek temple. The thing is out of place, and is, moreover, ridiculous. A musical sentiment that did not exist in Beethoven's time should not be foisted on his music. We are not willing to have Beethoven translated for us as Pope translated the rugged Homer into the sugary poetical language and the literary style that prevailed in the time of good Queen Anne. Pope's "Iliad" is a very pretty poem, but it is not Homer; and Mr. Nikisch's C-minor symphony is very exciting, but it is not Beethoven. It is barely possible that Beethoven should have marked it as Mr. Nikisch reads it; but as he did not, we feel justified in declining to accept the innovation, especially as the change adds nothing of value to the work, and also especially as we believe that Beethoven knew what he wanted and was capable of indicating it. We have had many readings of Hamlet, but nobody has as yet attempted to enact the part in a purely modern spirit, or in any spirit which, while it preserves the customary suit of black, would connect the costume with the present taste in dress by adopting modern evening attire, including a crush hat and patent leather congress gaiters. Music should be interpreted in the spirit of the age in which it had birth;—at all events, it should not have fastened upon it a style that was not in existence when it was written.

Of this question of "feeling," and of what may be found in a composer that was never found before, there is much to be said. We are told that if Mr. Nikisch "feels" this or that work in such or such a way, he is entitled to give expression to his feeling. To this we make serious objection; for it lays the whole field of classical music open to the caprices of individual feeling, and relegating the feeling of the composer into the background. Every great composer has his own particular style and touch by which he is recognized, as is every great painter. There is nothing of Teniers in Rmbrandt, nothing of Franz Hals in Correggio. The expert knows and recognizes a great painter by his handwriting, so to speak, as it is exhibited in his work; and so with a great composer whose peculiar individualities cannot be mistaken. To inject into Beethoven something that is not characteristic of him is to do something that is detected at once. Then, too, if Mr. Nikisch feels that he has made a new find in Beethoven, why should not Mr. Lang, or Mr. Zerrahn, or Mr. Listeman also make their new finds, until at last the old Beethoven disappears, and a new one, with whom the past was wholly unacquainted stands in his place? We have only to change the marking of the fifth symphony throughout to make it tell quite another story from the one it tells at present. But when we probe seriously into the "feeling" that inspires Mr. Nikisch, we discover that it is very restricted; that he feels all composers very much in the same spirit, and that whether it be Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, or even Rossini, he puts the same mark on them all. And as for his "finds," he seems to find exactly the same thing in all composers; and at last, when we analyze the matter, we are confronted by the fact that, according to Mr. Nikisch, the great masters were nearly unanimous in their morbid propensity for highly sentimental rallentandos in connection with their second themes; that no heed how much they differed in point of style, they were wonderfully agreed in making their works all say the same thing with the same quality of expression. Now, we have a belief that what Mr. Nikisch finds in Beethoven and Mozart and the other great masters, is not Beethoven and Mozart, and so on, but is Mr. Nikisch.

It is not a question of adhering to old methods in obedience to conservative prejudices; of following tradition for tradition's sake, no heed how much may be gained by a change. It is a question of propriety, of musical truth, of artistic conscience. It has been claimed by a certain critic of "occult" proclivities that there are no traditions of music; but if Moscheles and others have made known to us the precise manner in which Beethoven's symphonies were played under his own direction, it is hard to see that they have not provided traditional readings for us; and if Mr. Nikisch ignores the information thus conveyed, he inferentially informs us that he has a clearer view of Beethoven's intentions that was possessed by the composer himself. New methods are not to be applied to Beethoven. Better playing, greater observance of the nuances, higher finish in technical style,—yes; but new readings, no. Mr. Nikisch may show us what fantastic things may be done with these great works; he may show us how, by a change of punctuation, an affirmative sentence may be made to become negative and still remain intelligible and intelligent; he may show us how they may be perverted and yet be interesting, even beautiful, but that is all. To turn them into musical anagrams by inverting their component parts and still retain sense may be ingenious; but although nothing is added or taken away, and all the original materials are used, the original meaning is gone, and it is that which is valuable and that which we want. It does not require any argument about new or old to prove this fact.

That many like Mr. Nikisch's innovations is indubitable; that many think that they have found and felt in Beethoven what Mr. Nikisch has found and felt may pass without question; but this proves nothing except that Mr. Nikisch has satisfied a certain taste to which is opposed another taste quite as worthy consideration. In conclusion, if it be claimed that the world is not yet exactly certain regarding what Beethoven is, it is decidedly enlightened regarding what he is not and cannot be; and so, if we are not sure of his precise meaning, we are more fortunate in respect to what must be, perforce, wholly foreign to any meaning he could possibly have intended. We are living in a sensational art era, in which the taste has become jaded and craves for pepper and spices to stimulate it into activity. Then, too, youth is iconoclastic and exuberant in enthusiasm. With maturity comes reflection, with reflection comes introspection, and with introspection comes diffidence, which in turn is succeeded by wisdom.

Musical Notes.

The first of the "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The attendance was very large despite the unpropitious state of the weather. The performances opened with Rossini's "Barber of Seville," overture, which, though only a French overture, that is, an overture without any "working out," and wholly primitive in form, is none the less sparkling and exhilirating in the hearing. It was well read and splendidly played, though Mr. Nikisch again indulged in his curious propensity to take the second theme at a much slower pace than it was ever taken before, just as he did in the Beethoven "Coriolanus" and "Egmont" overtures, in the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, and the Mendelssohn "Fingal" overture. This seems to be an invariable and an unvarying formula with Mr. Nikisch, whose admirers rush to his defence by urging that he "feels" the music is that way. Unfortunately, he "feels" every overture in the same manner, and this "piu lento" business to which his feeling runs so persistently is becoming a greater conventionality than are the other conventionalities against which he has set his face. We look now for this slacking of the time whenever there is a bit of melody, and are never disappointed. It is amusing at present. By and by it will prove exasperating. The long-spun-out "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner, which, in spite of its many beauties, we do not hesitate to find tiresome, was thoughtfully read and well played; but we have heard it at these concerts in interpretations that we have liked better. Berlioz's transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was spiritedly, if somewhat coarsely given, and the whole ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Mme. Carl Alves, who has a ripe, rich and well-trained contralto voice of much power and of excellent quality, sang the aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from Saint Saëns's "Samson and Delila," a beautiful work delightfully instrumented. Her singing was very expressive, was musicianly in taste and exceedingly pleasant to listen to. Hearty applause and a recall rewarded the effort. Later in the concert she sang a group of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger, sweetly and well, making a highly favorable impression by the frankness and simplicity of her style. Mr. Ch. Molé also appeared as a soloist in a well-made and effective concert fantasie for flute and orchestra by Demersseman, in themes from Weber's "Oberon." It is needless to say that Mr. Molé played the solo part with wonderful brilliancy and fluency, with an exceptionally large and pure tone, and overcoming the difficulties with which the work bristles, with the greatest ease. He was applauded vehemently, but with no greater fervor than his performances deserved.

[5]

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin. D. KUNTZ, Viola.

A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin. J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MISS MARY E. OBRION,

MR. W. J. WINCH,

MR. ELIOT HUBBARD,

AND MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

On MONDAY EVENINGS, November 18th, December 9th, 1889, and January 6th, 1890.

UNITED STATES

POSTAL CARD. ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager,

Care NEW HAVEN,

M. Steinert & Sons. CONN.

1889.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the Concerts at the Hyperion Theatre, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 16th, 1889, Jan'y 13th, Feb'y 10th, and March 17th, 1890.

Tickets, Five Dollars.

Name, ...

Address, ...

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERT.

The first concert of Mr. Timothee Adamowski's reorganized quartet drew an excellent audience. The following programme was presented:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1. Schumann
Songs with piano..... Franz
a. "Madchen mit dem Rothen Mundchen."
b. "Am Leuchten den Sommermorgen."
c. Gewittemacht.
Mr. Hubbard.
Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the concerto in D minor..... B. Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen..... C. Davidoff
Mr. Adamowski.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26..... Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

Without any disparagement to the former members of this quartet, it must be said that the change has been an advantage; the present artists seem to be more wholly in sympathy with one another, and, indeed, they played admirably. The last movement of the quartet was very finely conceived and executed. The balance of tone was excellent, and the shading and phrasing both careful and artistic. Mr. Hubbard has improved exceedingly since last year. His voice has gained at the same time both strength and delicacy, and his singing last night was very refined and delightful. Especially the first song was sung in a most charming and feeling manner, and with great artistic understanding, although the last phrase might have been taken a trifle slower. Boston has gained a most valuable addition to its musical circles by the advent of Mr. J. Adamowski. He is a delightful 'cellist in every sense of the word. His selections last night showed at the same time his full, refined and pure tone, his exquisite staccato and his very highly developed technique. He played with great feeling and in the true musical spirit. Both Messrs. Hubbard and Adamowski were accompanied by Mr. Clayton Johns in an artistic and discreet manner. The first movement of the piano quartet was indeed splendidly played. Miss Obrion has manifestly improved since last year, and her collaboration was highly satisfactory in all particulars. The audience was manifestly interested and applauded all the numbers enthusiastically. Mr. Adamowski is to be congratulated upon the results which his careful rehearsing have produced, and upon a thoroughly enjoyable contribution to the chamber music of the season.

Arthur Weld.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

NOVEMBER 16, 18

New Lamps for Old!

By this time it may be fairly presumed that the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, has afforded as favorable an opportunity as we shall have for making a general estimate of his gifts and methods as a conductor. It is possible that he may have qualities that he has not as yet manifested here, and it is also likely that he may have some pleasurable surprises in store for us; but, on the whole, it is reasonable to believe that he has shown us all that he has to show of the artistic impulses that guide him when standing before his orchestra, baton in hand. That he has exhibited any very marked talent for carrying the good work of his immediate predecessor forward to still better achievements can scarcely be conceded. On the contrary, the orchestra is beginning to show the unfavorable results of a discipline that are not sufficiently exacting, and its performances are slowly but surely losing, not only the high, perhaps too high, finish that formerly characterized them, but are falling in their earlier precision, clearness and fine balance of tone color. It seems to be a principle with Mr. Nikisch to interpret in one invariable vein, and that a vein inspired by his own feeling of the moment. The result is a mannerism of style that must at last become oppressive by its monotony, and which must inevitably suggest too much of Mr. Nikisch and too little of Beethoven, of Mozart or of Mendelssohn, and so on through the long list of composers of the older school. The ritardandos, the ritenutos and the rubatos in which he indulges to excess are becoming wearisome, and a sugary Beethoven and a treacly Mendelssohn whom we do not know, must, in the end, disagree seriously with the musical stomach.

Already do we begin to yearn for the composers, pure and simple, unadorned of a pretty anachronistic tricking out of which they could have had no conception, and in which, therefore, they could not have desired to have their music decked. The style in which a sentimental virtuoso colors is likely to interpret sentimental Chopin is hardly the style suited to the reading of more vigorous composers who lived and wrote before Chopinism was impressed upon musical art and musical taste. Surely to interpolate into virile Beethoven the feeling that permeates effeminate Chopin is not only a mistake but a perversion of artistic propriety; and yet this is what Mr. Nikisch does constantly. With all of Mendelssohn's delicacy, tenderness and dilletantism he had a horror of the super-sentimental; but Mr. Nikisch feels Mendelssohn otherwise than Mendelssohn felt himself, and therefore subjects him to that sweetening process and that disjointed rubato treatment which, combined, reduce him to a species of musical broken candy. Where the composer seasons his own music, and no one was more careful and more rigid than was Beethoven in putting into his works just that quantity and quality of seasoning he desired, it is scarcely justifiable to change the flavor of his music for the mere sake of imparting a new taste to it. Beethoven was constantly quarrelling with his publishers for carelessness in omitting or misplacing the expression marks in his music, and he was so particular in placing a mark wherever it could in anywise indicate his intentions regarding any work as a whole, that he left but little room for misunderstanding, and as little necessity for reading between the lines. A composer who marked as freely and as fluently as Beethoven did would never have omitted to indicate a slower tempo for the second theme in the "Coriolanus" overture, or a pesante on each of the first three notes of the C-minor symphony if he had desired them. Therefore would it be wiser in Mr. Nikisch to refrain from further enlightening us upon the way in which he feels Beethoven, upon the manner in which he thinks the composer ought to have marked his music, and to let us hear it as it was written and colored by Beethoven himself.

Some stress has been laid in certain quarters upon the license that Weber accorded to conductors in interpreting a work; but, though Weber was undoubtedly entitled to the right of giving such license to readers of his own music, he had no such right, nor did he exercise it, to give like license to readers of Beethoven. Moreover, Weber had no very great admiration for Beethoven, and his authority is the very last to bring to bear upon the interpretations of the greater master. In this connection we may make a passing reference to the impatience shown by young and inexperienced critics toward those older and wiser critics who insist upon hearing a composer in his integrity. These meet adverse criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's interpretations with allusions to "dryasdusts," meaning the conservative critics. But this is no argument, and there is nothing more convincing in stigmatizing a criticism that insists upon the older method of interpreting Beethoven, as the work of a "dryasdust," than there would be in emphasizing the criticism that favors the newer method as the work of a "moist-as-pap." In such things the truth is not to be reached by calling names, or by insisting that what is a matter of fact is merely a matter of opinion.

We object to have Beethoven modernized, just as we should object to have a modern mansarde roof placed upon a Greek temple. The thing is out of place, and is, moreover, ridiculous. A musical sentiment that did not exist in Beethoven's time should not be foisted on his music. We are not willing to have Beethoven translated for us as Pope translated the rugged Homer into the sugary poetical language and the literary style that prevailed in the time of good Queen Anne. Pope's "Iliad" is a very pretty poem, but it is not Homer; and Mr. Nikisch's C-minor symphony is very exciting, but it is not Beethoven. It is barely possible that Beethoven should have marked it as Mr. Nikisch reads it; but as he did not, we feel justified in declining to accept the innovation, especially as the change adds nothing of value to the work, and also especially as we believe that Beethoven knew what he wanted and was capable of indicating it. We have had many readings of Hamlet, but nobody has as yet attempted to enact the part in a purely modern spirit, or in any spirit which, while it preserves the customary suit of black, would connect the costume with the present taste in dress by adopting modern evening attire, including a crush hat and patent leather congress gaiters. Music should be interpreted in the spirit of the age in which it had birth;—at all events, it should not have fastened upon it a style that was not in existence when it was written.

Of this question of "feeling," and of what may be found in a composer that was never found before, there is much to be said. We are told that if Mr. Nikisch "feels" this or that work in such or such a way, he is entitled to give expression to his feeling. To this we make serious objection; for it lays the whole field of classical music open to the caprices of individual feeling, and relegating the feeling of the composer into the background. Every great composer has his own particular style and touch by which he is recognized, as is every great painter. There is nothing of Teniers in Rmbrandt, nothing of Franz Hals in Correggio. The expert knows and recognizes a great painter by his handwriting, so to speak, as it is exhibited in his work; and so with a great composer whose peculiar individualities cannot be mistaken. To inject into Beethoven something that is not characteristic of him is to do something that is detected at once. Then, too, if Mr. Nikisch feels that he has made a new find in Beethoven, why should not Mr. Lang, or Mr. Zerrahn, or Mr. Listeman also make their new finds, until at last the old Beethoven disappears, and a new one, with whom the past was wholly unacquainted stands in his place? We have only to change the marking of the fifth symphony throughout to make it tell quite another story from the one it tells at present. But when we probe seriously into the "feeling" that inspires Mr. Nikisch, we discover that it is very restricted; that he feels all composers very much in the same spirit, and that whether it be Beethoven, Mendelsson, Mozart, or even Rossini, he puts the same mark on them all. And as for his "finds," he seems to find exactly the same thing in all composers; and at last, when we analyze the matter, we are confronted by the fact that, according to Mr. Nikisch, the great masters were nearly unanimous in their morbid propensity for highly sentimental rallentandos in connection with their second themes; that no heed how much they differed in point of style, they were wonderfully agreed in making their works all say the same thing with the same quality of expression. Now, we have a belief that what Mr. Nikisch finds in Beethoven and Mozart and the other great masters, is not Beethoven and Mozart, and so on, but is Mr. Nikisch.

It is not a question of adhering to old methods in obedience to conservative prejudices; of following tradition for tradition's sake, no heed how much may be gained by a change. It is a question of propriety, of musical truth, of artistic conscience. It has been claimed by a certain critic of "occult" proclivities that there are no traditions of music; but if Moschelles and others have made known to us the precise manner in which Beethoven's symphonies were played under his own direction, it is hard to see that they have not provided traditional readings for us; and if Mr. Nikisch ignores the information thus conveyed, he inferentially informs us that he has a clearer view of Beethoven's intentions that was possessed by the composer himself. New methods are not to be applied to Beethoven. Better playing, greater observance of the nuances, higher finish in technical style,—yes; but new readings, no. Mr. Nikisch may show us what fantastic things may be done with these great works; he may show us how, by a change of punctuation, an affirmative sentence may be made to become negative and still remain intelligible and intelligent; he may show us how they may be perverted and yet be interesting, even beautiful, but that is all. To turn them into musical anagrams by inverting their component parts and still retain sense may be ingenious; but although nothing is added or taken away, and all the original materials are used, the original meaning is gone, and it is that which is valuable and that which we want. It does not require any argument about new or old to prove this fact.

That many like Mr. Nikisch's innovations is indubitable; that many think that they have found and felt in Beethoven what Mr. Nikisch has found and felt may pass without question; but this proves nothing except that Mr. Nikisch has satisfied a certain taste to which is opposed another taste quite as worthy consideration. In conclusion, if it be claimed that the world is not yet exactly certain regarding what Beethoven is, it is decidedly enlightened regarding what he is not and cannot be; and so, if we are not sure of his precise meaning, we are more fortunate in respect to what must be, perforce, wholly foreign to any meaning he could possibly have intended. We are living in a sensational art era, in which the taste has become jaded and craves for pepper and spices to stimulate it into activity. Then, too, youth is iconoclastic and exuberant in enthusiasm. With maturity comes reflection, with reflection comes introspection, and with introspection comes diffidence, which in turn is succeeded by wisdom.

Musical Notes.

The first of the "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The attendance was very large despite the unpropitious state of the weather. The performances opened with Rossini's "Barber of Seville," overture, which, though only a French overture, that is, an overture without any "working out," and wholly primitive in form, is none the less sparkling and exhilirating in the hearing. It was well read and splendidly played, though Mr. Nikisch again indulged in his curious propensity to take the second theme at a much slower pace than it was ever taken before, just as he did in the Beethoven "Coriolanus" and "Egmont" overtures, in the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, and the Mendelssohn "Fingal" overture. This seems to be an invariable and an unvarying formula with Mr. Nikisch, whose admirers rush to his defence by urging that he "feels" the music in that way. Unfortunately, he "feels" every overture in the same manner, and this "piu lento" business to which his feeling runs so persistently is becoming a greater conventionality than are the other conventionalities against which he has set his face. We look now for this slacking of the time whenever there is a bit of melody, and are never disappointed. It is amusing at present. By and by it will prove exasperating. The long-spun-out "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner, which, in spite of its many beauties, we do not hesitate to find tiresome, was thoughtfully read and well played; but we have heard it at these concerts in interpretations that we have liked better. Berlioz's transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was spiritedly, if somewhat coarsely given, and the whole ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Mme. Carl Alves, who has a ripe, rich and well trained contralto voice of much power and of excellent quality, sang the aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delila," a beautiful work, delightfully instrumented. Her singing was very expressive, was musicianly in taste and exceedingly pleasant to listen to. Hearty applause and a recall rewarded the effort. Later in the concert she sang a group of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger, sweetly and well, making a highly favorable impression by the frankness and simplicity of her style. Mr Ch. Molé also appeared as a soloist in a well-made and effective concert fantasie for flute and orchestra by Demersseman, in themes from Weber's "Oberon." It is needless to say that Mr. Molé played the solo part with wonderful brilliancy and fluency, with an exceptionally large and pure tone, and overcoming the difficulties with which the work bristles, with the greatest ease. He was applauded vehemently, but with no greater fevor than his performances deserved.

UNITED STATES

POSTAL CARD.

ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

CARE NEW HAVEN,

M. STEINERT & SONS. CONN.

1889.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the Concerts at the Hyperion Theatre, by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dec. 16th, 1889, Jan'y 13th, Feb'y 10th, and March 17th, 1890.

Tickets, Five Dollars.

Name, ...

Address, ...

[25]

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1ST VIOLIN. D. KUNTZ, VIOLA.

A. MOLDAUER, 2D VIOLIN. J. ADAMOWSKI, VIOLONCELLO.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MISS MARY E. OBRION,

MR. W. J. WINCH,

MR. ELIOT HUBBARD,

AND MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, NOVEMBER 18TH, DECEMBER 9TH, 1889, AND JANUARY 6TH, 1890.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERT.

The first concert of Mr. Timothee Adamowski's reorganized quartet drew an excellent audience. The following programme was presented:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1..Schumann
Songs with piano.....Franz
a. "Madchen mit dem Rothen Mundchen."
b. "Am Leuchten den Sommermorgen."
c. Gewittemacht.
Mr. Hubbard.
Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the concerto in D minor.....B. Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen.....C. Davidoff
Mr. Adamowski.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26.....Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

Without any disparagement to the former members of this quartet, it must be said that the change has been an advantage; the present artists seem to be more wholly in sympathy with one another, and, indeed, they played admirably. The last movement of the quartet was very finely conceived and executed. The balance of tone was excellent, and the shading and phrasing both careful and artistic. Mr. Hubbard has improved exceedingly since last year. His voice has gained at the same time both strength and delicacy, and his singing last night was very refined and delightful. Especially the first song was sung in a most charming and feeling manner, and with great artistic understanding, although the last phrase might have been taken a trifle slower. Boston has gained a most valuable addition to its musical circles by the advent of Mr. J. Adamowski. He is a delightful 'cellist in every sense of the word. His selections last night showed at the same time his full, refined and pure tone, his exquisite staccato and his very highly developed technique. He played with great feeling and in the true musical spirit. Both Messrs. Hubbard and Adamowski were accompanied by Mr. Clayton Johns in an artistic and discreet manner. The first movement of the piano quartet was indeed splendidly played. Miss Obrion has manifestly improved since last year, and her collaboration was highly satisfactory in all particulars. The audience was manifestly interested and applauded all the numbers enthusiastically. Mr. Adamowski is to be congratulated upon the results which his careful rehearsing have produced, and upon a thoroughly enjoyable contribution to the chamber music of the season.

ARTHUR WELD.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

NOVEMBER 16, 18

New Lamps for Old!

By this time it may be fairly presumed that the new director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, has afforded as favorable an opportunity as we shall have for making a general estimate of his gifts and methods as a conductor. It is possible that he may have qualities that he has not as yet manifested here, and it is also likely that he may have some pleasurable surprises in store for us; but, on the whole, it is reasonable to believe that he has shown us all that he has to show of the artistic impulses that guide him when standing before his orchestra, baton in hand. That he has exhibited any very marked talent for carrying the good work of his immediate predecessor forward to still better achievements can scarcely be conceded. On the contrary, the orchestra is beginning to show the unfavorable results of a discipline that are not sufficiently exacting, and its performances are slowly but surely losing, not only the high, perhaps too high, finish that formerly characterized them, but are falling in their earlier precision, clearness and fine balance of tone color. It seems to be a principle with Mr. Nikisch to interpret in one invariable vein, and that a vein inspired by his own feeling of the moment. The result is a mannerism of style that must at last become oppressive by its monotony, and which must inevitably suggest too much of Mr. Nikisch and too little of Beethoven, of Mozart or of Mendelssohn, and so on through the long list of composers of the older school. The ritardandos, the ritenutos and the rubatos in which he indulges to excess are becoming wearisome, and a sugary Beethoven and a treacly Mendelssohn whom we do not know, must, in the end, disagree seriously with the musical stomach.

Already do we begin to yearn for the composers, pure and simple, unadorned of a pretty anachronistic tricking out of which they could have had no conception, and in which, therefore, they could not have desired to have their music decked. The style in which a sentimental virtuoso seems to likely to interpret sentimental Chopin is hardly the style suited to the reading of more vigorous composers who lived and wrote before Chopinism was impressed upon musical art and musical taste. Surely to interpolate into virile Beethoven the feeling that permeates effeminate Chopin is not only a mistake but a perversion of artistic propriety; and yet this is what Mr. Nikisch does constantly. With all of Mendelsson's delicacy, tenderness and dilletantism he had a horror of the super-sentimental; but Mr. Nikisch feels Mendelssohn otherwise than Mendelssohn felt himself, and therefore subjects him to that sweetening process and that disjointed rubato treatment which, combined, reduce him to a species of musical broken candy. Where the composer seasons his own music, and no one was more careful and more rigid than was Beethoven in putting into his works just that quantity and quality of seasoning he desired, it is scarcely justifiable to change the flavor of his music for the mere sake of imparting a new taste to it. Beethoven was constantly quarrelling with his publishers for carelessness in omitting or misplacing the expression marks in his music, and he was so particular in placing a mark wherever it could in anywise indicate his intentions regarding any work as a whole, that he left but little room for misunderstanding, and as little necessity for reading between the lines. A composer who marked as freely and as fluently as Beethoven did would never have omitted to indicate a slower tempo for the second theme in the "Coriolanus" overture, or a pesante on each of the first three notes of the C-minor symphony if he had desired them. Therefore would it be wiser in Mr. Nikisch to refrain from further enlightening us upon the way in which he feels Beethoven, upon the manner in which he thinks the composer ought to have marked his music, and to let us hear it as it was written and colored by Beethoven himself.

Some stress has been laid in certain quarters upon the license that Weber accorded to conductors in interpreting a work; but, though Weber was undoubtedly entitled to the right of giving such license to readers of his own music, he had no such right, nor did he exercise it, to give like license to readers of Beethoven. Moreover, Weber had no very great admiration for Beethoven, and his authority is the very last to bring to bear upon the interpretations of the greater master. In this connection we may make a passing reference to the impatience shown by young and inexperienced critics toward those older and wiser critics who insist upon hearing a composer in his integrity. These meet adverse criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's interpretations with allusions to "dryasdusts," meaning the conservative critics. But this is no argument, and there is nothing more convincing in stigmatizing a criticism that insists upon the older method of interpreting Beethoven, as the work of a "dryasdust," than there would be in emphasizing the criticism that favors the newer method as the work of a "moist-as-pap." In such things the truth is not to be reached by calling names, or by insisting that what is a matter of fact is merely a matter of opinion.

We object to have Beethoven modernized, just as we should object to have a modern mansarde roof placed upon a Greek temple. The thing is out of place, and is, moreover, ridiculous. A musical sentiment that did not exist in Beethoven's time should not be foisted on his music. We are not willing to have Beethoven translated for us as Pope translated the rugged Homer into the sugary poetical language and the literary style that prevailed in the time of good Queen Anne. Pope's "Iliad" is a very pretty poem, but it is not Homer; and Mr. Nikisch's C-minor symphony is very exciting, but it is not Beethoven. It is barely possible that Beethoven should have marked it as Mr. Nikisch reads it; but as he did not, we feel justified in declining to accept the innovation, especially as the change adds nothing of value to the work, and also especially as we believe that Beethoven knew what he wanted and was capable of indicating it. We have had many readings of Hamlet, but nobody has as yet attempted to enact the part in a purely modern spirit, or in any spirit which, while it preserves the customary suit of black, would connect the costume with the present taste in dress by adopting modern evening attire, including a crush hat and patent leather congress gaiters. Music should be interpreted in the spirit of the age in which it had birth;—at all events, it should not have fastened upon it a style that was not in existence when it was written.

Of this question of "feeling," and of what may be found in a composer that was never found before, there is much to be said. We are told that if Mr. Nikisch "feels" this or that work in such or such a way, he is entitled to give expression to his feeling. To this we make serious objection; for it lays the whole field of classical music open to the caprices of individual feeling, and relegating the feeling of the composer into the background. Every great composer has his own particular style and touch by which he is recognized, as is every great painter. There is nothing of Teniers in Rmbrandt, nothing of Franz Hals in Correggio. The expert knows and recognizes a great painter by his handwriting, so to speak, as it is exhibited in his work; and so with a great composer whose peculiar individualities cannot be mistaken. To inject into Beethoven something that is not characteristic of him is to do something that is detected at once. Then, too, if Mr. Nikisch feels that he has made a new find in Beethoven, why should not Mr. Lang, or Mr. Zerrahn, or Mr. Listeman also make their new finds, until at last the old Beethoven disappears, and a new one, with whom the past was wholly unacquainted stands in his place? We have only to change the marking of the fifth symphony throughout to make it tell quite another story from the one it tells at present. But when we probe seriously into the "feeling" that inspires Mr. Nikisch, we discover that it is very restricted; that he feels all composers very much in the same spirit, and that whether it be Beethoven, Mendelsson, Mozart, or even Rossini, he puts the same mark on them all. And as for his "finds," he seems to find exactly the same thing in all composers; and at last, when we analyze the matter, we are confronted by the fact that, according to Mr. Nikisch, the great masters were nearly unanimous in their morbid propensity for highly sentimental rallentandos in connection with their second themes; that no heed how much they differed in point of style, they were wonderfully agreed in making their works all say the same thing with the same quality of expression. Now, we have a belief that what Mr. Nikisch finds in Beethoven and Mozart and the other great masters, is not Beethoven and Mozart, and so on, but is Mr. Nikisch.

It is not a question of adhering to old methods in obedience to conservative prejudices; of following tradition for tradition's sake, no heed how much may be gained by a change. It is a question of propriety, of musical truth, of artistic conscience. It has been claimed by a certain critic of "occult" proclivities that there are no traditions of music; but if Moscheles and others have made known to us the precise manner in which Beethoven's symphonies were played under his own direction, it is hard to see that they have not provided traditional readings for us; and if Mr. Nikisch ignores the information thus conveyed, he inferentially informs us that he has a clearer view of Beethoven's intentions that was possessed by the composer himself. New methods are not to be applied to Beethoven. Better playing, greater observance of the nuances, higher finish in technical style,—yes; but new readings, no. Mr. Nikisch may show us what fantastic things may be done with these great works; he may show us how, by a change of punctuation, an affirmative sentence may be made to become negative and still retain intelligible and intelligent; he may show us how they may be perverted and yet be interesting, even beautiful, but that is all. To turn them into musical anagrams by inverting their component parts and still is added or taken away, and all the original materials are used, the original meaning is gone, and it is that which is valuable and that which we want. It does not require any argument about new or old to prove this fact.

That many like Mr. Nikisch's innovations is indubitable; that many think that they have found and felt in Beethoven what Mr. Nikisch has found and felt may pass without question; but this proves nothing except that Mr. Nikisch has satisfied a certain taste to which is opposed another taste quite as worthy consideration. In conclusion, if it be claimed that the world is not yet exactly certain regarding what Beethoven is, it is decidedly enlightened regarding what he is not and cannot be; and so, if we are not sure of his precise meaning, we are more fortunate in respect to what must be, perforce, wholly foreign to any meaning he could possibly have intended. We are living in a sensational art era, in which the taste has become jaded and craves for pepper and spices to stimulate it into activity. Then, too, youth is iconoclastic and exuberant in enthusiasm. With maturity comes reflection, with reflection comes introspection, and with introspection comes diffidence, which in turn is succeeded by wisdom.

Musical Notes.

The first of the "Young People's Popular" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The attendance was very large despite the unpropitious state of the weather. The performances opened with Rossini's "Barber of Seville," overture, which, though only a French overture, that is, an overture without any "working out," and wholly primitive in form, is none the less sparkling and exhilirating in the hearing. It was well read and splendidly played, though Mr. Nikisch again indulged in his curious propensity to take the second theme at a much slower pace than it was ever taken before, just as he did in the Beethoven "Coriolanus" and "Egmont" overtures, in the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, and the Mendelssohn "Fingal" overture. This seems to be an invariable and unvarying formula with Mr. Nikisch, whose admirers rush to his defence by urging that he "feels" the music in that way. Unfortunately, he "feels" every overture in the same manner, and this "piu lento" business to which his feeling runs so persistently is becoming a greater conventionality than are the other conventionalities against which he has set his face. We look now for this slacking of the time whenever there is a bit of melody, and are never disappointed. It is amusing at present. By and by it will prove exasperating. The long-spun-out "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner, which, in spite of its many beauties, we do not hesitate to find tiresome, was thoughtfully read and well played; but we have heard it at these concerts in interpretations that we have liked better. Berlioz's transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was spiritedly, if somewhat coarsely given, and the whole ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Mme. Carl Alves, who has a ripe, rich and well trained contralto voice of much power and of excellent quality, sang the aria, "My heart opens to thy voice," from Saint Saëns's "Samson and Delila," a beautiful work, delightfully instrumented. Her singing was very expressive, was musicianly in taste and exceedingly pleasant to listen to. Hearty applause and a recall rewarded the effort. Later in the concert she sang a group of songs by Grieg, Schumann and Rheinberger, sweetly and well, making a highly favorable impression by the frankness and simplicity of her style. Mr. Ch. Molé also appeared as a soloist in a well-made and effective concert fantasie for flute and orchestra by Demersseman, in themes from Weber's "Oberon." It is needless to say that Mr. Molé played the solo part with wonderful brilliancy and fluency, with an exceptionally large and pure tone, and overcoming the difficulties with which the work bristles, with the greatest ease. He was applauded vehemently, but with no greater fervor than his performances deserved.

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

CARE

M. STEINERT & SONS.

NEW HAVEN,

CONN.

1889.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the Concerts at the Hyperion Theatre, by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dec. 16th, 1889, Jan'y 13th, Feb'y 10th, and March 17th, 1890.

Tickets, Five Dollars.

Name, ...

Address, ...

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1ST VIOLIN. D. KUNTZ, VIOLA.

A. MOLDAUER, 2D VIOLIN. J. ADAMOWSKI, VIOLONCELLO.

WITH ASSISTANCE OF

MISS MARY E. OBRION,

MR. W. J. WINCH,

MR ELIOT HUBBARD

AND MR. CLAYTON JOHNS.

WILL GIVE

THREE SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS

IN

STEINERT HALL,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, NOVEMBER 18TH, DECEMBER 9TH, 1889, AND JANUARY 6TH, 1890.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERT.

The first concert of Mr. Timothee Adamowski's reorganized quartet drew an excellent audience. The following programme was presented:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1 . . Schumann
Songs with piano . . . . . Franz
a. "Madchen mit dem Rothen Mundchen."
b. "Am Leuchten den Sommermorgen."
c. Gewittemacht.
Mr. Hubbard.
Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the concerto in D minor . . . . . B. Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen . . . . . C. Davidoff
Mr. Adamowski.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26 . . . . . Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

Without any disparagement to the former members of this quartet, it must be said that the change has been an advantage; the present artists seem to be more wholly in sympathy with one another, and, indeed, they played admirably. The last movement of the quartet was very finely conceived and executed. The balance of tone was excellent, and the shading and phrasing both careful and artistic. Mr. Hubbard has improved exceedingly since last year. His voice has gained at the same time both strength and delicacy, and his singing last night was very refined and delightful. Especially the first song was sung in a most charming and feeling manner, and with great artistic understanding, although the last phrase might have been taken a trifle slower. Boston has gained a most valuable addition to its musical circles by the advent of Mr. J. Adamowski. He is a delightful 'cellist in every sense of the word. His selections last night showed at the same time his full, refined and pure tone, his exquisite staccato and his very highly developed technique. He played with great feeling and in the true musical spirit. Both Messrs. Hubbard and Adamowski were accompanied by Mr. Clayton Johns in an artistic and discreet manner. The first movement of the piano quartet was indeed splendidly played. Miss Obrion has manifestly improved since last year, and her collaboration was highly satisfactory in all particulars. The audience was manifestly interested and applauded all the numbers enthusiastically. Mr. Adamowski is to be congratulated upon the results which his careful rehearsing have produced, and upon a thoroughly enjoyable contribution to the chamber music of the season.

ARTHUR WELD.

STEINERT HALL.

FIRST CONCERT.

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN A MINOR, OP. 41, No. 1. — SCHUMANN

INTRODUZIONE, ANDANTE ESPRESSIVO.—A MINOR; LEADING TO ALLEGRO.—F MAJOR.
SCHERZO, PRESTO.—A MINOR: WITH INTERMEZZO.—C MAJOR.
ADAGIO—F MAJOR. PRESTO—A MINOR AND MAJOR.

ADAMOWSKI QUARTET.

SONGS WITH PIANO. — FRANZ

a) "MADCHEN MIT DEM ROTHEN MUNDCHEN."
b) "AM LEUCHTEN DEN SOMMERMORGEN."
c) GEWITTEMACHT.

MR. HUBBARD.

SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.

a) ANDANTE FROM THE CONCERTO IN D MINOR. — B. MOLIQUE
b) AM SPRINGBRUNNEN. — C. DAVIDOFF

MR. ADAMOWSKI.

PIANO QUARTET IN A MAJOR. OP. 26. — BRAHMS

ALLEGRO NON TROPPO.—A MAJOR.
POCO ADAGIO—E MAJOR.
SCHERZO—A MAJOR; WITH TRIO—D MINOR AND MAJOR.
ALLEGRO (FINALE), WITH CODA (ANIMATO)—A MAJOR.

MISS OBRION, MESS. ADAMOWSKI AND MR. KUNTZ.

Mendelssohn's influence led Schumann to a deeper study of musical form. is first symphony, the overture, scherzo, and finale, and the three string quarts (1842), were the immediate examples of his industry and application. The ree quartets "in inniger Verehrung seinem Freunde, Felix Mendelssohn Bartldy zugeeignet"—are highly esteemed by Schuman's admirers. The first of e group (the one played today) has this peculiarity: that though put forth as Quartet in A minor." the first allegro (as well as the slow movement) is in F ajor. No precedent for such independence of form exists in the works of any eat master; but Schumann spoke a musical language peculiar to himself, and holy independent of previous or contemporary models. "The first allegro is efaced by an introductory andante in A minor. The leading theme of the legro is in F major. A second melody announced by the viola leads directly om it. When this breaks off with a half close on the dominant of C, the cond subject proper appears in that key, and soon modulates into others. he second part, or "free fantasia," of the allegro, is constructed upon the efore mentioned materials. The scherzo, in A minor, opens with a brisk subject, (presto,) in harmony. The second part is more simply melodic. In place of the trio there is a short intermezzo. The scherzo in A minor is then repeated. The adagio, ushered in by a brief prelude, is constructed upon a melody out of which the entire movement may be said to grow, even the very original episode that separates the first and second statements of the theme, and is developed further on. The movement does not come to a full close. but towards the end glides almost imperceptibly back again into the brief introductory prelude, which now in turn becomes its peroration. The finale, in A minor, sets out energetically after three full chords. The first theme leads directly into the second subject in the relative major. Upon these materials, allowing for an episode, in A major, which temporarily supercedes the progress of their developement, the finale is exclusively built." (First performance at Adamowski Concerts.)

"WITH THY ROSY LIPS, MY MAIDEN."

("Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen.")

With thy rosy lips, my maiden,
With thine eyes so dear and kind;
Thou mine own, my sweetest maiden
Dwell forever in my mind.

Long is now the winter ev'ning
Only thou canst cheer the gloom;
Oh! that we could talk together
In the cosy, little room.

In thy dear eyes peeping
I would kiss thy lily hand;
And bedew with happy weeping
Thy dear little lily hand.

"I WANDER THIS SUMMER MORNING."

("Am leuchten den Sommermorgen.")

I wander this summer morning,
Birds in my garden rejoice.
The flowers are nodding and whispering,
I only, I lift no voice.

The flow'rets are nodding and whisp'ring
And looking with pity on me;
It is my sister, forgive her,
Though deeply she's wounded thee.

toward those older and wiser critics who insist upon hearing a composer in his integrity. These meet adverse criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's interpretations with allusions to "dryasdusts," meaning the conservative critics. But this is no argument, and there is nothing more convincing in stigmatizing a criticism that insists upon the older method of interpreting Beethoven, as the work of a "dryasdust," than there would be in emphasizing the criticism that favors the newer method as the work of a "moist-as-pap." In such things the truth is not to be reached by calling names, or by insisting that what is a matter of fact is merely a matter of opinion.

We object to have Beethoven modernized, just as we should object to have a modern mansarde roof placed upon a Greek temple. The thing is out of place, and is, moreover, ridiculous. A musical sentiment that did not exist in Beethoven's time should not be foisted on his music. We are not willing to have Beethoven translated for us as Pope translated the rugged Homer into the sugary poetical language and the literary style that prevailed in the time of good Queen Anne. Pope's "Iliad" is a very pretty poem, but it is not Homer; and Mr. Nikisch's C-minor symphony is very exciting, but it is not Beethoven. It is barely possible that Beethoven should have marked it as Mr. Nikisch reads it; but as he did not, we feel justified in declining to accept the innovation, especially as the change adds nothing of value to the work, and also especially as we believe that Beethoven knew what he wanted and was capable of indicating it. We have had many readings of Hamlet, but nobody has as yet attempted to enact the part in a purely modern spirit, or in any spirit which, while it preserves the customary suit of black, would connect the costume with the present taste in dress by adopting modern evening attire, including a crush hat and patent leather congress gaiters. Music should be interpreted in the spirit of the age in which it had birth;—at all events, it should not have fastened upon it a style that was not in existence when it was written.

Of this question of "feeling," and of what may be found in a composer that was never found before, there is much to be said. We are told that if Mr. Nikisch "feels" this or that work in such or such a way, he is entitled to give expression to his feeling. To this we make serious objection; for it lays the whole field of classical music open to the caprices of individual feeling, and relegating the feeling of the composer into the background. Every great composer has his own particular style and touch by which he is recognized, as is every great painter. There is nothing of Teniers in Rmbrandt, nothing of Franz Hals in Correggio. The expert knows and recognizes a great painter by his handwriting, so to speak, as it is exhibited in his work; and so with a great composer whose peculiar individualities cannot be mistaken. To inject into Beethoven something that is not characteristic of him is to do something that is detected at once. Then, too, if r. Nikisch feels that he has made a new find in Beethoven, why should not r. Lang, or Mr. Zerrahn, or r. Listeman also make their new finds, until at last the old Beethoven disappears, and a new one, with whom the past was wholly unacquainted stands in his place? We have only to change the marking of the fifth symphony throughout to make it tell quite another story from the one it tells at present. But when we probe seriously into the "feeling" that inspires r. Nikisch, we discover that it is very restricted; that he feels all composers very much in the same spirit, and that whether it be Beethoven, Mendelssohn, ozart, or even Rossini, he puts the same mark on them all. And as for his "finds," he seems to find exactly the same thing in all composers; and at last, when we analyze the matter, we are confronted by the fact that, according to r. Nikisch, the great masters were nearly unanimous in their morbid propensity for highly sentimental rallentandos in connection with their second themes; that no heed how much they differed in point of style, they were wonderfully agreed in making their works all say the same thing with the same quality of expression. Now, we have a belief that what r. Nikisch finds in Beethoven and ozart and the other great masters, is not Beethoven and ozart, and so on, but is Mr. Nikisch.

and pure tone, and overcoming the difficulties with which the work bristles, with the greatest ease. He was applauded vehemently, but with no greater fevor than his performances deserved.

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

CARE NEW HAVEN,

M. STEINERT & SONS. CONN.

..... 1889.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the Concerts at the Hyperion Theatre, by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dec. 16th, 1889, Jan'y 13th, Feb'y 10th, and March 17th, 1890.

Tickets, Five Dollars.

Name, ...

Address, ...

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERT.

The first concert of Mr. Timothee Adamowski's reorganized quartet drew an excellent audience. The following programme was presented:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1. . Schumann
Songs with piano.....Franz
a. "Madchen mit dem Rothen Mundchen."
b. "Am Leuchten den Sommermorgen."
c. Gewittemacht.
Mr. Hubbard.
Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the concerto in D minor.....B. Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen.....C. Davidoff
Mr. Adamowski.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26.....Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

Without any disparagement to the former members of this quartet, it must be said that the change has been an advantage; the present artists seem to be more wholly in sympathy with one another, and, indeed, they played admirably. The last movement of the quartet was very finely conceived and executed. The balance of tone was excellent, and the shading and phrasing both careful and artistic. Mr. Hubbard has improved exceedingly since last year. His voice has gained at the same time both strength and delicacy, and his singing last night was very refined and delightful. Especially the first song was sung in a most charming and feeling manner, and with great artistic understanding, although the last phrase might have been taken a trifle slower. Boston has gained a most valuable addition to its musical circles by the advent of Mr. J. Adamowski. He is a delightful 'cellist in every sense of the word. His selections last night showed at the same time his full, refined and pure tone, his exquisite staccato and his very highly developed technique. He played with great feeling and in the true musical spirit. Both Messrs. Hubbard and Adamowski were accompanied by Mr. Clayton Johns in an artistic and discreet manner. The first movement of the piano quartet was indeed splendidly played. Miss Obrion has manifestly improved since last year, and her collaboration was highly satisfactory in all particulars. The audience was manifestly interested and applauded all the numbers enthusiastically. Mr. Adamowski is to be congratulated upon the results which his careful rehearsing have produced, and upon a thoroughly enjoyable contribution to the chamber music of the season.

ARTHUR WELD.

MOI

QUARTET IN INTRODU
ALLE SCHERZ
ADAGIO-

SONGS WITH a) "
b) '
c) G

SOLI FOR VIC
a) A
b) A

PIANO QUAR
ALLEGR
POCO A SCHERZ
ALLEGRO

I

GEWITTEMACHT.

Rage thou tempest fiercer and fiercer,
Chide still louder, thou deep rolling thunder,
Ope to the lightning the cloudy portal,
That it may rend the darkness asunder.

Heaven, thy murmurs to me are consoling,
Doubt in my bosom my blood wildly rolling;
Thus from my loved one I now did sever;
No kiss I took, no word I spoke,
But went out in the night, peace gone forever.

Woe! no more my bosom may cherish
Yon sweet hope of a blissful union
That with the eye and lip she has promised,
Oft in the hours of our hearts' communion.

Dreams of my youth, how soon have ye vanished,
False, like her fond vows, truth ye have banished.
Sharply goes through my heart an anguish
Like lightning's glare, she loves me ne'er,
My heart is broken, why longer languish.

Chide, thou louder voice of the tempest,
Flaming heaven, wild and audacious,
Let in my heart thy wrath be re-echoed;
Let me forget her, so cold and ungracious.

But thou art mute, in rain gently flowing,
Blessings for anger, Heav'n thou'rt bestowing;
Tears of affection, my full heart relieve ye;
Oh reft of thee, what's life to me.
Maiden, thou dearest, ne'er can I leave thee.

In connection with Brahms' A major pianoforte quartet, it may be of use to cite from Mr. Maczewski's notice of the composer in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, some very acute remarks. After pointing out that Brahms "defends his art principles on the ground of absolute music," the writer goes on: "Brahms takes his stand upon systematic principles of musical form, upon which indeed, his individual characteristics a good deal depend, In point of style and construction his music displays a power which is now quite unique. In all his works, from the greatest to the smallest, the hand of a master is manifest, and, if we analyse them, we shall find the same unwearied energy and consistency throughout the movement as is used at the outset to express the leading idea. He never allows himself to be drawn aside from his main idea, in spite of the wealth of episodes and secondary thoughts he has always at command. To this we may refer many of the prominent peculiarities of his style, such as its formal intensity, and certain original terms of harmony and modulation. This side of Brahms' genius is now undisputed, but the individual character of his ideas, and the intellectual qualities of his nature, certainly stand in the way of his overcoming opposition, and gaining the sympathies of the large mass of the musical public." The quartet in A is in some ways an exception to the above, being less erudite and more genial than certain of Brahms' chamber music. Connoisseurs will notice the abundance of subjects in the first movement, and the clearness and brevity of the "fantasia" portion of the same; the originality of the adagio; the contrasting qualities of the scherzo, and the exuberance that lies beneath the scholarly exterior of the finale. (First performance at Adamowski Concerts.) toward those older and wiser critics who insist upon hearing a composer in his integrity. These meet adverse criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's interpretations with allusions to "dryasdusts," meaning the conservative critics. But this is no argument, and there is nothing more convincing in stigmatizing a criticism that insists upon the older method of interpreting Beethoven, as the work of a "dryasdust," than there would be in emphasizing the criticism that favors the newer method as the work of a "moist-as-pap." In such things the truth is not to be reached by calling names, or by insisting that what is a matter of fact is merely a matter of opinion.

We object to have Beethoven modernized, just as we should object to have a modern mansarde roof placed upon a Greek temple. The thing is out of place, and is, moreover, ridiculous. A musical sentiment that did not exist in Beethoven's time should not be foisted on his music. We are not willing to have Beethoven translated for us as Pope translated the rugged Homer into the sugary poetical language and the literary style that prevailed in the time of good Queen Anne. Pope's "Iliad" is a very pretty poem, but it is not Homer; and Mr. Nikisch's C-minor symphony is very exciting, but it is not Beethoven. It is barely possible that Beethoven should have marked it as Mr. Nikisch reads it; but as he did not, we feel justified in declining to accept the innovation, especially as the change adds nothing of value to the work, and also especially as we believe that Beethoven knew what he wanted and was capable of indicating it. We have had many readings of Hamlet, but nobody has as yet attempted to enact the part in a purely modern spirit, or in any spirit which, while it preserves the customary suit of black, would connect the costume with the present taste in dress by adopting modern evening attire, including a crush hat and patent leather congress gaiters. Music should be interpreted in the spirit of the age in which it had birth;—at all events, it should not have fastened upon it a style that was not in existence when it was written.

Of this question of "feeling," and of what may be found in a composer that was never found before, there is much to be said. We are told that if Mr. Nikisch "feels" this or that work in such or such a way, he is entitled to give expression to his feeling. To this we make serious objection; for it lays the whole field of classical music open to the caprices of individual feeling, and relegating the feeling of the composer into the background. Every great composer has his own particular style and touch by which he is recognized, as is every great painter. There is nothing of Teniers in Rmbrandt, nothing of Franz Hals in Correggio. The expert knows and recognizes a great painter by his handwriting, so to speak, as it is exhibited in his work; and so with a great composer whose peculiar individualities cannot be mistaken. To inject into Beethoven something that is not characteristic of him is to do something that is detected at once. Then, too, if Mr. Nikisch feels that he has made a new find in Beethoven, why should not Mr. Lang, or Mr. Zerrahn, or Mr. Listeman also make their new finds, until at last the old Beethoven disappears, and a new one, with whom the past was wholly unacquainted stands in his place? We have only to change the marking of the fifth symphony throughout to make it tell quite another story from the one it tells at present. But when we probe seriously into the "feeling" that inspires Mr. Nikisch, we discover that it is very restricted; that he feels all composers very much in the same spirit, and that whether it be Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, or even Rossini, he puts the same mark on them all. And as for his "finds," he seems to find exactly the same thing in all composers; and at last, when we analyze the matter, we are confronted by the fact that, according to Mr. Nikisch, the great masters were nearly unanimous in their morbid propensity for highly sentimental rallentandos in connection with their second themes; that no heed how much they differed in point of style, they were wonderfully agreed in making their works all say the same thing with the same quality of expression. Now, we have a belief that what Mr. Nikisch finds in Beethoven and Mozart and the other great masters, is not Beethoven and Mozart, and so on, but is Mr. Nikisch.

and pure tone, and overcoming the difficulties with which the work bristles, with the greatest ease. He was applauded vehemently, but with no greater fevor than his performances deserved.

UNITED STATES

POSTAL CARD.

ONE CENT

NOTHING BUT THE ADDRESS TO BE ON THIS SIDE.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER,

CARE NEW HAVEN,

M. STEINERT & SONS. CONN.

1889.

I hereby subscribe for ..... Season Tickets for the Concerts at the Hyperion Theatre, by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dec. 16th, 1889, Jan'y 13th, Feb'y 10th, and March 17th, 1890.

Tickets, Five Dollars.

Name, ...

Address, ...

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1889

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S CONCERT.

The first concert of Mr. Timothee Adamowski's reorganized quartet drew an excellent audience. The following programme was presented:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1. . Schumann
Songs with piano.....Franz
a. "Madchen mit dem Rothen Mundchen."
b. "Am Leuchten den Sommermorgen."
c. Gewittemacht.
Mr. Hubbard.
Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the concerto in D minor.....B. Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen.....C. Davidoff
Mr. Adamowski.
Piano quartet in A major, op. 26.....Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

Without any disparagement to the former members of this quartet, it must be said that the change has been an advantage; the present artists seem to be more wholly in sympathy with one another, and, indeed, they played admirably. The last movement of the quartet was very finely conceived and executed. The balance of tone was excellent, and the shading and phrasing both careful and artistic. Mr. Hubbard has improved exceedingly since last year. His voice has gained at the same time both strength and delicacy, and his singing last night was very refined and delightful. Especially the first song was sung in a most charming and feeling manner, and with great artistic understanding, although the last phrase might have been taken a trifle slower. Boston has gained a most valuable addition to its musical circles by the advent of Mr. J. Adamowski. He is a delightful 'cellist in every sense of the word. His selections last night showed at the same time his full, refined and pure tone, his exquisite staccato and his very highly developed technique. He played with great feeling and in the true musical spirit. Both Messrs. Hubbard and Adamowski were accompanied by Mr. Clayton Johns in an artistic and discreet manner. The first movement of the piano quartet was indeed splendidly played. Miss Obrion has manifestly improved since last year, and her collaboration was highly satisfactory in all particulars. The audience was manifestly interested and applauded all the numbers enthusiastically. Mr. Adamowski is to be congratulated upon the results which his careful rehearsing have produced, and upon a thoroughly enjoyable contribution to the chamber music of the season.

ARTHUR WELD.

[Boston Daily Globe]

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Adamowski Quartet Concert, Star Course, Balmoral Choir, and Hegner.

Last evening, at Steinert Hall, the Adamowski Quartet gave the first of three subscription concerts, with the assistance of Miss Mary E. Obrion, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, baritone. Of the original members of the quartet two only remain, Mr. A. Moldauer, second violin, and Mr. J. Adamowski, violoncello, taking the places respectively of Mr. Fiedler and Mr. G. Campanari.

The following was the programme:

Quartet in A minor, No. 1, Schumann; songs with piano, (a) "Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen," (b) "Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen," (c) Gewittemacht, Franz; soli for violoncello, (a) Andante from the Concerto in D minor, B. Molique; (b) Am Springbrunnen, C. Davidoff; Piano Quartet in A major (Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz), Brahms.

The quartet may rightly congratulate itself upon having begun its second season's work so successfully. It plays well, technically and musically, and maintains, as a whole, an artistic balance that is both agreeable and satisfying.

The Schumann quartet received a sympathetic reading throughout, the first movement, especially, being played with uncommon delicacy and sentiment. The Brahms quartet was also brilliantly performed. In this number Miss Obrion rendered adequate assistance, and frequently gave evidence in her playing of a refined taste as well as considerable artistic ability.

Mr. J. Adamowski will, without doubt, be included among Boston's list of fine 'cello players. He produces a strong, full tone, and is master of a fluent technique. His solos were well-chosen, and won for him a hearty recall.

The Franz songs happily relieved the too-lengthy programme, and were sung by Mr. Hubbard with so much earnestness as to win for him also a recall. Mr. Clayton Johns did some effective accompanying, and the large and cultivated audience bestowed liberal applause upon performers and music.

[Boston Evening Transcript.]

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

STEINERT HALL: THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET

The Adamowski Quartet, which now consists of Mr. Timothée Adamowski (first violin), Mr. A. Moldauer (second violin), Mr. D. Kuntz (viola), and Mr. Joseph Adamowski ('cello), gave their first subscription concert in Steinert Hall last evening, assisted by of Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Eliot Hubbard. The programme was:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.....Schumann
Adamowski Quartet.

Songs for pianoforte—
a. "Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen."
b. "Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen. ....} Franz
c. Gewitternacht.....}
Mr. Hubbard.

Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the Concerto in D minor..Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen.....Davidoff
Mr. J. Adamowski.

Pianoforte Quartet in A major, op. 26.....Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

The familiar, but ever fresh and beautiful, Schumann quartet was exquisitely played; with perfect smoothness and warmth of tone, and grace of phrasing, in the first and third movements, and admirable spirit in the scherzo and finale. Brahms's grand pianoforte quartet was also excellently played, Miss Obrion giving the pianoforte part with great aplomb and due regard for the ensemble effect. Mr. Hubbard has seldom sung better than he did last evening; he was in capital voice, and sang the three wonderful songs by Franz very beautifully, indeed. And the songs themselves! How immediately they take you up to a higher plane than do the songs by any other living writer! How the Rubinstein, Grieg and Dvorak songs pale before them! Too much neglected as he now is in our concert rooms, Franz, whenever he does get a hearing, unfailingly makes good the claim to rank with Schubert and Schumann as a song-writer. Mr. Joseph Adamowski, younger brother of the violinist, made his first public appearance here on this occasion, and made a particularly fine impression, both in his solo pieces and in the quartets. His tone is pure, warm and sympathetic, his intonation impeccable, his phrasing elegance itself. His technique, both in bowing and fingerwork, seems highly developed. Indeed his playing bears a strong family resemblance to his brother's. He evinces the same fine musical sensibility—that union of sympathetic warmth of feeling with grace of expression—and a corresponding artistic instinct for what is purely musical. Like his brother, he does not allow the expressive, poetic element in his playing to overstep the bounds of musical coherence, but the phrase, as he plays it, no matter how warmly and emotionally, never is distorted out of its true character as a musical phrase. He seems to have quite overcome that involuntary "kick of the bow," which is the bane of so many players on stringed instruments, and makes their phrasing often little better than a series of misplaced accents. It is a great boon to the Adamowski Quartet to have, at top and bottom, two artists whose musical instincts and general style of playing are so similar, and who can consequently pull so sympathetically together as the Adamowski brothers.

GLOBE THEATRE: "THE OOLAH."

[Boston Daily Globe.]

THURSDAY, NOV. 21.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert in Providence—Meislinger and Hekking.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 20.—The second concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra course was given in Infantry Hall tonight, before a large and fashionable audience.

The programme was an excellent one, and was made up as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Komarinskaja, a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, Glinka, and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Miss Louise Meislinger and Anton Hekking were the soloists of the evening, the former rendering Meyerbeer's aria from "Le Prophete," and three songs with piano, Jensen's "Spring Night," Lassen's "Voglein, wohn so schnell," and Godard's "Florian's song." Mr. Hekking played an air from Bach's suite in D; Schumann's "Traumerei," and Popper's "Papillon."

The rendering of the symphony by Herr Nikisch was received with tremendous applause, and was as beautiful as ever.

Miss Meislinger sang with much expression. As an artist she is well known, and this was her first appearance in Providence as a concert singer. She was greatly admired.

Mr. Hekking played his selections on the violoncello with the greatest satisfaction to all.

The next concert will be given Jan. 1, with Miss Adele Aus der Ohe as soloist.

[Gazette]

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first in its series of three subscription concerts in Steinert Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Eliot Hubbard. The playing through the whole concert was distinguished by fine smoothness, warmth and expressiveness. The performances opened with the beautiful Schuman quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1, which was accorded a thoroughly sympathetic reading, especially in the finale, which was given with admirable spirit and purity of taste. The Brahms pianoforte quartet in A major, op. 26, was scarcely less excellent in the interpretation it received, and in the artistic balance of tone that characterized it, Miss Obrion achieving some of the best work she has ever done here in the piano part. A very interesting feature of the concert was the 'cello playing of Mr. Joseph Adamowski, who made his first appearance here as a soloist on this occasion. He played an andante by Molique, and a character piece by Davidoff, and at once leaped into favor by the beauty, warmth and purity of his tone, the truth of his intonation and the delicate artistic taste that marks his style. His technique is ample and fluent, and it was made at once apparent that the ranks of our 'cello players had been recruited by an artist who can not but prove a valuable acquisition. His success was complete and wholly deserved. Mr. Hubbard sang a group of songs by Robert Franz, thoughtfully and well, phrasing them admirably, and reading them in a style keenly in sympathy with both words and music. A highly critical audience was present, and was lavish and appreciative in applause.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Our review of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is necessarily postponed until next week, owing to the heavy advertising pressure on our columns. This is the more to be regretted, as there are so many gratifying things to be said of Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

[Boston Sunday Globe.]

SUNDAY, NOV. 24, 1889.

MINIATURE ALMANAC....Nov. 24

The Sympany Concerts.

Again an American composer was given a place of honor in a Boston symphany programme yesterday evening. Mr. Arthur Foote's suite in D major, for string orchestra, is one of the latest and most interesting works of the pianist and composer who is so well known in Boston that especial interest was felt in the performance. Miss Gertrude Edmands, who enjoys such deserved popularity, was assigned songs by Raff and Brahms. The overture to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Beethoven's eighth symphony made up the list of offerings. Saturday next Brahms' Symphony, No. 2, in F; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the "Tannhauser" overture, are to be given in order. The people who object to the symphonies coming last on the programme will certainly find their preferences consulted in this arrangement.

[THE MUSICAL COURIER.]

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1889.

MRS. CARL ALVES made a hit with her singing of a Saint-Saëns aria and a Schumann song at the Popular Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week.

Mr. Philip Hale wishes to know of Mr. Nikisch whether he is acquainted with any of the composers of the French school.

Second Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert in the course by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows; in the performance of it Miss Louise Meislinger of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mr. Anton Hekking, the new leading 'cellist of the orchestra, participated:

Overture, "Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Aria from "Le Prophete".....Meyerbeer
MISS MEISLINGER.

Komarinskaja.....Glinka
Solos for 'Cello; (a) Air, Bach; (b) Traumerei, Schumann; (c) Papillon, Popper.
MR. HEKKING.

Songs with Piano; (a) "Spring Night," Jensen; (b) "Voeglein, Wohin So Schnell," Lassen; (c) Florian's Song, Godard.
MISS MEISLINGER.

Symphony C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven

It may seem to Providence musical people that Mr. Nikisch is giving them a superabundance of Mendelssohn, and, in general, that he is confining himself pretty strictly to well-known masterpieces of classic art. So indeed he is, both here and in Boston, where the same complaint has been voiced. But there is evident a distinct purpose in his course that is not without a deal of interest to the most thoughtful and discriminating patrons of his audiences. Musical Boston and unmusical Providence are both—in different measure — familiar with the classical works that have made up the chief part of Mr. Nikisch's programmes; but both are wholly unfamiliar with them in the sense in which Mr. Nikisch takes them, and seems determined to press them upon the acceptance of his hearers. His course is a gratification to the musical, whether or not they are wholly carried through the great distance that Mr. Nikisch has gone past the conventional interpretation—or lack of interpretation, in the highest sense—that has characterized so much of the best intentioned orchestral playing.

Nothing could more plainly represent Mr. Nikisch's attitude toward two very different styles of symphonic music than the two principal numbers of his programme last evening, the "Fingal's Cave" overture of Mendelssohn and the fifth symphony of Beethoven. Both took on an entirely new color by his playing of them; it seemed as if a flood of light was poured in to illuminate every smallest detail, and to set in right relationship and in beautifully fit conjunction the manifold complexities, both of thought and of execution, that make up the sum of an orchestral composition. Such a performance as that last evening causes even familiar works to seem much deeper and more significant of purpose than they did before, but at the same time it gains much of its artistic value by the clearness with which it sets that purpose forth. The elasticity of tempo is one of the most striking means used by Mr. Nikisch to gain his impressive effects. In the overture he made this particularly prominent in the slight accelerations with which he marked the approach to climax in several passages through the work, in the rubato effects with which he caressed the broad second theme first given out by the 'cellos, and in many other such touches more or less plainly given. All of which, added to the wonderfully sensitive modulation of dynamic effect, of light and shade, of "loud and soft," imparted an immense vigor and a certain picturesque, at times poetic, quality, that heightened and deepened the colors of this tonal picture to a vivid intensity.

But it was in the great symphony that Mr. Nikisch's power as an interpreter was most plainly shown. He drew out of it such a depth of meaning and set it forth with such a limitless command of resources in orchestral treatment as to make his performance as impressive as it was radically novel in many respects. It was, first and foremost, a magnificently dramatic exposition of the symphony, a quality which was pre-eminent throughout. The famous theme of four notes in the opening bars was given an immensely effective significance—indeed, like "fate knocking at the door"—by what might be called a ritard before the movement began, and by the pause upon the final note, as Wagner called it, "long and terrible." This first movement was played altogether with a splendid stress of passionate utterance that gave the fullest representation of its stormy character. More of the striking use of the tempo rubato came abundantly into Mr. Nikisch's reading of this as well as of the rest of the symphony, while especially notable in the whole of it was the extraordinary plastic elaboration of the thematic passages given to the various instruments, a fact to which was due much of the power and effectiveness of the performance. It is a principle of Mr. Nikisch's artistic faith evidently that a melodious passage for the horns or the trombones, or the trumpets forms a necessary and integral part of the complex web of the symphony, and that the passages given to them should be uttered with as characteristic a tone-color as any other. The increase given to the virility and strength of the orchestra's playing by the vigor of the brass was noted at the last concert; the added effectiveness of it as more thoroughly filling out the melodic structure was especially shown in this. Especially fine in its effect of mystery was the scherzo, wonderfully delicate in execution, and breaking with unsurpassable grandeur into the allegro which closes the work.

The Glinka fantasie was not a very important addition to the programme, but an interesting one from the wealth of individual orchestral effect it shows. Its two themes are simply repeated and reiterated in every shape and fashion till the composer's command of contrapuntal embroidery has given out; and the ingenuity and knowledge displayed in the meanwhile are very wide in their range.

With all the arduous increase in the demands on expressive power the orchestra seems to have lost a trifle of that absolute perfection of ensemble, accuracy of attack and exquisite tonal blending, that has hitherto been its extraordinary distinction; or was it but a showing of the poor form that the most perfect of virtuosi are occasionally beset with? Not to speak of an annoying wrong note at a critical moment by a second bassoon, the wood-wind as a whole seemed to be a little uneven, and the brasses a bit slow in speaking.

Mr. Hekking, the 'cellist, was heard for the first time here, and displayed a technique of incomparable polish, and a warm and soulful tone; his selections were not such as to show his true position as an artist. Miss Meislinger sang the air from "The Prophet" with considerable dramatic vigor, and with a voice that seemed as if it might not be doing itself full justice. Her intonation was frequently faulty to an unpleasant degree. It was rather an imposition that Mr. Hekking's trifles should have the accompaniment of the orchestra, while Miss Meislinger's operatic air had to be content with the piano, however artistic and graceful was the playing of the unnamed accompanist. The audience at this concert showed a gratifying increase in numbers over that at the first, and its pleasure and interest in the evening's performance were frequently and warmly manifested.

Boston Daily Gazette.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Adamowski Quartet Concert, Star Course, Balmoral Choir, and Hegner.

Last evening, at Steinert Hall, the Adamowski Quartet gave the first of three subscription concerts, with the assistance of Miss Mary E. Obrion, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, baritone. Of the original members of the quartet two only remain, Mr. A. Moldauer, second violin, and Mr. J. Adamowski, violoncello, taking the places respectively of Mr. Fiedler and Mr. G. Campanari.

The following was the programme:

Quartet in A minor, No. 1, Schumann; songs with piano: (a) "Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen," (b) "Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen," (c) Gewittemacht, Franz; soli for violoncello, (a) Andante from the Concerto in D minor, B. Molique; (b) Am Springbrunnen, C. Davidoff; Piano Quartet in A major (Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz), Brahms.

The quartet may rightly congratulate itself upon having begun its second season's work so successfully. It plays well, technically and musically, and maintains, as a whole, an artistic balance that is both agreeable and satisfying.

The Schumann quartet received a sympathetic reading throughout, the first movement, especially, being played with uncommon delicacy and sentiment. The Brahms quartet was also brilliantly performed. In this number Miss Obrion rendered adequate assistance, and frequently gave evidence in her playing of a refined taste as well as considerable artistic ability.

Mr. J. Adamowski will, without doubt, be included among Boston's list of fine 'cello players. He produces a strong, full tone, and is master of a fluent technique. His solos were well-chosen, and won for him a hearty recall.

The Franz songs happily relieved the too-lengthy programme, and were sung by Mr. Hubbard with so much earnestness as to win for him also a recall. Mr. Clayton Johns did some effective accompanying, and the large and cultivated audience bestowed liberal applause upon performers and music.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

STEINERT HALL: THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET

The Adamowski Quartet, which now consists of Mr. Timothée Adamowski (first violin), Mr. A. Moldauer (second violin), Mr. D. Kuntz (viola), and Mr. Joseph Adamowski ('cello), gave their first subscription concert in Steinert Hall last evening, assisted by of Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Eliot Hubbard. The programme was:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.....Schumann
Adamowski Quartet.

Songs for pianoforte—
a. "Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen."
b. "Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen. ....} Franz
c. Gewitternacht.....
Mr. Hubbard.

Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the Concerto in D minor..Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen.....Davidoff
Mr. J. Adamowski.

Pianoforte Quartet in A major, op. 26.....Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

The familiar, but ever fresh and beautiful, Schumann quartet was exquisitely played; with perfect smoothness and warmth of tone, and grace of phrasing, in the first and third movements, and admirable spirit in the scherzo and finale. Brahms's grand pianoforte quartet was also excellently played, Miss Obrion giving the pianoforte part with great aplomb and due regard for the ensemble effect. Mr. Hubbard has seldom sung better than he did last evening; he was in capital voice, and sang the three wonderful songs by Franz very beautifully, indeed. And the songs themselves! How immediately they take you up to a higher plane than do the songs by any other living writer! How the Rubinstein, Grieg and Dvorak songs pale before them! Too much neglected as he now is in our concert rooms, Franz, whenever he does get a hearing, unfailingly makes good the claim to rank with Schubert and Schumann as a song-writer. Mr. Joseph Adamowski, younger brother of the violinist, made his first public appearance here on this occasion, and made a particularly fine impression, both in his solo pieces and in the quartets. His tone is pure, warm and sympathetic, his intonation impeccable, his phrasing elegance itself. His technique, both in bowing and fingerwork, seems highly developed. Indeed his playing bears a strong family resemblance to his brother's. He evinces the same fine musical sensibility—that union of sympathetic warmth of feeling with grace of expression—and a corresponding artistic instinct for what is purely musical. Like his brother, he does not allow the expressive, poetic element in his playing to overstep the bounds of musical coherence, but the phrase, as he plays it, no matter how warmly and emotionally, never is distorted out of its true character as a musical phrase. He seems to have quite overcome that involuntary "kick of the bow," which is the bane of so many players on stringed instruments, and makes their phrasing often little better than a series of misplaced accents. It is a great boon to the Adamowski Quartet to have, at top and bottom, two artists whose musical instincts and general style of playing are so similar, and who can consequently pull so sympathetically together as the Adamowski brothers.

GLOBE THEATRE: "THE OOLAH."

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 21.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert in Providence—Meislinger and Hekking.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 20.—The second concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra course was given in Infantry Hall tonight, before a large and fashionable audience.

The programme was an excellent one, and was made up as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Komarinskaja, a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, Glinka, and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Miss Louise Meislinger and Anton Hekking were the soloists of the evening, the former rendering Meyerbeer's aria from "Le Prophete," and three songs with piano, Jensen's "Spring Night," Lassen's "Voglein, wohn so schnell," and Godard's "Florian's song." Mr. Hekking played an air from Bach's suite in D; Schumann's "Traumerei," and Popper's "Papillon."

The rendering of the symphony by Herr Nikisch was received with tremendous applause, and was as beautiful as ever.

Miss Meislinger sang with much expression. As an artist she is well known, and this was her first appearance in Providence as a concert singer. She was greatly admired.

Mr. Hekking played his selections on the violoncello with the greatest satisfaction to all.

The next concert will be given Jan. 1, with Miss Adele Aus der Ohe as soloist.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first in its series of three subscription concerts in Steinert Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Elliot Hubbard. The playing through the whole concert was distinguished by fine smoothness, warmth and expressiveness. The performances opened with the beautiful Schuman quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1, which was accorded a thoroughly sympathetic reading, especially in the finale, which was given with admirable spirit and purity of taste. The Brahms pianoforte quartet in A major, op. 26, was scarcely less excellent in the interpretation it received, and in the artistic balance of tone that characterized it, Miss Obrion achieving some of the best work she has ever done here in the piano part. A very interesting feature of the concert was the 'cello playing of Mr. Joseph Adamowski, who made his first appearance here as a soloist on this occasion. He played an andante by Molique, and a character piece by Davidoff, and at once leaped into favor by the beauty, warmth and purity of his tone, the truth of his intonation and the delicate artistic taste that marks his style. His technique is ample and fluent, and it was made at once apparent that the ranks of our 'cello players had been recruited by an artist who can not but prove a valuable acquisition. His success was complete and wholly deserved. Mr. Hubbard sang a group of songs by Robert Franz, thoughtfully and well, phrasing them admirably, and reading them in a style keenly in sympathy with both words and music. A highly critical audience was present, and was lavish and appreciative in applause.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Our review of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is necessarily postponed until next week, owing to the heavy advertising pressure on our columns. This is the more to be regretted, as there are so many gratifying things to be said of Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1889.

MRS. CARL ALVES made a hit with her singing of a Saint-Saëns aria and a Schumann song at the Popular Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week.

Mr. Philip Hale wishes to know of Mr. Nikisch whether he is acquainted with any of the composers of the French school.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 24, 1889.

MINIATURE ALMANAC....Nov. 24

The Sympany Concerts.

Again an American composer was given a place of honor in a Boston symphany programme yesterday evening. Mr. Arthur Foote's suite in D major, for string orchestra, is one of the latest and most interesting works of the pianist and composer who is so well known in Boston that especial interest was felt in the performance. Miss Gertrude Edmands, who enjoys such deserved popularity, was assigned songs by Raff and Brahms. The overture to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Beethoven's eighth symphony made up the list of offerings. Saturday next Brahms' Symphony, No. 2, in F; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the "Tannhauser" overture, are to be given in order. The people who object to the symphonies coming last on the programme will certainly find their preferences consulted in this arrangement.

Second Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert in the course by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows; in the performance of it Miss Louise Meslinger of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mr. Anton Hekking, the new leading 'cellist of the orchestra, participated:

Overture, "Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Aria from "Le Prophete".....Meyerbeer
MISS MEISLINGER.
Komarinskaja.....Glinka
Solos for 'Cello; (a) Air, Bach; (b) Traumera, Schumann; (c) Papillon, Popper.
MR. HEKKING.
Songs with Piano; (a) "Spring Night," Jensen; (b) "Voeglein, Wohin So Schnell," Lassen; (c) Florian's Song, Godard.
MISS MEISLINGER.
Symphony C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven.

It may seem to Providence musical people that Mr. Nikisch is giving them a superabundance of Mendelssohn, and, in general, that he is confining himself pretty strictly to well-known masterpieces of classic art. So indeed he is, both here and in Boston, where the same complaint has been voiced. But there is evident a distinct purpose in his course that is not without a deal of interest to the most thoughtful and discriminating patrons of his audiences. Musical Boston and unmusical Providence are both—in different measure — familiar with the classical works that have made up the chief part of Mr. Nikisch's programmes; but both are wholly unfamiliar with them in the sense in which Mr. Nikisch takes them, and seems determined to press them upon the acceptance of his hearers. His course is a gratification to the musical, whether or not they are wholly carried through the great distance that Mr. Nikisch has gone past the conventional interpretation—or lack of interpretation, in the highest sense—that has characterized so much of the best intentioned orchestral playing.

Nothing could more plainly represent Mr. Nikisch's attitude toward two very different styles of symphonic music than the two principal numbers of his programme last evening, the "Fingal's Cave" overture of Mendelssohn and the fifth symphony of Beethoven. Both took on an entirely new color by his playing of them; it seemed as if a flood of light was poured in to illuminate every smallest detail, and to set in right relationship and in beautifully fit conjunction the manifold complexities, both of thought and of execution, that make up the sum of an orchestral composition. Such a performance as that last evening causes even familiar works to seem much deeper and more significant of purpose than they did before, but at the same time it gains much of its artistic value by the clearness with which it sets that purpose forth. The elasticity of tempo is one of the most striking means used by Mr. Nikisch to gain his impressive effects. In the overture he made this particularly prominent in the slight accelerations with which he marked the approach to climax in several passages through the work, in the rubato effects with which he caressed the broad second theme first given out by the 'cellos, and in many other such touches more or less plainly given. All of which, added to the wonderfully sensitive modulation of dynamic effect, of light and shade, of "loud and soft," imparted an immense vigor and a certain picturesque, at times poetic, quality, that heightened and deepened the colors of this tonal picture to a vivid intensity.

But it was in the great symphony that Mr. Nikisch's power as an interpreter was most plainly shown. He drew out of it such a depth of meaning and set it forth with such a limitless command of resources in orchestral treatment as to make his performance as impressive as it was radically novel in many respects. It was, first and foremost, a magnificently dramatic exposition of the symphony, a quality which was pre-eminent throughout. The famous theme of four notes in the opening bars was given an immensely effective significance—indeed, like "fate knocking at the door"—by what might be called a ritard before the movement began, and by the pause upon the final note, as Wagner called it, "long and terrible." This first movement was played altogether with a splendid stress of passionate utterance that gave the fullest representation of its stormy character. More of the striking use of the tempo rubato came abundantly into Mr. Nikisch's reading of this as well as of the rest of the symphony, while especially notable in the whole of it was the extraordinary plastic elaboration of the thematic passages given to the various instruments, a fact to which was due much of the power and effectiveness of the performance. It is a principle of Mr. Nickish's artistic faith evidently that a melodious passage for the horns or the trombones, or the trumpets forms a necessary and integral part of the complex web of the symphony, and that the passages given to them should be uttered with as characteristic a tone-color as any other. The increase given to the virility and strength of the orchestra's playing by the vigor of the brass was noted at the last concert; the added effectiveness of it as more thoroughly filling out the melodic structure was especially shown in this. Especially fine in its effect of mystery was the scherzo, wonderfully delicate in execution, and breaking with unsurpassable grandeur into the allegro which closes the work.

The Glinka fantasie was not a very important addition to the programme, but an interesting one from the wealth of individual orchestral effect it shows. Its two themes are simply repeated and reiterated in every shape and fashion till the composer's command of contrapuntal embroidery has given out; and the ingenuity and knowledge displayed in the meanwhile are very wide in their range.

With all the arduous increase in the demands on expressive power the orchestra seems to have lost a trifle of that absolute perfection of ensemble, accuracy of attack and exquisite tonal blending, that has hitherto been its extraordinary distinction; or was it but a showing of the poor form that the most perfect of virtuosos are occasionally beset with? Not to speak of an annoying wrong note at a critical moment by a second bassoon, the woodwind as a whole seemed to be a little uneven, and the brasses a bit slow in speaking.

Mr. Hekking, the 'cellist, was heard for the first time here, and displayed a technique of incomparable polish, and a warm and soulful tone; his selections were not such as to show his true position as an artist. Miss Meislinger sang the air from "The Prophet" with considerable dramatic vigor, and with a voice that seemed as if it might not be doing itself full justice. Her intonation was frequently faulty to an unpleasant degree. It was rather an imposition that Mr. Hekking's trifles should have the accompaniment of the orchestra, while Miss Meislinger's operatic air had to be content with the piano, however artistic and graceful was the playing of the unnamed accompanist. The audience at this concert showed a gratifying increase in numbers over that at the first, and its pleasure and interest in the evening's performance were frequently and warmly manifested.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Adamowski Quartet Concert, Star Course, Balmoral Choir, and Hegner.

Last evening, at Steinert Hall, the Adamowski Quartet gave the first of three subscription concerts, with the assistance of Miss Mary E. Obrion, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, baritone. Of the original members of the quartet two only remain, Mr. A. Moldauer, second violin, and Mr. J. Adamowski, violoncello, taking the places respectively of Mr. Fiedler and Mr. G. Campanari.

The following was the programme:

Quartet in A minor, No. 1, Schumann; songs with piano. (a) "Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen," (b) "Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen," (c) Gewittemacht, Franz; soli for violoncello, (a) Andante from the Concerto in D minor, B. Molique; (b) Am Springbrunnen, C. Davidoff; Piano Quartet in A major (Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz), Brahms.

The quartet may rightly congratulate itself upon having begun its second season's work so successfully. It plays well, technically and musically, and maintains, as a whole, an artistic balance that is both agreeable and satisfying.

The Schumann quartet received a sympathetic reading throughout, the first movement, especially, being played with uncommon delicacy and sentiment. The Brahms quartet was also brilliantly performed. In this number Miss Obrion rendered adequate assistance, and frequently gave evidence in her playing of a refined taste as well as considerable artistic ability.

Mr. J. Adamowski will, without doubt, be included among Boston's list of fine 'cello players. He produces a strong, full tone, and is master of a fluent technique. His solos were well-chosen, and won for him a hearty recall.

The Franz songs happily relieved the too-lengthy programme, and were sung by Mr. Hubbard with so much earnestness as to win for him also a recall. Mr. Clayton Johns did some effective accompanying, and the large and cultivated audience bestowed liberal applause upon performers and music.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

STEINERT HALL: THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET

The Adamowski Quartet, which now consists of Mr. Timothée Adamowski (first violin), Mr. A. Moldauer (second violin), Mr. D. Kuntz (viola), and Mr. Joseph Adamowski ('cello), gave their first subscription concert in Steinert Hall last evening, assisted by of Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Eliot Hubbard. The programme was:

Quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1.....Schumann
Adamowski Quartet.

Songs for pianoforte—
a. "Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen."
b. "Am leuchtenden Sommermorgen. ....} Franz
c. Gewitternacht.....}
Mr. Hubbard.

Soli for violoncello—
a. Andante from the Concerto in D minor..Molique
b. Am Springbrunnen.....Davidoff
Mr. J. Adamowski.

Pianoforte Quartet in A major, op. 26.....Brahms
Miss Obrion, Messrs. Adamowski and Mr. Kuntz.

The familiar, but ever fresh and beautiful, Schumann quartet was exquisitely played; with perfect smoothness and warmth of tone, and grace of phrasing, in the first and third movements, and admirable spirit in the scherzo and finale. Brahms's grand pianoforte quartet was also excellently played, Miss Obrion giving the pianoforte part with great aplomb and due regard for the ensemble effect. Mr. Hubbard has seldom sung better than he did last evening; he was in capital voice, and sang the three wonderful songs by Franz very beautifully, indeed. And the songs themselves! How immediately they take you up to a higher plane than do the songs by any other living writer! How the Rubinstein, Grieg and Dvorak songs pale before them! Too much neglected as he now is in our concert rooms, Franz, whenever he does get a hearing, unfailingly makes good the claim to rank with Schubert and Schumann as a song-writer. Mr. Joseph Adamowski, younger brother of the violinist, made his first public appearance here on this occasion, and made a particularly fine impression, both in his solo pieces and in the quartets. His tone is pure, warm and sympathetic, his intonation impeccable, his phrasing elegance itself. His technique, both in bowing and fingerwork, seems highly developed. Indeed his playing bears a strong family resemblance to his brother's. He evinces the same fine musical sensibility—that union of sympathetic warmth of feeling with grace of expression—and a corresponding artistic instinct for what is purely musical. Like his brother, he does not allow the expressive, poetic element in his playing to overstep the bounds of musical coherence, but the phrase, as he plays it, no matter how warmly and emotionally, never is distorted out of its true character as a musical phrase. He seems to have quite overcome that involuntary "kick of the bow," which is the bane of so many players on stringed instruments, and makes their phrasing often little better than a series of misplaced accents. It is a great boon to the Adamowski Quartet to have, at top and bottom, two artists whose musical instincts and general style of playing are so similar, and who can consequently pull so sympathetically together as the Adamowski brothers.

GLOBE THEATRE: "THE OOLAH."

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 21.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert in Providence—Meislinger and Hekking.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 20.—The second concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra course was given in Infantry Hall tonight, before a large and fashionable audience.

The programme was an excellent one, and was made up as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Komarinskaja, a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, Glinka, and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Miss Louise Meislinger and Anton Hekking were the soloists of the evening, the former rendering Meyerbeer's aria from "Le Prophete," and three songs with piano, Jensen's "Spring Night," Lassen's "Voglein, wohin so schnell," and Godard's "Florian's song." Mr. Hekking played an air from Bach's suite in D; Schumann's "Traumerei," and Popper's "Papillon."

The rendering of the symphony by Herr Nikisch was received with tremendous applause, and was as beautiful as ever.

Miss Meislinger sang with much expression. As an artist she is well known, and this was her first appearance in Providence as a concert singer. She was greatly admired.

Mr. Hekking played his selections on the violoncello with the greatest satisfaction to all.

The next concert will be given Jan. 1, with Miss Adele Aus der Ohe as soloist.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first in its series of three subscription concerts in Steinert Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Elliot Hubbard. The playing through the whole concert was distinguished by fine smoothness, warmth and expressiveness. The performances opened with the beautiful Schuman quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1, which was accorded a thoroughly sympathetic reading, especially in the finale, which was given with admirable spirit and purity of taste. The Brahms pianoforte quartet in A major, op. 26, was scarcely less excellent in the interpretation it received, and in the artistic balance of tone that characterized it, Miss Obrion achieving some of the best work she has ever done here in the piano part. A very interesting feature of the concert was the 'cello playing of Mr. Joseph Adamowski, who made his first appearance here as a soloist on this occasion. He played an andante by Molique, and a character piece by Davidoff, and at once leaped into favor by the beauty, warmth and purity of his tone, the truth of his intonation and the delicate artistic taste that marks his style. His technique is ample and fluent, and it was made at once apparent that the ranks of our 'cello players had been recruited by an artist who can not but prove a valuable acquisition. His success was complete and wholly deserved. Mr. Hubbard sang a group of songs by Robert Franz, thoughtfully and well, phrasing them admirably, and reading them in a style keenly in sympathy with both words and music. A highly critical audience was present, and was lavish and appreciative in applause.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Our review of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is necessarily postponed until next week, owing to the heavy advertising pressure on our columns. This is the more to be regretted, as there are so many gratifying things to be said of Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1889.

MRS. CARL ALVES made a hit with her singing of a Saint-Saëns aria and a Schumann song at the Popular Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week.

Mr. Philip Hale wishes to know of Mr. Nikisch whether he is acquainted with any of the composers of the French school.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 24, 1889.

MINIATURE ALMANAC....Nov. 24

The Sympany Concerts.

Again an American composer was given a place of honor in a Boston symphany programme yesterday evening. Mr. Arthur Foote's suite in D major, for string orchestra, is one of the latest and most interesting works of the pianist and composer who is so well known in Boston that especial interest was felt in the performance. Miss Gertrude Edmands, who enjoys such deserved popularity, was assigned songs by Raff and Brahms. The overture to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Beethoven's eighth symphony made up the list of offerings. Saturday next Brahms' Symphony, No. 3, in F; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the "Tannhauser" overture, are to be given in order. The people who object to the symphonies coming last on the programme will certainly find their preferences consulted in this arrangement.

[illegible]

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1889.

Second Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert in the course by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows; in the performance of it Miss Louise Meislinger of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mr. Anton Hekking, the new leading 'cellist of the orchestra, participated:

Overture, "Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Aria from "Le Prophete".....Meyerbeer
MISS MEISLINGER.

Komarinskaja.....Glinka
Solos for 'Cello; (a) Air, Bach; (b) Traemera, Schumann; (c) Papillon, Popper.
MR. HEKKING.

Songs with Piano; (a) "Spring Night," Jensen; (b) "Voeglein, Wohin So Schnell," Lassen; (c) Florian's Song, Godard.
MISS MEISLINGER.

Symphony C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven.

It may seem to Providence musical people that Mr. Nikisch is giving them a superabundance of Mendelssohn, and, in general, that he is confining himself pretty strictly to well-known masterpieces of classic art. So indeed he is, both here and in Boston, where the same complaint has been voiced. But there is evident a distinct purpose in his course that is not without a deal of interest to the most thoughtful and discriminating patrons of his audiences. Musical Boston and unmusical Providence are both—in different measure — familiar with the classical works that have made up the chief part of Mr. Nikisch's programmes; but both are wholly unfamiliar with them in the sense in which Mr. Nikisch takes them, and seems determined to press them upon the acceptance of his hearers. His course is a gratification to the musical, whether or not they are wholly carried through the great distance that Mr. Nikisch has gone past the conventional interpretation—or lack of interpretation, in the highest sense—that has characterized so much of the best intentioned orchestral playing.

Nothing could more plainly represent Mr. Nikisch's attitude toward two very different styles of symphonic music than the two principal numbers of his programme last evening, the "Fingal's Cave" overture of Mendelssohn and the fifth symphony of Beethoven. Both took on an entirely new color by his playing of them; it seemed as if a flood of light was poured in to illuminate every smallest detail, and to set in right relationship and in beautifully fit conjunction the manifold complexities, both of thought and of execution, that make up the sum of an orchestral composition. Such a performance as that last evening causes even familiar works to seem much deeper and more significant of purpose than they did before, but at the same time it gains much of its artistic value by the clearness with which it sets that purpose forth. The elasticity of tempo is one of the most striking means used by Mr. Nikisch to gain his impressive effects. In the overture he made this particularly prominent in the slight accelerations with which he marked the approach to climax in several passages through the work, in the rubato effects with which he caressed the broad second theme first given out by the 'cellos, and in many other such touches more or less plainly given. All of which, added to the wonderfully sensitive modulation of dynamic effect, of light and shade, of "loud and soft," imparted an immense vigor and a certain picturesque, at times poetic, quality, that heightened and deepened the colors of this tonal picture to a vivid intensity.

But it was in the great symphony that Mr. Nikisch's power as an interpreter was most plainly shown. He drew out of it such a depth of meaning and set it forth with such a limitless command of resources in orchestral treatment as to make his performance as impressive as it was radically novel in many respects. It was, first and foremost, a magnificently dramatic exposition of the symphony, a quality which was pre-eminent throughout. The famous theme of four notes in the opening bars was given an immensely effective significance—indeed, like "fate knocking at the door"—by what might be called a ritard before the movement began, and by the pause upon the final note, as Wagner called it, "long and terrible." This first movement was played altogether with splendid stress of passionate utterance that gave the fullest representation of its stormy character. More of the striking use of the tempo rubato came abundantly into Mr. Nikisch's reading of this as well as of the rest of the symphony, while especially notable in the whole of it was the extraordinary plastic elaboration of the thematic passages given to the various instruments, a fact to which was due much of the power and effectiveness of the performance. It is a principle of Mr. Nickish's artistit faith evidently that a melodious passage for the horns or the trombones, or the trumpets forms a necessary and integral part of the complex web of the symphony, and that the passages given to them should be uttered with as characteristic a tone-color as any other. The increase given to the virility and strength of the orchestra's playing by the vigor of the brass was noted at the last concert; the added effectiveness of it as more thoroughly filling out the melodic structure was especially shown in this. Especially fine in its effect of mystery was the scherzo, wonderfully delicate in execution, and breaking with unsurpassable grandeur into the allegro which closes the work.

The Glinka fantasie was not a very important addition to the programme, but an interesting one from the wealth of individual orchestral effect it shows. Its two themes are simply repeated and reiterated in every shape and fashion till the composer's command of contrapuntal embroidery has given out; and the ingenuity and knowledge displayed in the meanwhile are very wide in their range.

With all the arduous increase in the demands on expressive power the orchestra seems to have lost a trifle of that absolute perfection of ensemble, accuracy of attack and exquisite tonal blending, that has hitherto been its extraordinary distinction; or was it but a showing of the poor form that the most perfect of virtuosos are occasionally beset with? Not to speak of an annoying wrong note at a critical moment by a second bassoon, the wood-wind as a whole seemed to be a little uneven, and the brasses a bit slow in speaking.

Mr. Hekking, the 'cellist, was heard for the first time here, and displayed a technique of incomparable polish, and a warm and soulful tone; his selections were not such as to show his true position as an artist. Miss Meislinger sang the air from "The Prophet" with considerable dramatic vigor, and with a voice that seemed as if it might not be doing itself full justice. Her intonation was frequently faulty to an unpleasant degree. It was rather an imposition that Mr. Hekking's trifles should have the accompaniment of the orchestra, while Miss Meislinger's operatic air had to be content with the piano, however artistic and graceful was the playing of the unnamed accompanist. The audience at this concert showed a gratifying increase in numbers over that at the first, and its pleasure and interest in the evening's performance were frequently and warmly manifested.

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

M. STEINERT & SONS,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL REPRESENTATIVES

STEINWAY & SONS
WEBER
HARDMAN GABLER
PEASE

PIANOS

176 and 178 Westminster Street,

PROVIDENCE, R.I.

excellently played, Miss Obrion giving the piano-forte part with great aplomb and due regard for the ensemble effect. Mr. Hubbard has seldom sung better than he did last evening; he was in capital voice, and sang the three wonderful songs by Franz very beautifully, indeed. And the songs themselves! How immediately they take you up to a higher plane than do the songs by any other living writer! How the Rubinstein, Grieg and Dvorak songs pale before them! Too much neglected as he now is in our concert rooms, Franz, whenever he does get a hearing, unfailingly makes good the claim to rank with Schubert and Schumann as a song-writer. Mr. Joseph Adamowski, younger brother of the violinist, made his first public appearance here on this occasion, and made a particularly fine impression, both in his solo pieces and in the quartets. His tone is pure, warm and sympathetic, his intonation impeccable, his phrasing elegance itself. His technique, both in bowing and fingerwork, seems highly developed. Indeed his playing bears a strong family resemblance to his brother's. He evinces the same fine musical sensibility—that union of sympathetic warmth of feeling with grace of expression—and a corresponding artistic instinct for what is purely musical. Like his brother, he does not allow the expressive, poetic element in his playing to overstep the bounds of musical coherence, but the phrase, as he plays it, no matter how warmly and emotionally, never is distorted out of its true character as a musical phrase. He seems to have quite overcome that involuntary "kick of the bow," which is the bane of so many players on stringed instruments, and makes their phrasing often little better than a series of misplaced accents. It is a great boon to the Adamowski Quartet to have, at top and bottom, two artists whose musical instincts and general style of playing are so similar, and who can consequently pull so sympathetically together as the Adamowski brothers.

GLOBE THEATRE: "THE OOLAH."

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, NOV. 21.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert in Providence—Meislinger and Hekking.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 20.—The second concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra course was given in Infantry Hall tonight, before a large and fashionable audience.

The programme was an excellent one, and was made up as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Komarinskaja, a fantasie on two Russian folk songs, the bridal song and dance, Glinka, and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Miss Louise Meislinger and Anton Hekking were the soloists of the evening, the former rendering Meyerbeer's aria from "Le Prophete," and three songs with piano, Jensen's "Spring Night," Lassen's "Voglein, wohin so schnell," and Godard's "Florian's song." Mr. Hekking played an air from Bach's suite in D; Schumann's "Traumerei," and Popper's "Papillon."

The rendering of the symphony by Herr Nikisch was received with tremendous applause, and was as beautiful as ever.

Miss Meislinger sang with much expression. As an artist she is well known, and this was her first appearance in Providence as a concert singer. She was greatly admired.

Mr. Hekking played his selections on the violoncello with the greatest satisfaction to all.

The next concert will be given Jan. 1, with Miss Adele Aus der Ohe as soloist.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

The Adamowski Quartet gave the first in its series of three subscription concerts in Steinert Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Miss Mary E. Obrion and Mr. Elliot Hubbard. The playing through the whole concert was distinguished by fine smoothness, warmth and expressiveness. The performances opened with the beautiful Schuman quartet in A minor, op. 41, No. 1, which was accorded a thoroughly sympathetic reading, especially in the finale, which was given with admirable spirit and purity of taste. The Brahms piano-forte quartet in A major, op. 26, was scarcely less excellent in the interpretation it received, and in the artistic balance of tone that characterized it, Miss Obrion achieving some of the best work she has ever done here in the piano part. A very interesting feature of the concert was the 'cello playing of Mr. Joseph Adamowski, who made his first appearance here as a soloist on this occasion. He played an andante by Molique, and a character piece by Davidoff, and at once leaped into favor by the beauty, warmth and purity of his tone, the truth of his intonation and the delicate artistic taste that marks his style. His technique is ample and fluent, and it was made at once apparent that the ranks of our 'cello players had been recruited by an artist who can not but prove a valuable acquisition. His success was complete and wholly deserved. Mr. Hubbard sang a group of songs by Robert Franz, thoughtfully and well, phrasing them admirably, and reading them in a style keenly in sympathy with both words and music. A highly critical audience was present, and was lavish and appreciative in applause.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Our review of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is necessarily postponed until next week, owing to the heavy advertising pressure on our columns. This is the more to be regretted, as there are so many gratifying things to be said of Mr. Nikisch's readings of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1889.

MRS. CARL ALVES made a hit with her singing of a Saint-Saëns aria and a Schumann song at the Popular Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week.

Mr. Philip Hale wishes to know of Mr. Nikisch whether he is acquainted with any of the composers of the French school.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 24, 1889.

MINIATURE ALMANAC....Nov. 24

The Sympany Concerts.

Again an American composer was given a place of honor in a Boston symphany programme yesterday evening. Mr. Arthur Foote's suite in D major, for string orchestra, is one of the latest and most interesting works of the pianist and composer who is so well known in Boston that especial interest was felt in the performance. Miss Gertrude Edmands, who enjoys such deserved popularity, was assigned songs by Raff and Brahms. The overture to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Beethoven's eighth symphony made up the list of offerings. Saturday next Brahms' Symphony, No. 2, in F; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and the "Tannhauser" overture, are to be given in order. The people who object to the symphonies coming last on the programme will certainly find their preferences consulted in this arrangement.

Second Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert in the course by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme was as follows; in the performance of it Miss Louise Meislinger of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mr. Anton Hekking, the new leading 'cellist of the orchestra, participated:

Overture, "Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Aria from "Le Prophete".....Meyerbeer
MISS MEISLINGER.
Komarinskaja.....Glinka
Solos for 'Cello; (a) Air, Bach; (b) Traemera, Schumann; (c) Papillon, Popper.
MR. HEKKING.
Songs with Piano; (a) "Spring Night," Jensen; (b) "Voeglein, Wohin So Schnell," Lassen; (c) Florian's Song, Godard.
MISS MEISLINGER.
Symphony C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven.

It may seem to Providence musical people that Mr. Nikisch is giving them a superabundance of Mendelssohn, and, in general, that he is confining himself pretty strictly to well-known masterpieces of classic art. So indeed he is, both here and in Boston, where the same complaint has been voiced. But there is evident a distinct purpose in his course that is not without a deal of interest to the most thoughtful and discriminating patrons of his audiences. Musical Boston and unmusical Providence are both—in different measure — familiar with the classical works that have made up the chief part of Mr. Nikisch's programmes; but both are wholly unfamiliar with them in the sense in which Mr. Nikisch takes them, and seems determined to press them upon the acceptance of his hearers. His course is a gratification to the musical, whether or not they are wholly carried through the great distance that Mr. Nikisch has gone past the conventional interpretation—or lack of interpretation, in the highest sense—that has characterized so much of the best intentioned orchestral playing.

Nothing could more plainly represent Mr. Nikisch's attitude toward two very different styles of symphonic music than the two principal numbers of his programme last evening, the "Fingal's Cave" overture of Mendelssohn and the fifth symphony of Beethoven. Both took on an entirely new color by his playing of them; it seemed as if a flood of light was poured in to illuminate every smallest detail, and to set in right relationship and in beautifully fit conjunction the manifold complexities, both of thought and of execution, that make up the sum of an orchestral composition. Such a performance as that last evening causes even familiar works to seem much deeper and more significant of purpose than they did before, but at the same time it gains much of its artistic value by the clearness with which it sets that purpose forth. The elasticity of tempo is one of the most striking means used by Mr. Nikisch to gain his impressive effects. In the overture he made this particularly prominent in the slight accelerations with which he marked the approach to climax in several passages through the work, in the rubato effects with which he caressed the broad second theme first given out by the 'cellos, and in many other such touches more or less plainly given. All of which, added to the wonderfully sensitive modulation of dynamic effect, of light and shade, of "loud and soft," imparted an immense vigor and a certain picturesque, at times poetic, quality, that heightened and deepened the colors of this tonal picture to a vivid intensity.

But it was in the great symphony that Mr. Nikisch's power as an interpreter was most plainly shown. He drew out of it such a depth of meaning and set it forth with such a limitless command of resources in orchestral treatment as to make his performance as impressive as it was radically novel in many respects. It was, first and foremost, a magnificently dramatic exposition of the symphony, a quality which was pre-eminent throughout. The famous theme of four notes in the opening bars was given an immensely effective significance—indeed, like "fate knocking at the door"—by what might be called a ritard before the movement began, and by the pause upon the final note, as Wagner called it, "long and terrible." This first movement was played altogether with a splendid stress of passionate utterance that gave the fullest representation of its stormy character. More of the striking use of the tempo rubato came abundantly into Mr. Nikisch's reading of this as well as of the rest of the symphony, while especially notable in the whole of it was the extraordinary plastic elaboration of the thematic passages given to the various instruments, a fact to which was due much of the power and effectiveness of the performance. It is a principle of Mr. Nickish's artistic faith evidently that a melodious passage for the horns or the trombones, or the trumpets forms a necessary and integral part of the complex web of the symphony, and that the passages given to them should be uttered with as characteristic a tone-color as any other. The increase given to the virility and strength of the orchestra's playing by the vigor of the brass was noted at the last concert; the added effectiveness of it as more thoroughly filling out the melodic structure was especially shown in this. Especially fine in its effect of mystery was the scherzo, wonderfully delicate in execution, and breaking with unsurpassable grandeur into the allegro which closes the work.

The Glinka fantasie was not a very important addition to the programme, but an interesting one from the wealth of individual orchestral effect it shows. Its two themes are simply repeated and reiterated in every shape and fashion till the composer's command of contrapuntal embroidery has given out; and the ingenuity and knowledge displayed in the meanwhile are very wide in their range.

With all the arduous increase in the demands on expressive power the orchestra seems to have lost a trifle of that absolute perfection of ensemble, accuracy of attack and exquisite tonal blending, that has hitherto been its extraordinary distinction; or was it but a showing of the poor form that the most perfect of virtuosos are occasionally beset with? Not to speak of an annoying wrong note at a critical moment by a second bassoon, the wood-wind as a whole seemed to be a little uneven, and the brasses a bit slow in speaking.

Mr. Hekking, the 'cellist, was heard for the first time here, and displayed a technique of incomparable polish, and a warm and soulful tone; his selections were not such as to show his true position as an artist. Miss Meislinger sang the air from "The Prophet" with considerable dramatic vigor, and with a voice that seemed as if it might not be doing itself full justice. Her intonation was frequently faulty to an unpleasant degree. It was rather an imposition that Mr. Hekking's trifles should have the accompaniment of the orchestra, while Miss Meislinger's operatic air had to be content with the piano, however artistic and graceful was the playing of the unnamed accompanist. The audience at this concert showed a gratifying increase in numbers over that at the first, and its pleasure and interest in the evening's performance were frequently and warmly manifested.

[27]

Boston Daily Globe

...S IT WEAK.

The Only Symphonic Poem Composed by a Woman.

French-Irish Lady's Paris Success, the "Ode Triomphale."

Mme. Holmes' Work Lacks Character, But Has a Charming Hymn.

European papers have, for some time, been filled with the praises of Mme. Augusta Holmes of Paris, a French composer of Irish descent, whose works for some years past have been creating a great stir in the musical world. Her latest work is the "Ode Triomphale," a symphonic poem in celebration of the centenary of the French republic, this work being the first of its kind produced by a woman. The presentation of the "Ode Triomphale" was on a most magnificent scale.

Interesting details of the reception of the work are given by the new periodical, The Transatlantic, which has published several interesting articles on Augusta Holmes and her works, besides offering the "Hymn of Love," taken from the score of the "Ode Triomphale."

This paper, however, is not quite the first to introduce Augusta Holmes to American readers. About a year ago the Boston Pilot printed a letter from Paris, describing the performance of her symphony, "Ireland," at the concerts of M. Colonne, and telling of the deep impression it made on the writer, and his wonder that Herr Gericke did not bring it out in Music Hall. Thus there has been created a desire among all music-loving people to know more about this new composer and her works.

A reporter called yesterday on Herr Nikisch, the new director of the Symphony concerts, to ascertain, if possible, his opinion of Augusta Holmes and of the merits of her works. In response to a question, Herr Nikisch said:

"I have carefully gone through the score of the 'Ode Triomphale,' but I am unable to bestow on it the liberal praises of the French critics. I am afraid I must disappoint you.

It is Not Great Music at All.

Musically it is rather a weak work. Considered independently of the occasion for which it was composed, it is really of small value."

Herr Nikisch seemed to give his opinion sincerely and without prejudice.

"The 'Ode Triomphale,'" he continued, "is simply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first place in our preliminary review of tonight's concert, following as usual upon yesterday's rehearsal, shall be given to Mr. Arthur Foote's suite for strings, written during last summer and now receiving its first performance. It consists of only four movements, and it adheres to standard principles in their conformation—they being a prelude, a minuet, and air and a gavotte—although it deviates from the ancient fashion of adhering to a single key, and, while maintaining its nominal tonality of D major, uses for the second that of B-flat major, and for the third that of G-major. A further consistency has been secured by giving the prelude a single theme and reproducing this, in a slightly modified form, as one of the germs of the the gavotte. The work is more than worthy of Mr. Foote the sobriety of whose talent and the dignified and scholarly character of whose writing need no commendation at home and have won recognition abroad. The themes are of agreeable length, easily fixed in the mind, and their development is genial, large and free, many of the minor effects, of accent, accompaniment and subordinated figure being tasteful, ingenious and telling. That a work which must follow antique forms should catch something of the spirit of the past, is but natural, and the middle movements of this suite are inbred with the feeling of Bach—not in any imitative fashion, but in that just way which a student and admirer of that great composer may adopt with commendation rather than reproof. In the first movement near the beginning there is for a moment a little emptiness in the score, as if the first violins were drawing too far away from their fellows; but elsewhere the showing is compact and the leading part is well followed and sustained. The air is particularly large and warm in style and the little imitation with which the 'cello emphasizes the introduction of it, phrase by phrase, is very thoughtful and helpful. In the trio of the minuet may be noticed some nice writing for the solo cello and solo first violin, delightfully supported on a rippling muted accompaniment of the other strings. The playing yesterday was not equal to the best work of the orchestra; at times the first violins were cutting and shrill, and in the second movement there was a good deal of spotty playing, which not even Mr. Foote's quaint and irregular accentuation would justify. Miss Gertrude Edmands is the soloist, and her songs are the ballad of Raff—twelve stanzas long—"The Dream King and his Love," and Brahms's "Remembrance" and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

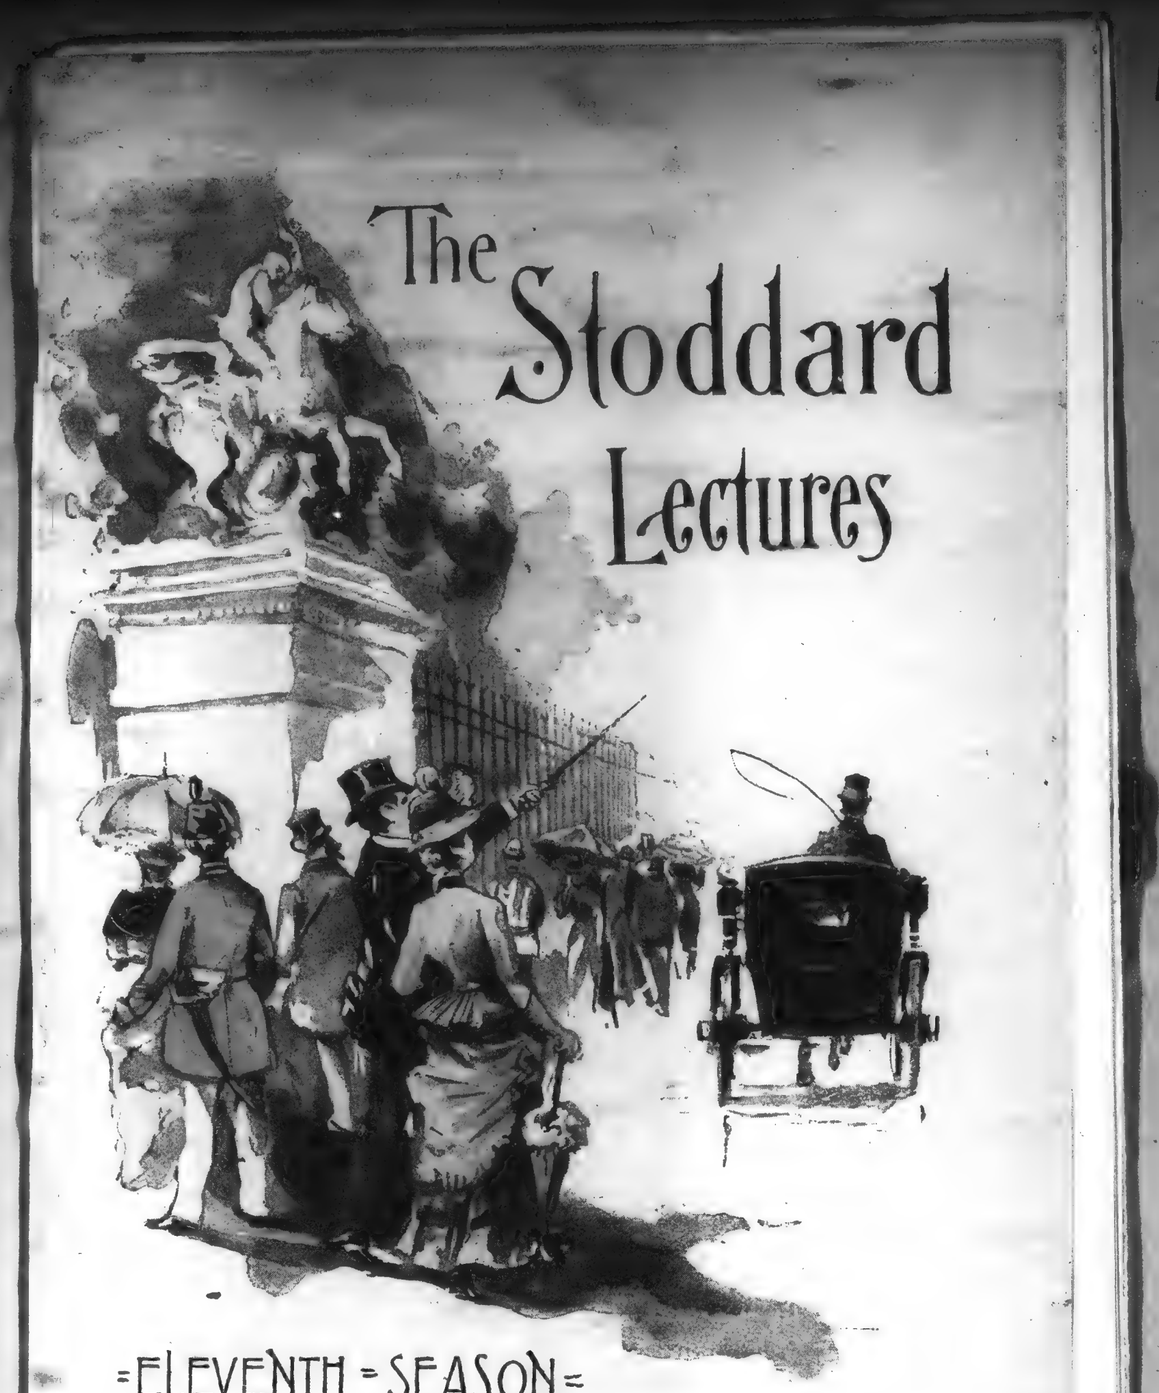
THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.



The Stoddard Lectures

=ELEVENTH=SEASON=

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantine; Allegro.—Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Boston Daily Globe

[illegible] NOVEMBER 22,

[illegible] FINDS IT WEAK.

The Only Symphonic Poem Composed by a Woman.

French-Irish Lady's Paris Success, the "Ode Triomphale."

Mme. Holmes' Work Lacks Character, But Has a Charming Hymn.

European papers have, for some time, been filled with the praises of Mme. Augusta Holmes of Paris, a French composer of Irish descent, whose works for some years past have been creating a great stir in the musical world. Her latest work is the "Ode Triomphale," a symphonic poem in celebration of the centenary of the French republic, this work being the first of its kind produced by a woman. The presentation of the "Ode Triomphale" was on a most magnificent scale.

Interesting details of the reception of the work are given by the new periodical, The Transatlantic, which has published several interesting articles on Augusta Holmes and her works, besides offering the "Hymn of Love," taken from the score of the "Ode Triomphale."

This paper, however, is not quite the first to introduce Augusta Holmes to American readers. About a year ago the Boston Pilot printed a letter from Paris, describing the performance of her symphony, "Ireland," at the concerts of M. Colonne, and telling of the deep impression it made on the writer, and his wonder that Herr Gericke did not bring it out in Music Hall. Thus there has been created a desire among all music-loving people to know more about this new composer and her works.

A reporter called yesterday on Herr Nikisch, the new director of the Symphony concerts, to ascertain, if possible, his opinion of Augusta Holmes and of the merits of her works. In response to a question, Herr Nikisch said:

"I have carefully gone through the score of the 'Ode Triomphale,' but I am unable to bestow on it the liberal praises of the French critics. I am afraid I must disappoint you.

It is Not Great Music at All.

Musically it is rather a weak work. Considered independently of the occasion for which it was composed, it is really of small value."

Herr Nikisch seemed to give his opinion sincerely and without prejudice.

"The 'Ode Triomphale,'" he continued, "is simply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first place in our preliminary review of tonight's concert, following as usual upon yesterday's rehearsal, shall be given to Mr. Arthur Foote's suite for strings, written during last summet and now receiving its first performance. It consists of only four movements, and it adheres to standard principles in their conformation—they being a prelude, a minuet, and air and a gavotte—althongh it deviates from the ancient fashion of adhering to a single kev, and, while maintaining its nominal tonality of D-major, uses for the second that of B-flat major, and for the third that of G-major. A further consistency has been secured by giving the prelude a single theme and reproducing this, in a slightly modified form, as one of the germs of the the gavotte. The work is more than worthy of Mr. Foote the sobriety of whose talent and the dignified and scnolarly character of whose writing need no commendation at home and have won recognition abroad. The themes are of agreeable length, easily fixed in the mind, and their development is genial, large and free, many of the minor effects, of accent, accompaniment and subordinated figure being tasteful, ingenious and telling. That a work which must follow antique forms should catch something of the spirit of the past, is but natural, and the middle movements of this suite are inbred with the feeling of Bach—not in any imitative fashion, but in that just way which a student and admirer of that great composer may adopt with commendation rather than reproof. In the first movement near the beginning there is for a moment a little emptiness in the score, as if the first violins were drawing too far away from their fell ws; but elsewhere the showing is compact and the leading part is well followed and sustained. The air is particularly large and warm in style and the little imitation with which the 'cello emphasizes the introduction of it, phrase by phrase, is very thoughtful and helpful. In the trio of the minuet may be noticed some nice writing for the solo cello and solo first violin, delightfully supported on a rippling muted accompainment of the other strings. The playing yesterday was not equal to the best work of the orchestra; at times the first violins were cutting and shrill, and in the second movement there was a good deal of spotty playing, which not even Mr. Foote's quaint and irregular accentuation would justify. Miss Gertrude Edmands is the soloist, and her songs are the ballad of Raff—twelve stanzas long—"The Dream King and his Love," and Brahms's "Remembrance" and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

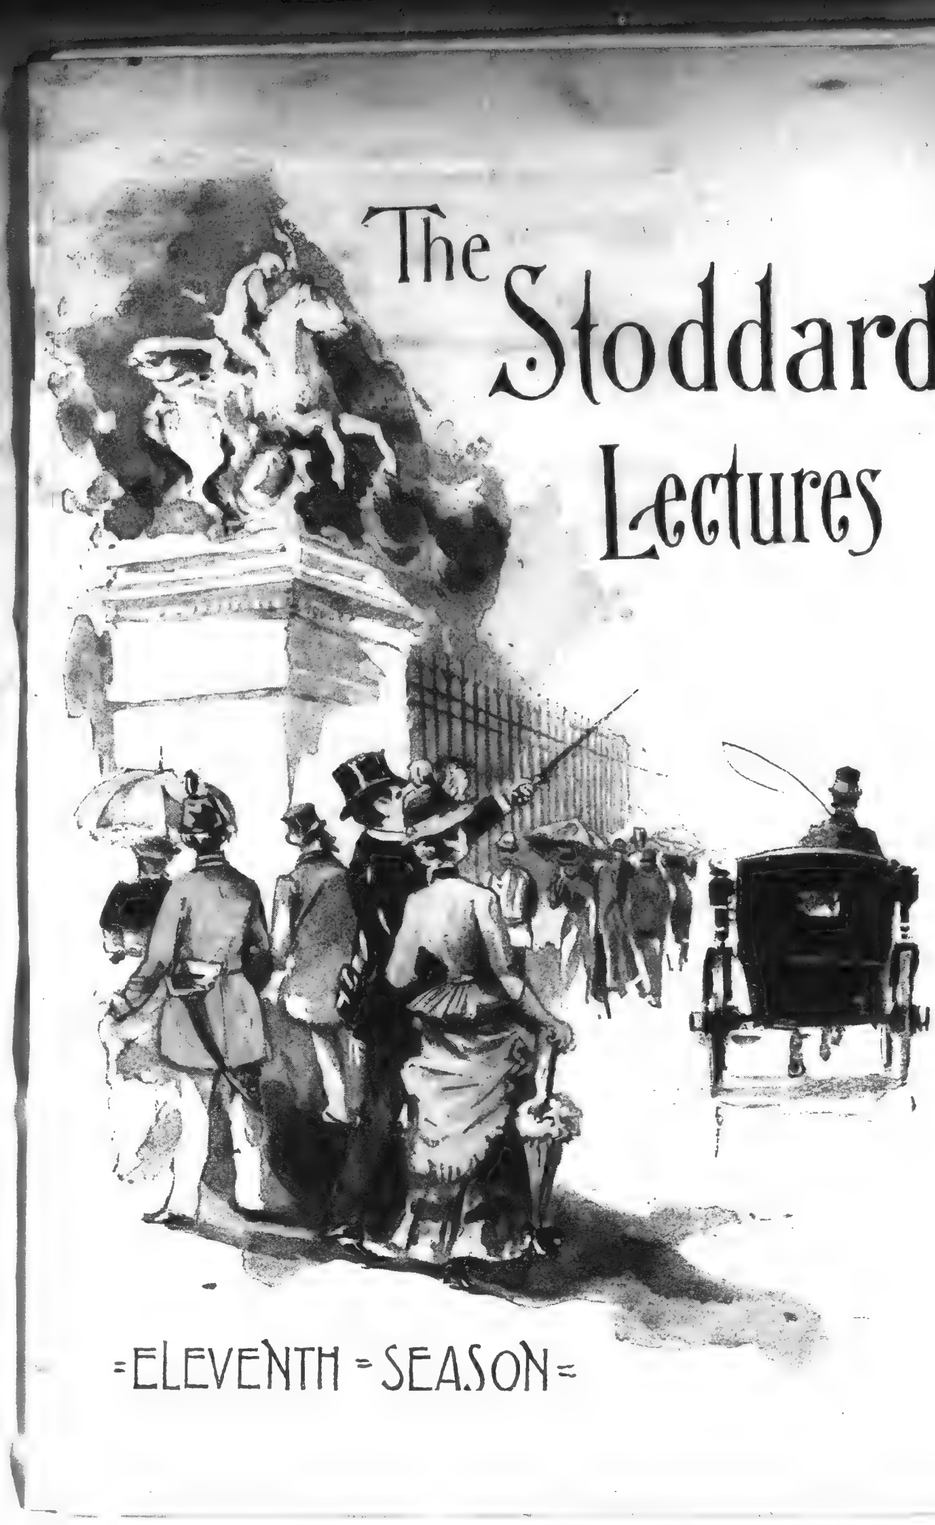
THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.



The Stoddard Lectures

=ELEVENTH=SEASON=

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "Lucia." . . . . DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.
MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from Ballet Music to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Boston Daily Globe

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

NIKISCH FINDS IT WEAK.

The Only Symphonic Poem Composed by a Woman.

French-Irish Lady's Paris Success, the "Ode Triomphale."

Mme. Holmes' Work Lacks Character, But Has a Charming Hymn.

European papers have, for some time, been filled with the praises of Mme. Augusta Holmes of Paris, a French composer of Irish descent, whose works for some years past have been creating a great stir in the musical world. Her latest work is the "Ode Triomphale," a symphonic poem in celebration of the centenary of the French republic, this work being the first of its kind produced by a woman. The presentation of the "Ode Triomphale" was on a most magnificent scale.

Interesting details of the reception of the work are given by the new periodical, The Transatlantic, which has published several interesting articles on Augusta Holmes and her works, besides offering the "Hymn of Love," taken from the score of the "Ode Triomphale."

This paper, however, is not quite the first to introduce Augusta Holmes to American readers. About a year ago the Boston Pilot printed a letter from Paris, describing the performance of her symphony, "Ireland," at the concerts of M. Colonne, and telling of the deep impression it made on the writer, and his wonder that Herr Gericke did not bring it out in Music Hall. Thus there has been created a desire among all music-loving people to know more about this new composer and her works.

A reporter called yesterday on Herr Nikisch, the new director of the Symphony concerts, to ascertain, if possible, his opinion of Augusta Holmes and of the merits of her works. In response to a question, Herr Nikisch said:

"I have carefully gone through the score of the 'Ode Triomphale,' but I am unable to bestow on it the liberal praises of the French critics. I am afraid I must disappoint you.

It is Not Great Music at All.

Musically it is rather a weak work. Considered independently of the occasion for which it was composed, it is really of small value."

Herr Nikisch seemed to give his opinion sincerely and without prejudice.

"The 'Ode Triomphale,'" he continued, "is simply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first place in our preliminary review of tonight's concert, following as usual upon yesterday's rehearsal, shall be given to Mr. Arthur Foote's suite for strings, written during last summet and now receiving its first performance. It consists of only four movements, and it adheres to standard principles in their conformation—they being a prelude, a minuet, and air and a gavotte—although it deviates from the ancient fashion of adhering to a single key, and, while maintaining its nominal tonality of D major, uses for the second that of B-flat major, and for the third that of G-major. A further consistency has been secured by giving the prelude a single theme and reproducing this, in a slightly modified form, as one of the germs of the the gavotte. The work is more than worthy of Mr. Foote the sobriety of whose talent and the dignified and scholarly character of whose writing need no commendation at home and have won recognition abroad. The themes are of agreeable length, easily fixed in the mind, and their development is genial, large and free, many of the minor effects, of accent, accompaniment and subordinated figure being tasteful, ingenious and telling. That a work which must follow antique forms should catch something of the spirit of the past, is but natural, and the middle movements of this suite are inbred with the feeling of Bach—not in any imitative fashion, but in that just way which a student and admirer of that great composer may adopt with commendation rather than reproof. In the first movement near the beginning there is for a moment a little emptiness in the score, as if the first violins were drawing too far away from their fellows; but elsewhere the showing is compact and the leading part is well followed and sustained. The air is particularly large and warm in style and the little imitation with which the 'cello emphasizes the introduction of it, phrase by phrase, is very thoughtful and helpful. In the trio of the minuet may be noticed some nice writing for the solo cello and solo first violin, delightfully supported on a rippling muted accompainment of the other strings. The playing yesterday was not equal to the best work of the orchestra; at times the first violins were cutting and shrill, and in the second movement there was a good deal of spotty playing, which not even Mr. Foote's quaint and irregular accentuation would justify. Miss Gertrude Edmands is the soloist, and her songs are the ballad of Raff—twelve stanzas long—"The Dream King and his Love," and Brahms's "Remembrance" and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

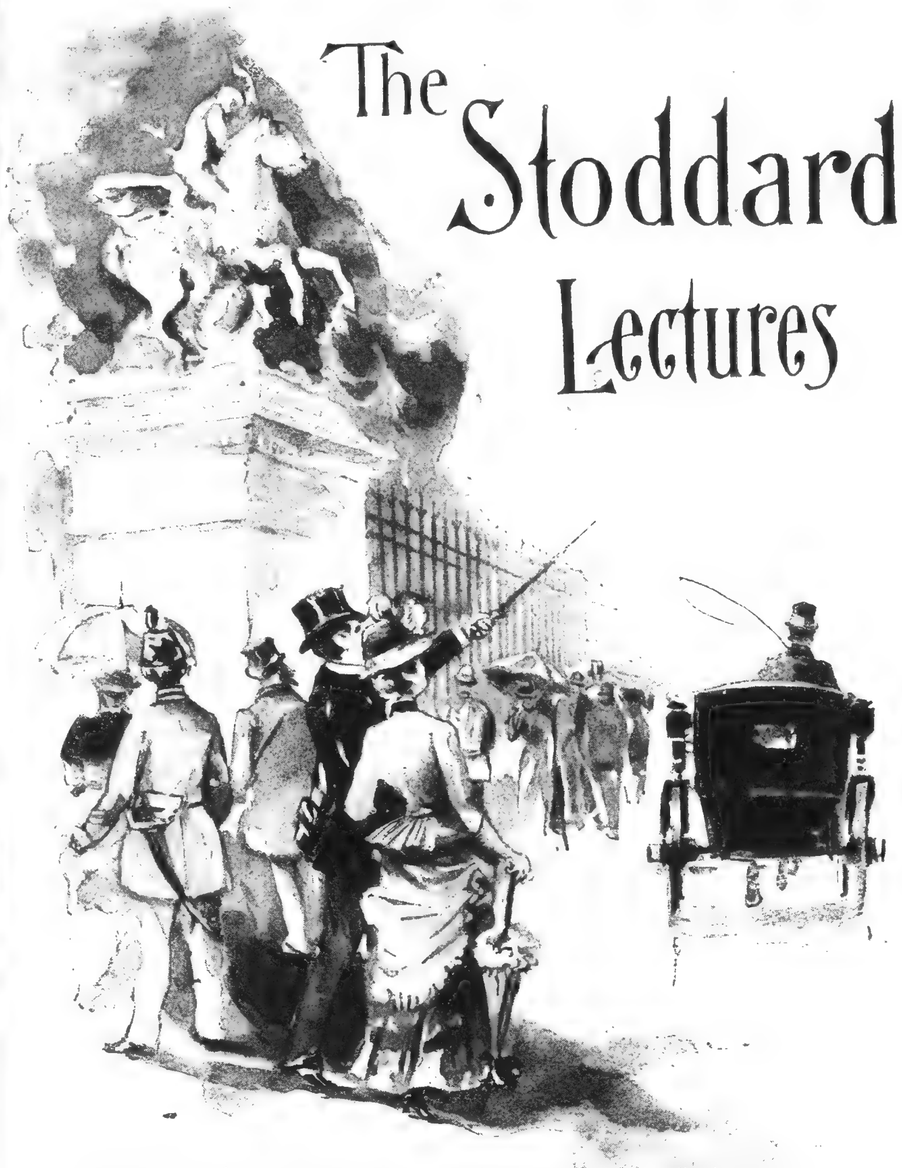
THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.



The Stoddard Lectures

=ELEVENTH= SEASON =

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "Lucia." . . . . DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Molé.
MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from Ballet Music to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

CASTLE-BORDERED RHINE.
NAPOLEON:
From Corsica to the Throne.
NAPOLEON:
From the Throne to St. Helena.
BERLIN.
SWITZERLAND.

...prophet.
"The 'Ode Triomphale,'" he continued, "is simply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and care in study. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and his Love," and Brahms's Reminiscences and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . . DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.
MISS STEWART.

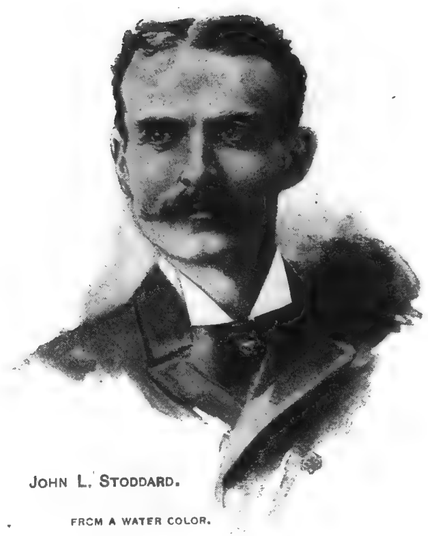
ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.



JOHN L. STODDARD.

FROM A WATER COLOR.

...Comtesse," he continued, "is simply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-ications and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-composition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time.

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano, Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

PRESS OF
The
AMERICAN BANK NOTE CO.
NEW YORK
29164

A NEW DECADE!

The Stoddard Lectures.

SEASON OF 1889–90.

It is with a feeling of, perhaps, pardonable pride, that JOHN L. STODDARD looks back upon the record of his tenth year as a public lecturer. It was something to have retained his popularity during so long a time. It was matter for self-congratulation that he was able to speak to audiences larger than ever before, and he finds it very pleasant to look back upon the expressions of public appreciation and satisfaction scattered like milestones along his path.

But now his thought is of the future. A new decade is to be entered upon. What to say to the expectant and enthusiastic public that, according to all past experience, he may reasonably count upon as his hearers for the season of 1889–90? The world of travel offers so much to see—the world of literature and history so much to think

...is simply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the wine-growers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massmotions and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-Komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and care in study. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.
MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantine; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

of! Thoughtfully considering thus what should be his themes for the coming season—his map of Europe and his many note-books of accomplished travel before him, and the printed record of man's achievement arranged around his library walls—Mr. Stoddard has reached the decision which these pages imperfectly announce.

Benoit & Stoddard.

Castle-Bordered Rhine.

Among the experiences of the tourist what equal distance of travel is more filled with romantic anticipation, or, when realized, leaves higher satisfaction in the memory than a trip along the Rhine? From countless tiny rivulets fed by far-off glaciers, buried in the waters of beautiful Lake Constance, and again emerging to leap and boil over the picturesque falls at Schaffhausen, the noble river continually expands in volume, until at Mayence one may embark on the commodious steamer and glide between its banks. Gathered in little knots about the deck, the travelers cry out with

...he continued, "is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and care-industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave."	MENDELSSOHN
ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA."	DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.
MISS STEWART.
ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde."	SCHUBERT
NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY.	SVENDSEN
LULLABY.	SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.
SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23.	VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

delight as each turn in the river reveals a new beauty—here a hoary castle mounted high in air, there a lovely village nestling on the water's edge. Tradition invests with living interest the craggy heights of the Loreli, on whose rocks one half expects to see the form of the weird enchantress, or the mouse-tower of the legend, whose rocky island it requires but faint imagination to people with myriads of mice escaping after their destruction of the unhappy bishop. Modern history has its memories when "fair Bingen on the Rhine" is reached, or when, as a bend in the river is passed, the stately monument of Niederwald is revealed. Each moss-covered ruin is eloquent of a glory born of the time when chivalrous knights performed valiant deeds and fair ladies graced splendid tournaments, while royalty of the present day rears its gorgeous castles at Rheinstein and Stoltzenfels.

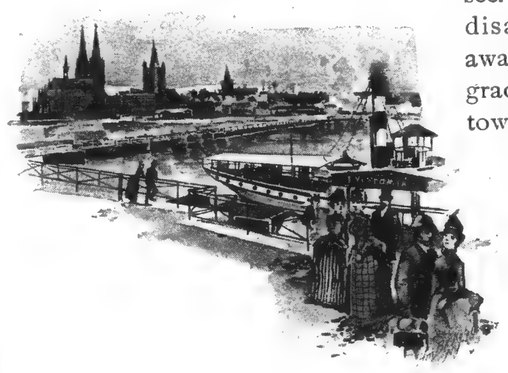
As day wanes the tourist reaches Cologne, half fearing to look toward the famous Cathedral, whose majestic proportions he has for half a lifetime hoped to see. Happily no disappointment awaits him. The graceful, stately towers seem to keep watch and ward over the busy town below, and, as it were,



is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the French-men attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "Lucia." . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from Ballet Music to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

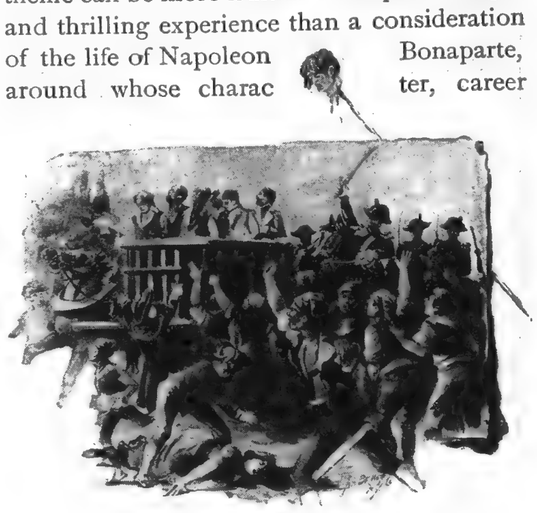
extend to the river a benediction, and commiseration that it is so soon to lose itself ingloriously in the oozing tides of Holland. In the quiet of the evening, at the "Hotel du Nord," the busy fingers of the happy tourists write the record of a day crowded as never before with experiences both unique and delightful.

≈ ◎ ≈

Napoleon Bonaparte:

FROM CORSICA TO THE THRONE.

Invoking now the muse of history, what theme can be more fruitful of helpful thought and thrilling experience than a consideration of the life of Napoleon Bonaparte, around whose charac ter, career



[27]

...is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massulations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was accident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far has not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLÉ.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

and position in history fresh interest and widespread controversy have so lately been awakened? For a proper study of this remarkable man one must first be transported to the seething tumult of the dread Reign of Terror. The executioner's cart with its fresh victims on the way to the guillotine —the jeering crowd—the terrified Assembly—all these had become daily sights in Paris, when a young officer, pointing his cannon at the steps of Saint Roche church, as Carlyle has it, "blew the revolution into space." Quickly summoned to other fields, this masterful hero, at the head of scantily clothed and wretchedly equipped soldiers, entered upon his marvelous conquest of Italy from the hands of the Austrians. Then, with restless spirit he flew to Egypt, from whose imposing Pyramids forty centuries looked down, astonished at his prowess.

But, meanwhile, the seeds that envy and detraction are ever busy sowing having taken root at home and brought forth a crop of enemies—grave disasters are foreshadowed by the dispatches that have with difficulty reached him. Trusting his star of fortune he returned, eluding the nimblest vigilance of the English fleet. Once more in France he went straight to Paris, enthusiastically welcomed by the Nation.

is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-Komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and care and industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "Lucia." . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from Ballet Music to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

And now he will have no more trifling with weak men and divided powers. The fruits of victory, though won with swift assurance and apparent ease, must not be held with uncertain grasp. Power unfettered, universal power over all his country, will alone comport with the ambition of him whom the amazed world must now recognize as Napoleon I.—Emperor of France!

Napoleon Bonaparte:

FROM THE THRONE TO ST. HELENA.

[The story of this wonderful career is too tremendous for the limits of a single evening. Scant justice only can be done to it by the division which takes up on a second evening the recital ended at the coronation.]

Napoleon, invested with the imperial purple and become the idol of his countrymen, was able for the while to doff the habilisimply 'eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine the wine growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massy relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-composition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Rubinstein's 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic work ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and assiduity. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave."	MENDELSSOHN
ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA."	DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.
MISS STEWART.
ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde."	SCHUBERT
NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY.	SVENDSEN
LULLABY.	SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.
SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23.	VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

ments of war. For a brief time he held splendid court, with dazzling ceremonial. Then, in the progress of events, he found himself again called upon to take the field. Austria had invoked the whirlwind and straightway Vienna must needs fall. No one could cross this later Cæsar's path with impunity. In vain the valor of the Prussians; in vain the heroism of beautiful Queen Louisa, the idol of her suffering people. Berlin soon passed under the con-queror's yoke, and the Emperor, at the dizziest height of all his glory, returned to France for a brief interval of rest. But now not even the glamour of martial heroism can drive from the vision the darkening cloud. Napoleon has determined that he must consort with kings! The gentle, loving Josephine, banished to the shades of Malmaison, has taken out of her husband's life the little tenderness it ever knew. Intoxicated with success he believes himself the child of conquering fate — a very demi-god. Far-off Russia has defied his power and he does not hesitate to invade her. But here he meets with more than human foes. The Russians is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the wine-growers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic work ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN.

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantine; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

have "borrowed the strength of the elements" and are at last the mightier. For the first time in his swift-moving career retreat must be sounded. The driving snows, packing and freezing around the unfortunate soldiers, leave scarce a body-guard of the great host which marched forth to the invasion. Disaster follows disaster. Though new levies are made, obliging France to "rob the cradle and the grave," combined Europe is now too much even for Napoleon. From Elba and Waterloo destiny hurries him relentlessly to the Bellerophon and the Lonely grave at St. Helena.

Berlin.

Resuming the course of European travel interrupted by the absorbing study of the life of Napoleon, it is not strange that the story of his wonderful achievements lingers in the memory, and that the scenes of his triumphs are constantly in our thoughts. It is, therefore, by an entirely natural process that those thoughts are directed towards Berlin—to-day the splendid capital of proud United Germany, but less than a hundred years ago the prey of the French conqueror, who marched his legions through the old Brandenburg gate, and for a long time sub-

is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massrelations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheitskomposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and care in study. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantine; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

jected the Prussians to the humiliation of seeing their enemies bivouac in its streets. Impressed with its necessity by bitter experience Prussia turned all its thoughts to the perfection of its army, so that it is now par eminence a military nation and Berlin a military city. Yet not altogether so. Away back, under the reign of Fredcrick I., in the dawn of the eighteenth century, the seeds of learning were planted, and from that day have been assiduously cultivated. Berlin now contains a host of interesting objects besides those incident to war. The river Spree, though not in itself a remarkable stream, divides and diversifies the city, and can claim to benefit it by a commerce rivalling that of the Rhine. Royal palaces with their impressive souvenirs of the late Emperors William and Frederick, are scarcely more prominent than the buildings of the University where are gathered sober men representing the flower of human mental attainment, guiding thousands of youth assembled there from all Europe and from beyond the sea, eager in the pursuit of knowledge. At every turn one meets the soldier, rigid with discipline and armed for action; but close in his footsteps follows the student engaged in pursuing is simply eine Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massdelations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far has not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantine; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

the arts of peace. Noble temples dedicated to art, to science, to industry and to music attest the cultivation of the great German metropolis. The tourist in search of celebrities glances with interest at the palace of Bismarck, or, strolling through the lovely Thiergarten, looks to right and left, hoping to meet grim old Von Moltke on his daily promenade. Then a short journey from Berlin brings one to its historic suburb Potsdam, its fine royal residences and its enchanting villa "Sans Souci;" the latter, as the home of Frederick the Great, vividly recalling memories of that imperious sovereign and soldier. Under felicitous circumstances indeed may one make the journey to and about Berlin when guided by Mr. Stoddard, who, through frequent visits and a somewhat protracted residence there, has acquired a thorough personal acquaintance with the city and its surroundings.

Switzerland.

FROM the stately architecture and artificial life of the German capital it is a most welcome transition to the open skies and pure air of Switzerland. Who that has ever visited this enchanted land has

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the wine-growers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massrelations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and her industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave."	MENDELSSOHN
ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA."	DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.
MISS STEWART.
ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde."	SCHUBERT
NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY.	SVENDSEN
LULLABY.	SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.
SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23.	VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

not felt a pang when the hour of departure has arrived? Sights and sounds most unfamiliar here carry the tourist far away from his usual daily life and experiences. Avoiding always the prosaic railway, one may journey here by dint of strength of limb, and aided by the sturdy alpenstock, be-ribboned, and carved along its length with the record of arduous ascents; or, if less vigorous, may mount the patient mule and be shaken up over the rocky and tortuous path, expecting at every turn to be projected by an unlucky stumble over the animal's head and dropped hundreds of feet below. Caught in the upper clouds, it may be, shut out from vision, one may be beguiled by the murmur of distant cataract or the plaintive yoedel of hidden shepherds. It is difficult to say where the wanderer is happiest and most interested—in the charming valleys, filled with quaint villages and homely folk, where he may gaze wistfully at the towering snow-clad peaks all around, or high on the mountain slopes dotted with white churches or the humble dwellings shared by man and beast, from his vantage surveying the tiny world spread out below. Fellow tourists meet en route or at the table d'hote and exchange with each other the story of ascents made, of dangers braved. The Swiss maidens, clad in characteristic dress, seated by the roadside, deftly weave the snowy lace. Lingering ever in the memory will be visions of the mighty Matterhorn, the majestic Mont Blanc, or the lovely Jungfrau, its snowy summit

...ssary and Gelegenheits komposition in optima forma,' that is, a composition gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

"Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its massy...tions and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was accident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time."

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic poem ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far had not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give one. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and sure industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

and "The Little Dustman." The orchestration of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . DONIZETTI

Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.

MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN

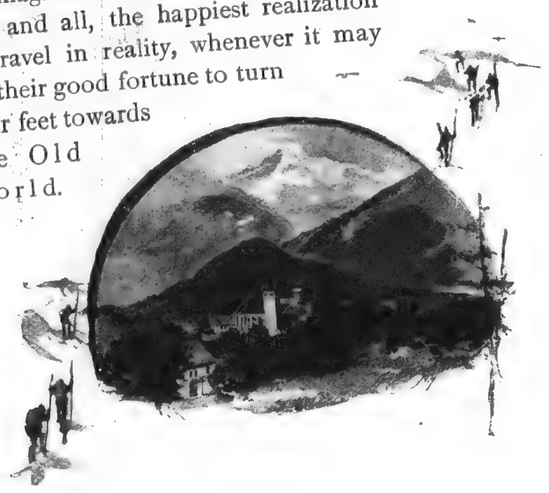
MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . VOLKMANN

Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

rose-tinted in the sunset glow. No fairer souvenir of happy hours spent in Europe could be desired than those with which, from his own vividly recalled experience, Mr. Stoddard closes his evenings of travel in imagination, while wishing his hearers, one and all, the happiest realization of travel in reality, whenever it may be their good fortune to turn their feet towards the Old World.



...gotten up for a special occasion in the best manner. That is the most I can say for it. Its invention is simple, if not trivial. Just look at these choruses of the winegrowers and harvesters, of the soldiers and sailors and laborers, and of the youths and maidens. They are musically not sufficiently distinct from one another; they are too much alike, too monotonous; they are not characteristic of the various groups rendering them.

Only compare with these choruses, for instance, the chorus of the wine-growers, in 'Mendelssohn's 'Lorelei,' or the chorus of the harvesters, in the 'Prometheus' of Liszt. When you hear these, you imagine wine-growers and harvesters rising before your mind. The music is here fitted to the characters. Not so in the choruses in the 'Ode Triomphale.' The powerful effect of this symphonic poem cannot be ascribed to the charm and depth of its music, for these it lacks; it is wholly due to its mass-relations and spectacular accessories. Imagine 2000 persons participating in its rendering, all the scenic display brought to bear, and the patriotic mood of the Frenchmen attending the performance—why, it must exercise a powerful effect, it cannot but move the audience tremendously."

To the question whether the comparative weakness of the "Ode Triomphale" was incident to its being "eine Gelegenheits-komposition," Herr Nikisch replied:

"No. A work gotten up for an occasion need not be a weak work. Only think of Brahms' 'Triumphlied,' or Wagner's 'Kaisermarsch,' celebrating the rise of the new German empire. They, too, were composed for a special occasion, but their music makes them

Works for all Time.

"The 'Hymn of Love,' from the 'Ode Triomphale,'" continued Mr. Nikisch, "is relatively the strongest piece in the score. It is even very charming, though there is nothing extraordinary about it."

And here Herr Nikisch had the goodness to render its melody to the reporter.

The "Ode Triumphal" having been described as the first and only symphonic work ever composed by a woman, Herr Nikisch was asked for his opinion of the creative capacity of woman in the realm of music. His reply was that woman so far has not produced anything that could fairly be compared with the works of the great composers. And as to what she promised for the future in this respect, he could not say.

"Woman's highest achievement hitherto," said he, "has lain in the execution of the works of the great masters. She has distinguished herself mainly in the domain of chamber music. But even here her achievements are only relatively great. This is not only my opinion; it is the deliberate judgment of all those competent to give such. What accomplishments woman has achieved in this direction have been due to her extraordinary conscientiousness and rare industry. The woman who so far, according to my opinion, has produced the highest musical work is Miss Ethel Smythe, a young English lady, who made her studies in Leipzig."

...tion of the Raff song is dainty enough and pleasing, but the general effect is monotonous and can only be relieved by a singer of a more elastic and elegant style and a quicker fancy than Miss Edmands, whose earnestness and care are not sufficient in such a case. And yet again the tessitura is too high for her, and her voice does not therefore flow freely and easily in it. The songs with piano, especially the latter, were much more gratefully received; but even in these the tremolando into which Miss Edmands seems to be falling and the concomitant lack of sustained smoothness militated against the best results, and her indistinct articulation left the listener long in doubt as to what language she was using. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture begins the concert, and it was played well upon the whole yesterday afternoon, although the first entrance of the horns was too vociferous and in some later phrases the brasses were rough and course. The Symphony is Beethoven's Eighth, and there will be no end of curiosity to see if Mr. Nikisch treats it with as much independence as he did the Fifth; beginning as it did, pretty late in the afternoon, we can give no hint of what may be expected.

The next programme is Brahms' third symphony, Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture, to be played in that order.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1889

THE SYMPHONIES.

SEVENTH CONCERT.

Here is the programme of last evening: Schumann, overture "Genoveva;" Raff, "The Dream King and his Love"; A. Foote, Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21, Prelude, Minuetto, Air and Gavotte; songs with piano—Brahms—"Remembrance," "The Little Dustman."

Both the overture and symphony received very objective treatment. The selection of the Raff song by Miss Edmands was ill-advised, as the monotonous, colorless, prolixity of the work is its most characteristic feature. It was, however, very ably rendered, albeit without as much tone coloring as the artist might have been expected to bestow. Her voice was at its sympathetic best, and with more volume than usual, for it amply filled the hall.

Mr. Foote's suite is written in the able and scholarly style for which the composer is noted. Its most interesting part is the minuetto. The finale is strictly gavottal in character, if one excepts its superfluous coda, and forms a very appropriate ending to a charmingly well-written suite. Both Miss Edmands and Mr. Foote received rapturous applause.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1889-90.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

(60 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

SOLOIST:

MISS ROSE STEWART.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave." . . . . MENDELSSOHN

ARIA. Mad Scene from "LUCIA." . . . . . DONIZETTI
Flute Obligato by MONS. CHAS. MOLE.
MISS STEWART.

ENTR' ACTE from BALLET MUSIC to "Rosamunde." . SCHUBERT

NORWEGIAN RHAPSODY. . . . . SVENDSEN

LULLABY. . . . . SULLIVAN
MISS STEWART.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat, op. 23. . . . . VOLKMANN
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—Andantino; Allegro.—
Allegro vivace.—Più mosso; Presto.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1889

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Cherubini.....Overture, "Anacreon."
Eckert.....Violoncello concerto, op. 26.
Mr. Schulz.
Svendsen.....Norwegian Rhapsody No. 2, op. 19
Bruch.....
......"Kol Nidrei"
Mr. Schulz.
Goetz.....Symphony in F.

Though each of the above numbers would separately have been welcome, huddled together they awoke feelings of depression and gloom. In the making up of the program there was no attention paid to contrast or effect. There were Cossack and Norwegian and Hebrew melodies, nearly all of them deeply tinged with melancholy. The symphony bore this motto from Schiller:

In the heart's still, sacred chambers
Is the refuge from the stress of strife.

The instrumentation of the rhapsody, original as it was, was neither warm nor gorgeous. There was not one bit of bright color in the musical sky: all was cold and grey.

Mr. Nikisch as a maker of programs is a disappointment. It appears that although in certain respects he may be an innovator, a révolutionnaire, in the matter of personal taste as seen in the selections made for the first seven concerts of this season, he is a narrow, one sided man. He seems to forget that he is no longer in Leipsic; he seems to think that in music the Germans are the chosen people of God. It is true he has brought out a composition by Glinka the Russian; but it was written forty years ago and Glinka had studied in Germany. It is true he has given a rhapsody by Svendsen the Norwegian; but Svendsen was for four years a pupil at the once famous Leipsic conservatory. It is true he has played an overture by Cherubini, who was called by the Italians a "French composer," who was accused by the French of "German proclivities." Stop,—the name of Hector Berlioz does appear upon a program; but where and how? It may be found upon the little program of a "Young People's Popular" as the arranger for orchestra of a German waltz.

Now the people who attend the symphonic concerts wish to hear that which is good and beautiful in music without regard to nationality. There are few who go solely for the purpose of educating themselves; and the men and women who, unable to pay the prices asked for the seats, show their honest love of music by standing for two hours, certainly have no desire of attending a sectarian school. In other words, no one wishes to be "germanized" or bored.

It is hard for this generation with its ideas of "dramatic writing," "local color," "phrases accompanying the characters," etc., etc., to believe that the sober and staid overture which was the first number of a program fit for a day set apart for National humiliation and prayer, was written for an opera called "Anacréon ou l'amour fugitif." The Anacreon of Cherubini now wears a wig; long ago did he lay aside the garlands of roses; no longer does he sing the praises of young girls and old wine. The music is noble and austere and cold. There is not one drop of blood; and as in nearly all of Cherubini's work for the stage, there is but little melody. This opera failed miserably; its libretto was so poor that at the first performance in 1803 it was hissed, the first instance of such open and violent disapproval in the history of the Paris opera.

The Svendsen Rhapsody is an ably written work, clear and musicianly in thematic construction, and there are some novel effects of instrumention. It is not brilliant in coloring; it does not glow, it does not dazzle, as a rhapsody of Lalo or Liszt. It is of the North. Its pulse beats slowly and calmly; there is no fevered frenzy.

The two most important works [illegible]n Goetz, who died at an early age, are an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and the symphony which was given last week. The opera is exceedingly well written, but it shows that Goetz was inclined to conceal his lack of spontaneous melody by over-elaboration; he had no aptitude for treating comedy-subjects in a sparkling or graceful manner; only when the deeper emotions of his characters were aroused, did he show true dramatic power. In the symphony he is terribly in earnest; and he has so much to say and he is so anxious to emphasize what he says, that his speech becomes too often thick and confused. The first movement is particularly open to this reproach; the second, though it abounds in charming passages, suffers from a need of condensation. The adagio is very beautiful and is in conception and treatment the finest part of the symphony. The last movement is perhaps the weakest and least original.

The soloist was Mr. Leo Schulz, who played Eckert's violoncello concerto and Bruch's "Kol Nidrei." Mr. Schulz's playing is characterized by musicianly phrasing and great refinement. His technique is good; his tone is small and at times thin. The concerto of Eckert is a work of merit, though the first movement is so somber that it approaches dangerously near stupidity. The Bruch composition is founded upon an old Hebrew chant full of pathos and dignity. It is dedicated to Hausmann of the Joachim quartet; he used to play it absolutely without expression; as though it were a tedious exercise. Mr. Schulz displayed much more taste; but for its proper effect, this chant demands the noble breadth and heart-rending tone of Cornélis Liégeois, who in '82–83 (in company with M. Molé the flute virtuoso) was with Bilse's orchestra in Berlin, and three years ago was with Lamoureux in Paris.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night.

The Boston musician was well recognized in the concert of last Saturday. A resident vocalist was the soloist and a Boston composer furnished the one novelty of the programme. The concert as a whole was rather agreeable than great, yet it held the interested attention of the audience in almost every number. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture began the programme, and was given a broad enough rendering. The advantage of having the brasses seated together was made evident by the increased solidity of tone gained in this work, but in the other departments there was not as perfect unity, for at times the woodwind was a trifle behind the strings and vice versa. It is just in this matter of details that Mr. Nikisch does not altogether attain the ideal that Bostonians have been accustomed to. He soars where his predecessor plodded, and the result is a more poetic reading but less perfect technique.

The Beethoven symphony—the spirited and playful eighth—lent itself well to the broad strokes which are characteristic of Mr. Nikisch's readings. The abrupt contrasts, the wild hilarity, the exuberant flow of animal spirits, were all present in an inspiriting degree, and the pretty ritardando in the second theme of the first movement was given with perfect ensemble. The allegretto was taken a little slow for a scherzando, but all its points of brusque contrast were sharply defined, and the impatient end, a most absolutes non sequitur, was effectively rendered, as were also the comical parodies of the chief figure.

The minuet was not entirely perfect in its ensemble, but the horn passage in its trio was most artistically played. The bassoon may be said to have been Beethoven's favorite instrument among the humbler members of the orchestral family, and whenever he was in a pleasant mood we are sure to find this instrument coming into prominence, and as he is in his most joking vein in this symphony the bassoon has more than ordinary prominence. Mr. Gunzel deserves praise for the manner in which this instrument was used, as does also Mr. Dietsch. The last movement was especially bright and dashing, and the leap of the three noted figure from the garret to the cellar of the orchestra, that is from flutes to contra basses, was forcibly and humorously given. The odd figure in octaves which Beethoven gave to the drums, (another instrument of which he made playful use) could have been played more clearly. The C sharp also, which interrupts the flow of the prattling chief theme, could have had more power, for in such a sudden modulation as this skip from C to C sharp, no amount of force would have been misplaced. Spite of the fact that the ensemble had a few technical faults, the abrupt transitions were in the main well done, and the true spirit of Beethoven was in the interpretation.

Mr. Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra was an unequal work. No one dare question Mr. Foote's learning, but the question may sometimes arise whether some of the things he says so fluently are worth saying at all. The prelude was an instance of this. Perfectly expressed in all of its parts, in symmetrical and classical form, it yet left no original or powerful impression on the critical mind, and one felt like repeating the well-known remark of the Frenchman, who, on hearing a certain new but flavorless work, exclaimed, Ce sonate, que me veut-il? In smooth and flowing counterpoint Mr. Foote is at his best; in expressive and romantic melody at his worst, and it was this fact which made the Cello solo of the trio of the minuet less attractive than the rest of that movement. On the other hand the "air" was a really masterly movement, possessing the true flavor of Bach in every measure, and evincing a knowledge of the old school of which anybody might be proud. Although the suite dealt in the old dance forms, it did not bind itself to the old succession of movements, but gave them in a free order and with changes of key that Bach did not use save sometimes in the partita. The gavotte did not stray from the true style of the ancient dance, as nine tenths of the modern gavottes do but began properly on the third beat, and had the syncopations which were characteristic of this dance of the city of Gap. The musette, however, could have made more of the "drone bass" which gave it its rustic character. The end was quite broad and dignified and the audience gave an ovation to the composer.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the vocalist. She was never in better voice and sang with most sympathetic expression. Her first number was "The Dream-King," a bit of modern ecstacy with a finely developed accompaniment. The singer gave it with exquisite taste, although her pronunciation of German was a trifle obscure. I liked her better in Brahms' "The Dustman," a simple and unaffected slumber song, which she gave with just the proper pathos. Her voice has decidedly gained in fullness in the last year and the promises which it held forth in the past are very likely to be fulfilled. Next Saturday we are to have an ultra classical programme of the modern school (for one may rank Brahms, Liszt and Wagner with the classics nowadays) which may rouse the discordant protests of those who long for the fleshpots of Egypt in the shape of rhythmic jingles and dance-tunes.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1889.

[28]

best renditions.

SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In November, 1852, when Henriette Sontag gave her first concerts in Boston, in the old Melodeon, and the Music Hall,—so newly opened that people went partly to see the place.—her conductor was Carl Eckert. Not only did he direct the overtures and orchestral accompaniments, but I remember particularly his delightful piano accompaniment when she sang Sweet Home. Eckert was much of a wanderer, led orchestras in many cities and died in 1879, nearly sixty years old, without having fulfilled the hopes of his early teacher, Mendelssohn; yet he wrote three operas, an oratorio and other music of various sorts. One concerto is said to be his only composition which retains its public place; and this work was one of the novelties given us by Mr. Nikisch at the Sixth Symphony Concert, Nov. 16, a Violoncello Concerto in A-minor, op. 26, played by Leo Schultz and the orchestra. Though an excellent player, Mr. Schultz did not surpass his predecessors in the same line; nor did the Concerto wake us up till it reached the Cosaque Dances, which constitute the final Rondo, and give so much life both for orchestra and soloist.

Another "first time" in our city was a composition by Max Bruch, founded upon an adagio called Kol Nidrei, sung in the Jewish synagogues on the Day of Atonement, and written for orchestra, cello and harp.

Goetz's Symphony in F, though given in Boston in 1880 and 1887, was almost a novelty. Departing from the usual order, the variegated slow movement comes third, leaving the second place for the Intermezzo, that most beautiful part of the Symphony, with its breathing of the wind through the trees, a delightful contrast to the fire of the concluding Allegro, grandly worked up by the conductor. What a pity that Goetz's early death a dozen years ago, at the early age of thirty-six, should have shut off the world's enjoyment of more such symphonies!

Cherubini's Anacreon Overture opened the concert,—an old favorite; but Svendsen's Norwegian Rhapsody No. 2, op. 19, though played a few seasons ago by the Orchestral Club, was new with the Symphony Orchestra, who gave a beautiful interpretation of the national melodies which furnish its groundwork.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULARS.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave the first Popular of the season at Music Hall, November 13, and a noble concert it was, Molé, the flutist, gave Demersseman's intricate Oberson variations. Why don't they rearrange Weber's beautiful old opera, and singing it now and again?

Madame Carl Alves, a newcomer in Boston, was the singer. A fine alto she has, speaking each word distinctly, and singing without a break. Her selections were the female part of the Delilah duet, from the Samson of Saint-Saens, and ballads by Greig, Schumann, Wiederfinden.

The program kindly explained some of the numbers, especially the exhilirating overture to Barber of Seville, played delightfully, particularly the cresendo; the Siegfried Idyle, which Wagner produced in 1871 for his wife's birthday, and which the children well called the Stairmusic. Weber's Invitation to the Waltz, which marks the transition to modern dance music, and is so brilliantly arranged by Berlioz; Wagner's superb Rienzi Overture.

There was a good audience present, but the hall was far from being crowded; and yet the price for the best seats was only a dollar. Where are the people who so bitterly complain that they can not go to Symphony Concerts because the prices are so high? Now is their chance! The cold fact remains, that this Symphony Concert business is a Back Bay fad.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following programme to an enthusiastic audience on Saturday evening:

Overture—"Genoveva".....Schumann
Song, with orchestra—"The Dream King and his Love".....Raff
Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21.....Arthur Foote
Songs with pianoforte—"Remembrance;" "The Little Dustman".....Brahms
Symphony in F, No. 8.....Beethoven

Schumann's great opposition to Richard Wagner and his early operatic methods was a powerful factor in moving this great romantic composer to write an opera. He wished to show that it was possible to write good dramatic music without positively indorsing the new theories. He wished to prove this, and he determined to prove this and—he failed. "Genoveva" is full of most beautiful music, but the lyric element completely overpowers such few dramatic opportunities as the very bad libretto offers. Still, it may be justly said that if the opera itself were half as dramatic and powerful as is the overture, it might have succeeded, for here is indeed unusual strength of conception and true dramatic feeling. On Saturday night the overture was superbly conceived and executed. It may justly be ranked among Mr. Nikisch's greatest successes so far. The whole interpretation was glowing with beauty and the orchestra nobly responded to all the conductor's indications; in fact, the sympathy between them seems to grow every day. Miss Gertrude Edmands is a charming artist, and the beauty of her voice is much enhanced by her excellent method and her truly artistic phrasing. It is, therefore, all the more to be regretted that her selections should have shown her to so little advantage. The long-drawn-out, monotonous composition by Raff belongs to that class of works which seem to have no reasonable excuse for existence, and its performance on Saturday was a severe strain on the patience of the audience. The scoring is interesting, but there is no variety of coloring. The Brahms songs are equally dull, so that, while one admired Miss Edmands's artistic personality, one could not but deplore her selections.

Mr. Foote's second suite, taken as a whole, is not so good as its predecessor, for it is an uneven work. The first number (prelude) is very well conceived and excellently carried out. It is strong thematically, and the contrapuntal nature of its elaboration is not only good in itself, but quite in keeping with the general character of the work. The scoring is very good, and a great deal of coloristic variety is obtained by the skilful manner in which the parts are divided, so that, although only the string orchestra is used, the score often represents ten parts. Especially the violas are used in an interesting and artistic fashion. The menuetto, which follows, is equally interesting as to its instrumentation, and some very pretty pizzicato effects are introduced, but its substance is a little dry and it lacks the true minuet form and feeling. The third movement (air) is completely lovely, and, despite its slight reminiscences of Bach, is perhaps the very best thing Mr. Foote has yet written. It is melodious in the best and warmest sense of the word, and great care has been taken in its scoring that it should "lie well" for all the instruments. It is, indeed, a very beautiful number, of which any composer might be justly proud. On the other hand, the gavotte which closes the suite is a falling off in every way. It is lacking in originality and somewhat careless in its scoring; and the pompous chords at its close are in defiance of all musical form or feeling. A gavotte should close as it begins, on the unaccented beat of the bar, with nothing at all in the nature of a coda. It is evident that Mr. Foote's object was to make a better ending to the whole suite, but his last movement happens to be a gavotte, and any such alteration in its form is unjustifiable.

The symphony was beautifully played. The first movement was as fresh and lovely as a spring breeze, and so good-humored. In the allegretto scherzando Mr. Nikisch most satisfactorily solved the much discussed question of tempo in regard to this movement. There can be no doubt that the "traditional" manner of playing this lovely conception was farcical in the extreme. Without regarding the character of the music at all, it was at once assumed that is should be "bright and lively," and so it was played until it got to be considered as a sort of joke for the orchestra, especially the 'cellists, who could not possibly play the notes of their parts at such a tempo, and so galloped through them in a slurred and indistinct manner. With all due respect to those powerful words, "tradition and conventionality," I should like to quote a remark which the celebrated musical professor, Ludwig Abel, once made in a lesson on conducting. He said: "If you are ever in doubt as to a tempo, if it be a fast movement, look at the place where there are the most notes, and see if you are taking it too fast for easy execution; if it is a slow movement look where there are the fewest notes, and see if you are likely to drag." This may not be "traditional," but it is good, honest "musical common sense," which came from experience. The third movement of this symphony is a true minuet, and yet it is generally treated as a species of scherzo, and, like the preceding movement, played too fast. Saturday night Mr. Nikisch gave both these disputed numbers a most careful, thoughtful, artistic and thoroughly satisfactory interpretation, and he is to be highly congratulated upon the fearless way in which he overturned stupid prejudice and did what seems to him musically true and right, and there is little doubt but what he converted many of his listeners. The last movement was delightfully played, with immense clearness and vivacity, the wood wind in particular acquitting themselves of their difficult work with great precision.

The next programme is immensely interesting and ought to satisfy nearly every one.

Symphony No. 3 in F.....Brahms.
"Les Preludes".....Liszt
"Taunhäuser" overture.....Wagner

ARTHUR WELD.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1889

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Cherubini.....Overture, "Anacreon."
Eckert.....Violoncello concerto, op. 26.
Mr. Schulz.
Svendsen.....Norwegian Rhapsody No. 2, op. 19
Bruch......"Kol Nidrei"
Mr. Schulz.
Goetz.....Symphony in F.

Though each of the above numbers would separately have been welcome, huddled together they awoke feelings of depression and gloom. In the making up of the program there was no attention paid to contrast or effect. There were Cossack and Norwegian and Hebrew melodies, nearly all of them deeply tinged with melancholy. The symphony bore this motto from Schiller:

In the heart's still, sacred chambers
Is the refuge from the stress of strife.

The instrumentation of the rhapsody, original as it was, was neither warm nor gorgeous. There was not one bit of bright color in the musical sky: all was cold and grey.

Mr. Nikisch as a maker of programs is a disappointment. It appears that although in certain respects he may be an innovator, a révolutionnaire, in the matter of personal taste as seen in the selections made for the first seven concerts of this season, he is a narrow, one sided man. He seems to forget that he is no longer in Leipsic; he seems to think that in music the Germans are the chosen people of God. It is true he has brought out a composition by Glinka the Russian; but it was written forty years ago and Glinka had studied in Germany. It is true he has given a rhapsody by Svendsen the Norwegian; but Svendsen was for four years a pupil at the once famous Leipsic conservatory. It is true he has played an overture by Cherubini, who was called by the Italians a "French composer," who was accused by the French of "German proclivities." Stop,—the name of Hector Berlioz does appear upon a program; but where and how? It may be found upon the little program of a "Young People's Popular" as the arranger for orchestra of a German waltz.

Now the people who attend the symphonic concerts wish to hear that which is good and beautiful in music without regard to nationality. There are few who go solely for the purpose of educating themselves; and the men and women who, unable to pay the prices asked for the seats, show their honest love of music by standing for two hours, certainly have no desire of attending a sectarian school. In other words, no one wishes to be "germanized" or bored.

It is hard for this generation with its ideas of "dramatic writing," "local color," "phrases accompanying the characters," etc., etc., to believe that the sober and staid overture which was the first number of a program fit for a day set apart for National humiliation and prayer, was written for an opera called "Anacréon ou l'amour fugitif." The Anacreon of Cherubini now wears a wig; long ago did he lay aside the garlands of roses; no longer does he sing the praises of young girls and old wine. The music is noble and austere and cold. There is not one drop of blood; and as in nearly all of Cherubini's work for the stage, there is but little melody. This opera failed miserably; its libretto was so poor that at the first performance in 1803 it was hissed, the first instance of such open and violent disapproval in the history of the Paris opera.

The Svendsen Rhapsody is an ably written work, clear and musicianly in thematic construction, and there are some novel effects of instrumention. It is not brilliant in coloring; it does not glow, it does not dazzle, as a rhapsody of Lalo or Liszt. It is of the North. Its pulse beats slowly and calmly; there is no fevered frenzy.

The two most important works of Goetz, who died at an early age, are an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and the symphony which was given last week. The opera is exceedingly well written, but it shows that Goetz was inclined to conceal his lack of spontaneous melody by over-elaboration; he had no aptitude for treating comedy-subjects in a sparkling or graceful manner; only when the deeper emotions of his characters were aroused, did he show true dramatic power. In the symphony he is terribly in earnest; and he has so much to say and he is so anxious to emphasize what he says, that his speech becomes too often thick and confused. The first movement is particularly open to this reproach; the second, though it abounds in charming passages, suffers from a need of condensation. The adagio is very beautiful and is in conception and treatment the finest part of the symphony. The last movement is perhaps the weakest and least original.

The soloist was Mr. Leo Schulz, who played Eckert's violoncello concerto and Bruch's "Kol Nidrei." Mr. Schulz's playing is characterized by musicianly phrasing and great refinement. His technique is good; his tone is small and at times thin. The concerto of Eckert is a work of merit, though the first movement is so somber that it approaches dangerously near stupidity. The Bruch composition is founded upon an old Hebrew chant full of pathos and dignity. It is dedicated to Hausmann of the Joachim quartet; he used to play it absolutely without expression, as though it were a tedious exercise. Mr. Schulz displayed much more taste; but for its proper effect, this chant demands the noble breadth and heart-rending tone of Cornélis Liégeois, who in '82–83 (in company with M. Molé the flute virtuoso) was with Bilse's orchestra in Berlin, and three years ago was with Lamoureux in Paris.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night.

The Boston musician was well recognized in the concert of last Saturday. A resident vocalist was the soloist and a Boston composer furnished the one novelty of the programme. The concert as a whole was rather agreeable than great, yet it held the interested attention of the audience in almost every number. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture began the programme, and was given a broad enough rendering. The advantage of having the brasses seated together was made evident by the increased solidity of tone gained in this work, but in the other departments there was not as perfect unity, for at times the woodwind was a trifle behind the strings and vice versa. It is just in this matter of details that Mr. Nikisch does not altogether attain the ideal that Bostonians have been accustomed to. He soars where his predecessor plodded, and the result is a more poetic reading but less perfect technique.

The Beethoven symphony—the spirited and playful eighth—lent itself well to the broad strokes which are characteristic of Mr. Nikisch's readings. The abrupt contrasts, the wild hilarity, the exuberant flow of animal spirits, were all present in an inspiriting degree, and the pretty ritardando in the second theme of the first movement was given with perfect ensemble. The allegretto was taken a little slow for a scherzando, but all its points of brusque contrast were sharply defined, and the impatient end, a most absolute non sequitur, was effectively rendered. as were also the comical parodies of the chief figure.

The minuet was not entirely perfect in its ensemble, but the horn passage in its trio was most artistically played. The bassoon may be said to have been Beethoven's favorite instrument among the humbler members of the orchestral family, and whenever he was in a pleasant mood we are sure to find this instrument coming into prominence, and as he is in his most joking vein in this symphony the bassoon has more than ordinary prominence. Mr. Gunzel deserves praise for the manner in which this instrument was used, as does also Mr. Dietsch. The last movement was especially bright and dashing, and the leap of the three noted figure from the garret to the cellar of the orchestra, that is from flutes to contra basses, was forcibly and humorously given. The odd figure in octaves which Beethoven gave to the drums, (another instrument of which he made playful use) could have been played more clearly. The C sharp also, which interrupts the flow of the prattling chief theme, could have had more power, for in such a sudden modulation as this skip from C to C sharp, no amount of force would have been misplaced. Spite of the fact that the ensemble had a few technical faults, the abrupt transitions were in the main well done, and the true spirit of Beethoven was in the interpretation.

Mr. Arthur Foote's suite for string orchestra was an unequal work. No one dare question Mr. Foote's learning, but the question may sometimes arise whether some of the things he says so fluently are worth saying at all. The prelude was an instance of this. Perfectly expressed in all of its parts, in symmetrical and classical form, it yet left no original or powerful impression on the critical mind, and one felt like repeating the well-known remark of the Frenchman, who, on hearing a certain new but flavorless work, exclaimed, Ce sonate, que me veut-il? In smooth and flowing counterpoint Mr. Foote is at his best; in expressive and romantic melody at his worst, and it was this fact which made the Cello solo of the trio of the minuet less attractive than the rest of that movement. On the other hand the "air" was a really masterly movement, possessing the true flavor of Bach in every measure, and evincing a knowledge of the old school of which anybody might be proud. Although the suite dealt in the old dance forms, it did not bind itself to the old succession of movements, but gave them in a free order and with changes of key that Bach did not use save sometimes in the partita. The gavotte did not stray from the true style of the ancient dance, as nine tenths of the modern gavottes do but began properly on the third beat, and had the syncopations which were characteristic of this dance of the city of Gap. The musette, however, could have made more of the "drone bass" which gave it its rustic character. The end was quite broad and dignified and the audience gave an ovation to the composer.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the vocalist. She was never in better voice and sang with most sympathetic expression. Her first number was "The Dream-King," a bit of modern ecstacy with a finely developed accompaniment. The singer gave it with exquisite taste, although her pronunciation of German was a trifle obscure. I liked her better in Brahms' "The Dustman," a simple and unaffected slumber song, which she gave with just the proper pathos. Her voice has decidedly gained in fullness in the last year and the promises which it held forth in the past are very likely to be fulfilled. Next Saturday we are to have an ultra classical programme of the modern school (for one may rank Brahms, Liszt and Wagner with the classics nowadays) which may rouse the discordant protests of those who long for the fleshpots of Egypt in the shape of rhythmic jingles and dance-tunes.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

[28]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1889.

best renditions.

SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In November, 1852, when Henriette Sontag gave her first concerts in Boston, in the old Melodeon, and the Music Hall,—so newly opened that people went partly to see the place.—her conductor was Carl Eckert. Not only did he direct the overtures and orchestral accompaniments, but I remember particularly his delightful piano accompaniment when she sang Sweet Home. Eckert was much of a wanderer, led orchestras in many cities and died in 1879, nearly sixty years old, without having fulfilled the hopes of his early teacher, Mendelssohn; yet he wrote three operas, an oratorio and other music of various sorts. One concerto is said to be his only composition which retains its public place; and this work was one of the novelties given us by Mr. Nikisch at the Sixth Symphony Concert, Nov. 16, a Violoncello Concerto in A-minor, op. 26, played by Leo Schultz and the orchestra. Though an excellent player, Mr. Schultz did not surpass his predecessors in the same line; nor did the Concerto wake us up till it reached the Cosaque Dances, which constitute the final Rondo, and give so much life both for orchestra and soloist.

Another "first time" in our city was a composition by Max Bruch, founded upon an adagio called Kol Nidrei, sung in the Jewish synagogues on the Day of Atonement, and written for orchestra, cello and harp.

Goetz's Symphony in F, though given in Boston in 1880 and 1887, was almost a novelty. Departing from the usual order, the variegated slow movement comes third, leaving the second place for the Intermezzo, that most beautiful part of the Symphony, with its breathing of the wind through the trees, a delightful contrast to the fire of the concluding Allegro, grandly worked up by the conductor. What a pity that Goetz's early death a dozen years ago, at the early age of thirty-six, should have shut off the world's enjoyment of more such symphonies!

Cherubini's Anacreon Overture opened the concert,—an old favorite; but Svendsen's Norwegian Rhapsody No. 2, op. 19, though played a few seasons ago by the Orchestral Club, was new with the Symphony Orchestra, who gave a beautiful interpretation of the national melodies which furnish its groundwork.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULARS.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA gave the first Popular of the season at Music Hall, November 13, and a noble concert it was, Molé, the flutist, gave Demersseman's intricate Oberson variations. Why don't they rearrange Weber's beautiful old opera, and singing it now and again?

Madame Carl Alves, a newcomer in Boston, was the singer. A fine alto she has, speaking each word distinctly, and singing without a break. Her selections were the female part of the Delilah duet, from the Samson of Saint-Saens, and ballads by Greig, Schumann, Wiederfinden.

The program kindly explained some of the numbers, especially the exhilirating overture to Barber of Seville, played delightfully, particularly the cresendo; the Siegfried Idyle, which Wagner produced in 1871 for his wife's birthday, and which the children well called the Stairmusic. Weber's Invitation to the Waltz, which marks the transition to modern dance music, and is so brilliantly arranged by Berlioz; Wagner's superb Rienzi Overture.

There was a good audience present, but the hall was far from being crowded; and yet the price for the best seats was only a dollar. Where are the people who so bitterly complain that they can not go to Symphony Concerts because the prices are so high? Now is their chance! The cold fact remains, that this Symphony Concert business is a Back Bay fad.

[illegible]

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. [illegible], 1889.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch presented the following programme to an enthusiastic audience on Saturday evening:

Overture—"Genoveva".....Schumann
Song, with orchestra—"The Dream King and his Love".....Raff
Suite for string orchestra in D major, No. 2, op. 21.....Arthur Foote Songs with pianoforte—"Remembrance,"
"The Little Dustman".....Brahms
Symphony in F, No. 8.....Beethoven

Schumann's great opposition to Richard Wagner and his early operatic methods was a powerful factor in moving this great romantic composer to write an opera. He wished to show that it was possible to write good dramatic music without positively indorsing the new theories. He wished to prove this, and he determined to prove this and—he failed. "Genoveva" is full of most beautiful music, but the lyric element completely overpowers such few dramatic opportunities as the very bad libretto offers. Still, it may be justly said that if the opera itself were half as dramatic and powerful as is the overture, it might have succeeded, for here is indeed unusual strength of conception and true dramatic feeling. On Saturday night the overture was superbly conceived and executed. It may justly be ranked among Mr. Nikisch's greatest successes so far. The whole interpretation was glowing with beauty and the orchestra nobly responded to all the conductor's indications; in fact, the sympathy between them seems to grow every day. Miss Gertrude Edmands is a charming artist, and the beauty of her voice is much enhanced by her excellent method and her truly artistic phrasing. It is, therefore, all the more to be regretted that her selections should have shown her to so little advantage. The long-drawn-out, monotonous composition by Raff belongs to that class of works which seem to have no reasonable excuse for existence, and its performance on Saturday was a severe strain on the patience of the audience. The scoring is interesting, but there is no variety of coloring. The Brahms songs are equally dull, so that, while one admired Miss Edmands's artistic personality, one could not but deplore her selections.

Mr. Foote's second suite, taken as a whole, is not so good as its predecessor, for it is an uneven work. The first number (prelude) is very well conceived and excellently carried out. It is strong thematically, and the contrapuntal nature of its elaboration is not only good in itself, but quite in keeping with the general character of the work. The scoring is very good, and a great deal of coloristic variety is obtained by the skilful manner in which the parts are divided, so that, although only the string orchestra is used, the score often represents ten parts. Especially the violas are used in an interesting and artistic fashion. The menuetto, which follows, is equally interesting as to its instrumentation, and some very pretty pizzicato effects are introduced, but its substance is a little dry and it lacks the true minuet form and feeling. The third movement (air) is completely lovely, and, despite its slight reminiscences of Bach, is perhaps the very best thing Mr. Foote has yet written. It is melodious in the best and warmest sense of the word, and great care has been taken in its scoring that it should "lie well" for all the instruments. It is, indeed, a very beautiful number, of which any composer might be justly proud. On the other hand, the gavotte which closes the suite is a falling off in every way. It is lacking in originality and somewhat careless in its scoring; and the pompous chords at its close are in defiance of all musical form or feeling. A gavotte should close as it begins, on the unaccented beat of the bar, with nothing at all in the nature of a coda. It is evident that Mr. Foote's object was to make a better ending to the whole suite, but his last movement happens to be a gavotte, and any such alteration in its form is unjustifiable.

The symphony was beautifully played. The first movement was as fresh and lovely as a spring breeze, and so good-humored. In the allegretto scherzando Mr. Nikisch most satisfactorily solved the much discussed question of tempo in regard to this movement. There can be no doubt that the "traditional" manner of playing this lovely conception was farcical in the extreme. Without regarding the character of the music at all, it was at once assumed that it should be "bright and lively," and so it was played until it got to be considered as a sort of joke for the orchestra, especially the 'cellists, who could not possibly play the notes of their parts at such a tempo, and so galloped through them in a slurred and indistinct manner. With all due respect to those powerful words, "tradition and conventionality," I should like to quote a remark which the celebrated musical professor, Ludwig Abel, once made in a lesson on conducting. He said: "If you are ever in doubt as to a tempo, if it be a fast movement, look at the place where there are the most notes, and see if you are taking it too fast for easy execution; if it is a slow movement look where there are the fewest notes, and see if you are likely to drag." This may not be "traditional," but it is good, honest "musical common sense," which came from experience. The third movement of this symphony is a true minuet, and yet it is generally treated as a species of scherzo, and, like the preceding movement, played too fast. Saturday night Mr. Nikisch gave both these disputed numbers a most careful, thoughtful, artistic and thoroughly satisfactory interpretation, and he is to be highly congratulated upon the fearless way in which he overturned stupid prejudice and did what seems to him musically true and right, and there is little doubt but what he converted many of his listeners. The last movement was delightfully played, with immense clearness and vivacity, the wood wind in particular acquitting themselves of their difficult work with great precision.

The next programme is immensely interesting and ought to satisfy nearly every one.

Symphony No. 3 in F.....Brahms.
"Les Preludes".....Liszt
"Taunhäuser" overture.....Wagner

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert was—

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva."
Raff: Song, "Der Traumkönig and sein Lieb,"
Foote: Suite for strings, No. 2, in D, op. 21.
Brahms; Songs, with pianoforte—
a. Remembrance,
b. The Little Dustman.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the singer.

The concert was an especially enjoyable one from the absolutely superb performance of the Schumann overture and the Beethoven symphony. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Nikisch's peculiar treatment of certain classic compositions, and of the pretty evident wrongness of his point of view regarding them, it can be said emphatically that when he is right he is superlatively right. There are times when you find it impossible to agree with him, notstanding the fine energy and vigor he infuses into everything he touches; but when you can agree with him he carries you away with a force that is irresistible. It has been said that the orchestra, under his baton, has lost something of that perfection of finish, that absolute exactness of ensemble in playing, which distinguished it under Mr. Gericke, and this is probably true enough. But what the orchestra has lost in one way it das gained in another, and, looking at the matter considerately, and by the light of experience, one can say almost with certainty that the loss has been a necessary condition of the gain. As far as we can remember, all the great singers and players we have heard whose most salientcharistic wss energy of emotional expression, have been notable also for a certain shortcoming in point of mechanical perfectiofi. It seems as if no performer had yet brought technique to the point where he could be unconscious of it with complete safety. No matter how enormous a player's technique may be, so soon as the throw his whole self, his entire energy, into the emotional side of the music he is playing, to the forgetting of its mechanical side, he is immediately exposed to technical slips of all sorts. It is so with Rubinstein, whose technique, immense as it is, is still not great enough to save him from striking wrong notes by the handfull when he throws the reins upon the neck of his enthusiasm, and lets himself go. It is so with Giese, the 'cellist, who should surely be ranked as a great player, in contradistinction to what is generally understood by a good one. No amount of technique can be relied on to be up to every emergency by a player who dares everything. When emotional vigor goes beyond a certain pitch, technical perfection is pretty sure to be impaired. The only pertinent question for criticism to answer is, after striking a balance between the loss and gain, whether the game is worth the candle. In the cases of Rubinstein and Giese it seems to us pretty evident that the game is worth the candle, that the gain more than makes up for the loss; and we think this is equally true of our Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikish. Wholly apart from what differences in musical feeling, appreciation and artistic point of view there may be between Mr. Nikisch and his predecessor, the two men are different in no respect so much as in the character of their immediate personal relation to the orchestra. They are conspicuously fine examples of two diametrically opposite schools of conducting. In command orer their men, in the power of getting what they want out of the orchestra, we should call them about equal; but in the way and spirit in which they go to work to gain their end, they are as differen as can be. Mr. Gericke was essentially a martinet; he insisted upon the music being played, to every smallest detail, exactly according to his own idea. The orchestra was, in his eyes, nothing more than a keyboard upon which he was to play; no man but himself was to take any initiative whatever; the performance was to be his, through and through, and nothing but his. His mental attitude was purely one of command. Mr. Nikisch, on the other hand, seems less to command than to invite every player in the orchestra to follow him in carrying out his general idea in the best way that the player individually can. He insists, to be sure, upon the main outline of his conception of the music; but beyond that, he leaves the players considerable latitude, and after he has made them grasp his idea, he lets them carry it out in their own way, trusting largely to their individual artistic sense. Thus it comes about that the players under him are not hampered by a continual sense of having to follow a certain fixed pattern with minute exactness, but are allowed that freedom of expression without which no player can ever do his very best. In other words, he exacts obedience, but he still allows the players under him to be themselves, content if every man does his own best. The gain in vigor and vitality of playing is immense, while the lapse from perfect precision, although undeniable, has been, upon the whole, very slight indeed. What might have happened if the orchestra had not already played for five years under Mr. Gericke, and if Mr. Nikisch had been called to assume the sceptre over a less carefully and thoroughly drilled set of men, it is now idle to speculate upon; it is quite enough that Mr. Nikisch actually has an orchestra that he can make do his bidding without a too tedious regard for harassing minutiæ.

As for the "Genoveva" and the Eighth Symphony, they were played most gloriously right; the effect was overwhelming. Never have we heard that wonderful Allegretto given in such perfect sympathy with the true character of the music; it is only in that moderate tempo that the grace, charm, humor and roguish fascination of the music can be done full justice to. Mr. Foote's suite—as far as one can judge of it at a single hearing—is a worthy successor to his first one. The minuet and gavotte are particularly charming, and the whole work impresses one by a certain solidity of style and workmanship. Perhaps one cannot quite escape the feeling that such a work, written in the old dance forms, and for string orchestra, has something of the character of an exercise, and that the composer had his own self-education to a certain extent in view. It is hard to believe that a composer today, and least of all Mr. Foote, sets to work to write music a century, or so, old wholly spontaneously, and for the simple sake of expressing what is in him. Such writing has inevitably something of the flavor of a self-imposed task; in this case, a task admirably performed. Miss Edmands sang Raff's "Traumkönig" very beautifully. The song itself seems rather flimsy both in sentiment and construction, but it is a pleasant sort of music to hear in a dreamy, half attentive way, and the orchestral coloring is delicious. The two charming songs by Brahms were capitally sung and admirably accompanied by Mr. Whelpley. The next programme is: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, in F; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser."

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 24, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave as his orchestral selections the eighth Beethoven symphony, a suite for strings, by Arthur Foote, and the "Genoveve" overture by Schumann, vocal selections being added by Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto. Mr. Nikisch again suffered in his interpretation and performance of the Beethoven symphony with the models of later years in this particular here. His memory of these works appears to be at fault, if his performances of them are any standard to judge by, and a rigid following of accepted readings of the scores would materially benefit his performances of such standard works. The familiar movements of this masterly composition were given with a lack of finish and questionable taste, and it was difficult to explain the applause called out upon any artistic basis. The lovely allegretto lost much of its grace and beauty in the crude performance given it, and the final movement was equally unsatisfactory. Mr. Gericke's absence is much to be deplored when a Beethoven symphony is to be played at these concerts, and Mr. Nikisch will save many adverse criticisms by a more conservative following of accepted traditions in performing this class of compositions. The opus number of Mr. Foote's suite for strings No. 21, appears to indicate that he has other works still awaiting a hearing by Boston audiences, and this last composition is of so much merit that it is to be hoped his writings will find further place on these programmes during the season. Of the four movements of this suite, prelude, minuetto, air and, gavotte, there is much that can be said in praise, Mr. Foote's work again showing him to be a thoroughly conservative, well schooled musician, fertile in melodious thought, and with a genius for orchestral writing which gives still better promise for the future. The "air" is the most meritorious portion of this suite, being quite in the Bach style, though strictly original in its ideas. The opening portion of the minuetto is bright, piquant and graceful, and the gavotte is in good form and ingenuously scored. The strings of the orchestra show the effect of Mr. Nickisch's control during the few weeks he has had the orchestra, and the composition differs somewhat from his reading of it which was lacking in grace and elegance, and its performance did not have the faultless finish which this section of the band was wont to show in such works in former seasons. The Schumann overture was by far the most satisfying performance of the evening, and was heartily enjoyed. Miss Edmands made an unwise choice in selecting Raff's song, "The Dream King and His Love," for her principal number, as it does not fall easily within her voice, and the singing of the German warble was another error on the singer's part. In the Brahms songs, "Remembrance" and "The Little Dustman," however, Miss Edmands was heard at her best, and her thoroughly artistic delivery of these two charming vocal gems were heartily appreciated. The singer's voice is as pleasing as ever, and her vocal work showed her to be the same conscientious artist as ever. She was cordially greeted, and most enthusiastically applauded for her efforts.

REGISTER, NEW HAVEN NOVEMBER 25,

In the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at the Hyperion commencing December 16, lovers of the best music have an opportunity to listen to the works of the great masters performed by a grand orchestra, which is ranked by competent authorities on a par with the three finest similar organizations in the world.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will take place at the Hyperion December 16, and of course the occasion will bring together about all the music loving people in the town. The Symphony concerts have long been looked upon as events in the musical season. The other concerts will be given January 13, February 10 and March 17.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH,.....CONDUCTOR.
Four Subscription Concerts
AT THE
HYPERION THEATER
Monday Evenings, Dec. 16th, January 13, February 10 and March 17.
Subscription now open at M. Steinert & Son's. Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, $5.00, will be sold to subscribers ONLY, Monday, Dec. 2d.
n19 10dlsu C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The course of Boston Symphony concerts will open at the Hyperion December 18. The other concerts in the course will take place January 13, February 10 and March 17.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Monday, November 25, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A Biographical Sketch of Herr Arthur Nickisch—A Famous Young Kappellmeister—The Personnel of the Orchestra.

There is every indication that the series of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be largely attended. Assurance is given that nothing will be left undone to make these concerts notable events of the musical season and worthy the attention of every lover of classical music. The new feature of the concerts will be the appearance of Herr Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the orchestra. The following sketch of this famous young musician is given by Mr. Arthur Weld of Boston:

Herr Nickisch was born on October 12, 1855, in a small town called Szent-Miklos, in the principality of Lichtenstein. His father occupied the position of head steward and auditor to the prince and was himself an enthusiastic musical amateur. In earliest childhood the boy showed such extraordinary talent that his parents determined to educate him as a musician. He began his studies with the violin, and he mastered this instrument with such ease and so completely that at the age of eight years he appeared in public with most extraordinary success—in fact, the young prodigy received a genuine ovation. His first studies in harmony and organ playing were under the direction of the organist Prochazka, in the neighboring town of Buschtowitz; and in all branches the lad made such remarkable progress as to enable him to enter the Royal Conservatory in Vienna at the unusually early age of eleven.

At Vienna he worked harder than ever, and especially devoted himself to all the technical branches of composition. So great was his success that two years later, (being then only 13 years old) he sent a string sextet to an open competition and was awarded the first prize. He remained at the conservatory eight years, during which time he won many more prizes for his compositions as well as the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions, a cantata for solo, chorus and orchestra, was so successful as to be constantly repeated and, as a special honor and tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer, on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory he publicly conducted a symphony. He was immensely popular with his fellow students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, who especially recognized his extraordinary talent for conducting and as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a magnificent and costly baton.

Immediately after his graduation he applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera, and obtaining this honorable position without difficulty, he occupied it during four years, receiving in this way the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous repertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such conductors as Richter and Jahn. In 1878 he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neuman to Leipzig, and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House, where at that time Anton Seidl was officiating as chief conductor. He remained in this position a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience had shown him that he had found a real musical wonder and so he transferred Herr Nikisch to the New Opera House as head conductor, where he has been ever since. He made his debut in this position with one of the most magnificent performances of "Tannhauser" ever heard in Leipzig, and from that moment he has been universally acknowledged as one of the most gifted and important conductors in Europe.

Herr Nikisch has also during these ten years in Leipzig distinguished himself quite as much as a concert conductor as in the theater and he is particularly successful as a programme maker. Under his care and direction the Leipzig theater orchestra has gained a European fame which entitles it to an equal or even superior place to the Gewandhaus orchestra. A performance of the Ninth Symphony, in 1882, is said to have been the most magnificent ever given; while the superb manner in which he conducted the concerts of the last "Tonkuenstler-Versammlung," in 1883, brought him a profusion of orders and decorations from all over the country. He also conducted on many occasions in the Gewandhaus, as Reinecke's substitute, and has also given many remarkably successful concerts with his own theater orchestra. More especially noteworthy, however, is the manner in which he conducted the recent monster concerts of the Liszt society. With them he achieved a success which caused all the noted German critics to acknowledge Arthur Nikisch to be one of the most brilliant and talented living conductors, both in the theater and on the concert stage.

He has received countless offers to leave Leipzig. Frankfort, Vienna, Cassel, Carlsruhe and Mannheim have all vied with one another in unsuccessful attempts to induce him to leave his beloved Leipzig, but it was reserved for Boston, which may now be justly styled the most important art city in the New World, to have finally overcome his scruples and induce him to conquer new fields. The musical world of Leipzig is in genuine distress because it feels only too keenly that it will be impossible to replace him. He has earned a place in the great quartette of conductors—Richter, Levy, Mottl and Nikisch—and between these four geniuses and the second flight there is a wide gap. It remains only for American audiences to show their appreciation of the good fortune which has given them a man whose artistic footsteps can be followed without fear.

...tially the same as that of the last two seasons. Mr. Franz Kneisel is retained as concertmeister and Mr. Anton Hekking has been added to the corps of 'cellists. Messrs. Mole and Sautet, whose brilliant playing on the flute and oboe is remembered with pleasure, are still members of the orchestra, and so is that prince of horn players, Xavier Reiter. To add to the enjoyment of those who attend the concerts, analytical programmes will be prepared similar to those which have been received with so much favor in Boston. A copy of these programmes will be mailed before each concert to every subscriber for season tickets.

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD.
NOVEMBER 26, 1889

CHARMS OF MUSIC.

Gratifying Success of the Boston Symphony Concert.

A large audience heard the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. The programme was made up of six numbers, four for the orchestra and two for Miss Rose Stewart, soprano, who assisted. Promptly at 8 o'clock, Arthur Nikisch stepped out of the wings and made his way among the 60 musicians to the conductor's stand. Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for warm applause. The fame which he had won as a leader of orchestras in Europe and in this country had preceded him to this city, and it was evident soon after the first strains of the overture had died away that he deserved the praise which had been showered upon him. The musicians were in excellent harmony, and the unisons were as clear and sympathetic as if all the instruments had been one and were performed by one artist. The Norwegian rhapsody and the first movement of the symphony were most generally commended, although it seems a shade of presumption to designate any one or two as the best.

Miss Stewart's perfect composure and the naturalness of her singing won for her many admirers on her previous engagements here. She has a sweet voice, not strong, but very clear. It was a daring thing to attempt a selection with a flute accompaniment, but Miss Stewart sang an aria from the mad scene from "Lucia," accompanied on the flute by Charles Mole, and the effect was delightful. Her second number was a lullaby by Sullivan, and it was beautifully rendered. Continued applause brought the singer out twice to recognize the appreciation of the audience, but it was regretted that she could not be induced to sing just one encore.

The revised programme to which the selection from "Rosamunde" was added yesterday was certainly not too long when it is understood that there shall be no encores, and it would have positively suffered as to length had not that number been added. The annoyance of late comers was successfully avoided by the rule adopted by the management, requesting all who entered after the music began to wait at the door until the first number was completed. If the management could have strangled the villains in the audience who insisted upon marking the time with their feet, the external arrangements of the concert would have been complete.

To the energy and care of O. Elton Borden was much of the success of the concert due, and it is to be hoped that the financial appreciation of his efforts was large enough to warrant him in undertaking to arrange another engagement in the spring. The city cannot have too many such concerts.

[29]

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert was—

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva."
Raff: Song, "Der Traumkönig and sein Lieb."
Foote: Suite for strings, No. 2, in D, op. 21.
Brahms; Songs, with pianoforte—
a. Remembrance,
b. The Little Dustman.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the singer.

The concert was an especially enjoyable one from the absolutely superb performance of the Schumann overture and the Beethoven symphony. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Nikisch's peculiar treatment of certain classic compositions, and of the pretty evident wrongness of his point of view regarding them, it can be said emphatically that when he is right he is superlatively right. There are times when you find it impossible to agree with him, notwithstanding the fine energy and vigor he infuses into everything he touches; but when you can agree with him he carries you away with a force that is irresistible. It has been said that the orchestra, under his baton, has lost something of that perfection of finish, that absolute exactness of ensemble in playing, which distinguished it under Mr. Gericke, and this is probably true enough. But what the orchestra has lost in one way it has gained in another, and, looking at the matter considerately, and by the light of experience, one can say almost with certainty that the loss has been a necessary condition of the gain. As far as we can remember, all the great singers and players we have heard whose most salient characteristic was energy of emotional expression, have been notable also for a certain shortcoming in point of mechanical perfection. It seems as if no performer had yet brought technique to the point where he could be unconscious of it with complete safety. No matter how enormous a player's technique may be, so soon as the throw his whole self, his entire energy, into the emotional side of the music he is playing, to the forgetting of its mechanical side, he is immediately exposed to technical slips of all sorts. It is so with Rubinstein, whose technique, immense as it is, is still not great enough to save him from striking wrong notes by the handfull when he throws the reins upon the neck of his enthusiasm, and lets himself go. It is so with Giese, the 'cellist, who should surely be ranked as a great player, in contradistinction to what is generally understood by a good one. No amount of technique can be relied on to be up to every emergency by a player who dares everything. When emotional vigor goes beyond a certain pitch, technical perfection is pretty sure to be impaired. The only pertinent question for criticism to answer is, after striking a balance between the loss and gain, whether the game is worth the candle. In the cases of Rubinstein and Giese it seems to us pretty evident that the game is worth the candle, that the gain more than makes up for the loss; and we think this is equally true of our Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikish. Wholly apart from what differences in musical feeling, appreciation and artistic point of view there may be between Mr. Nikisch and his predecessor, the two men are different in no respect so much as in the character of their immediate personal relation to the orchestra. They are conspicuously fine examples of two diametrically opposite schools of conducting. In command over their men, in the power of getting what they want out of the orchestra, we should call them about equal; but in the way and spirit in which they go to work to gain their end, they are as differen as can be. Mr. Gericke was essentially a martinet; he insisted upon the music being played, to every smallest detail, exactly according to his own idea. The orchestra was, in his eyes, nothing more than a keyboard upon which he was to play; no man but himself was to take any initiative whatever; the performance was to be his, through and through, and nothing but his. His mental attitude was purely one of command. Mr. Nikisch, on the other hand, seems less to command than to invite every player in the orchestra to follow him in carrying out his general idea in the best way that the player individually can. He insists, to be sure, upon the main outline of his conception of the music; but beyond that, he leaves the players considerable latitude, and after he has made them grasp his idea, he lets them carry it out in their own way, trusting largely to their individual artistic sense. Thus it comes about that the players under him are not hampered by a continual sense of having to follow a certain fixed pattern with minute exactness, but are allowed that freedom of expression without which no player can ever do his very best. In other words, he exacts obedience, but he still allows the players under him to be themselves, content if every man does his own best. The gain in vigor and vitality of playing is immense, while the lapse from perfect precision, although undeniable, has been, upon the whole, very slight indeed. What might have happened if the orchestra had not already played for five years under Mr. Gericke, and if Mr. Nikisch had been called to assume the sceptre over a less carefully and thoroughly drilled set of men, it is now idle to speculate upon; it is quite enough that Mr. Nikisch actually has an orchestra that he can make do his bidding without a too tedious regard for harassing minutiæ.

As for the "Genoveva" and the Eighth Symphony, they were played most gloriously right; the effect was overwhelming. Never have we heard that wonderful Allegretto given in such perfect sympathy with the true character of the music; it is only in that moderate tempo that the grace, charm, humor and roguish fascination of the music can be done full justice to. Mr. Foote's suite—as far as one can judge of it at a single hearing—is a worthy successor to his first one. The minuet and gavotte are particularly charming, and the whole work impresses one by a certain solidity of style and workmanship. Perhaps one cannot quite escape the feeling that such a work, written in the old dance forms, and for string orchestra, has something of the character of an exercise, and that the composer had his own self-education to a certain extent in view. It is hard to believe that a composer today, and least of all Mr. Foote, sets to work to write music a century, or so, old wholly spontaneously, and for the simple sake of expressing what is in him. Such writing has inevitably something of the flavor of a self-imposed task; in this case, a task admirably performed. Miss Edmands sang Raff's "Traumkönig" very beautifully. The song itself seems rather flimsy both in sentiment and construction, but it is a pleasant sort of music to hear in a dreamy, half attentive way, and the orchestral coloring is delicious. The two charming songs by Brahms were capitally sung and admirably accompanied by Mr. Whelpley. The next programme is: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, in F; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser."

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 24, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave as his orchestral selections the eighth Beethoven symphony, a suite for strings, by Arthur Foote, and the "Genoveva" overture by Schumann, vocal selections being added by Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto. Mr. Nikisch again suffered in his interpretation and performance of the Beethoven symphony with the models of later years in this particular here. His memory of these works appears to be at fault, if his performances of them are any standard to judge by, and a rigid following of accepted readings of the scores would materially benefit his performances of such standard works. The familiar movements of this masterly composition were given with a lack of finish and questionable taste, and it was difficult to explain the applause called out upon any artistic basis. The lovely allegretto lost much of its grace and beauty in the crude performance given it, and the final movement was equally unsatisfactory. Mr. Gericke's absence is much to be deplored when a Beethoven symphony is to be played at these concerts, and Mr. Nikisch will save many adverse criticisms by a more conservative following of accepted traditions in performing this class of compositions. The opus number of Mr. Foote's suite for strings No. 21, appears to indicate that he has other works still awaiting a hearing by Boston audiences, and this last composition is of so much merit that it is to be hoped his writings will find further place on these programmes during the season. Of the four movements of this suite, prelude, minuetto, air and, gavotte, there is much that can be said in praise, Mr. Foote's work again showing him to be a thoroughly conservative, well schooled musician, fertile in melodious thought, and with a genius for orchestral writing which gives still better promise for the future. The "air" is the most meritorious portion of this suite, being quite in the Bach style, though strictly original in its ideas. The opening portion of the minuetto is bright, piquant and graceful, and the gavotte is in good form and ingeniously scored. The strings of the orchestra show the effect of Mr. Nickisch's control during the few weeks he has had the orchestra, and the composition differs somewhat from his reading of it which was lacking in grace and elegance, and its performance did not have the faultless finish which this section of the band was wont to show in such works in former seasons. The Schumann overture was by far the most satisfying performance of the evening, and was heartily enjoyed. Miss Edmands made an unwise choice in selecting Raff's song, "The Dream King and His Love," for her principal number, as it does not fall easily within her voice, and the singing of the German warble was another error on the singer's part. In the Brahms songs, "Remembrance" and "The Little Dustman," however, Miss Edmands was heard at her best, and her thoroughly artistic delivery of these two charming vocal gems were heartily appreciated. The singer's voice is as pleasing as ever, and her vocal work showed her to be the same conscientious artist as ever. She was cordially greeted, and most enthusiastically applauded for her efforts.

REGISTER, NEW HAVEN

NOVEMBER 25,

In the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at the Hyperion commencing December 16, lovers of the best music have an opportunity to listen to the works of the great masters performed by a grand orchestra, which is ranked by competent authorities on a par with the three finest similar organizations in the world.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will take place at the Hyperion December 16, and of course the occasion will bring together about all the music loving people in the town. The Symphony concerts have long been looked upon as events in the musical season. The other concerts will be given January 13, February 10 and March 17.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH,.....CONDUCTOR.
Four Subscription Concerts
AT THE
HYPERION THEATER
Monday Evenings, Dec. 16th, January 13, February 10 and March 17.
Subscription now open at M. Steinert & Son's. Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, $5.00, will be sold to subscribers ONLY, Monday, Dec. 2d.
n19 10dlsu C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The course of Boston Symphony concerts will open at the Hyperion December 18. The other concerts in the course will take place January 13, February 10 and March 17.

Journal and Courier

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Monday, November 25, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A Biographical Sketch of Herr Arthur Nikisch—A Famous Young Kappellmeister—The Personnel of the Orchestra.

There is every indication that the series of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be largely attended. Assurance is given that nothing will be left undone to make these concerts notable events of the musical season and worthy the attention of every lover of classical music. The new feature of the concerts will be the appearance of Herr Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the orchestra. The following sketch of this famous young musician is given by Mr. Arthur Weld of Boston:

Herr Nickisch was born on October 12, 1855, in a small town called Szent-Miklos, in the principality of Lichtenstein. His father occupied the position of head steward and auditor to the prince and was himself an enthusiastic musical amateur. In earliest childhood the boy showed such extraordinary talent that his parents determined to educate him as a musician. He began his studies with the violin, and he mastered this instrument with such ease and so completely that at the age of eight years he appeared in public with most extraordinary success—in fact, the young prodigy received a genuine ovation. His first studies in harmony and organ playing were under the direction of the organist Prochazka, in the neighboring town of Buschtowitz; and in all branches the lad made such remarkable progress as to enable him to enter the Royal Conservatory in Vienna at the unusually early age of eleven.

At Vienna he worked harder than ever, and especially devoted himself to all the technical branches of composition. So great was his success that two years later, (being then only 13 years old) he sent a string sextet to an open competition and was awarded the first prize. He remained at the conservatory eight years, during which time he won many more prizes for his compositions as well as the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions, a cantata for solo, chorus and orchestra, was so successful as to be constantly repeated and, as a special honor and tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer, on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory he publicly conducted a symphony. He was immensely popular with his fellow students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, who especially recognized his extraordinary talent for conducting and as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a magnificent and costly baton.

Immediately after his graduation he applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera, and obtaining this honorable position without difficulty, he occupied it during four years, receiving in this way the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous repertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such conductors as Richter and Jahn. In 1878 he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neuman to Leipzig, and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House, where at that time Anton Seidl was officiating as chief conductor. He remained in this position a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience had shown him that he had found a real musical wonder and so he transferred Herr Nikisch to the New Opera House as head conductor, where he has been ever since. He made his debut in this position with one of the most magnificent performances of "Tannhauser" ever heard in Leipzig, and from that moment he has been universally acknowledged as one of the most gifted and important conductors in Europe.

Herr Nikisch has also during these ten years in Leipzig distinguished himself quite as much as a concert conductor as in the theater and he is particularly successful as a programme maker. Under his care and direction the Leipzig theater orchestra has gained a European fame which entitles it to an equal or even superior place to the Gewandhaus orchestra. A performance of the Ninth Symphony, in 1882, is said to have been the most magnificent ever given; while the superb manner in which he conducted the concerts of the last "Tonkuenstler-Versammlung," in 1883, brought him a profusion of orders and decorations from all over the country. He also conducted on many occasions in the Gewandhaus, as Reinecke's substitute, and has also given many remarkably successful concerts with his own theater orchestra. More especially noteworthy, however, is the manner in which he conducted the recent monster concerts of the Liezt society. With them he achieved a success which caused all the noted German critics to acknowledge Arthur Nikisch to be one of the most brilliant and talented living conductors, both in the theater and on the concert stage.

He has received countless offers to leave Leipzig. Frankfort, Vienna, Cassel, Carlsruhe and Mannheim have all vied with one another in unsuccessful attempts to induce him to leave his beloved Leipzig, but it was reserved for Boston, which may now be justly styled the most important art city in the New World, to have finally overcome his scruples and induce him to conquer new fields. The musical world of Leipzig is in genuine distress because it feels only too keenly that it will be impossible to replace him. He has earned a place in the great quartette of conductors—Richter, Levy, Mottl and Nikisch—and between these four geniuses and the second flight there is a wide gap. It remains only for American audiences to show their appreciation of the good fortune which has given them a man whose artistic footsteps can be followed without fear.

The personnel of the orchestra will be entirely the same as that of the last two seasons. Mr. Franz Kneisel is retained as concertmeister and Mr. Anton Hekking has been added to the corps of 'cellists. Messrs. Mole and Sautet, whose brilliant playing on the flute and oboe is remembered with pleasure, are still members of the orchestra, and so is that prince of horn players, Xavier Reiter. To add to the enjoyment of those who attend the concerts, analytical programmes will be prepared similar to those which have been received with so much favor in Boston. A copy of these programmes will be mailed before each concert to every subscriber for season tickets.

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD.

NOVEMBER 26, 1889

CHARMS OF MUSIC.

Gratifying Success of the Boston Symphony Concert.

A large audience heard the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. The programme was made up of six numbers, four for the orchestra and two for Miss Rose Stewart, soprano, who assisted. Promptly at 8 o'clock, Arthur Nikisch stepped out of the wings and made his way among the 60 musicians to the conductor's stand. Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for warm applause. The fame which he had won as a leader of orchestras in Europe and in this country had preceded him to this city, and it was evident soon after the first strains of the overture had died away that he deserved the praise which had been showered upon him. The musicians were in excellent harmony, and the unisons were as clear and sympathetic as if all the instruments had been one and were performed by one artist. The Norwegian rhapsody and the first movement of the symphony were most generally commended, although it seems a shade of presumption to designate any one or two as the best.

Miss Stewart's perfect composure and the naturalness of her singing won for her many admirers on her previous engagements here. She has a sweet voice, not strong, but very clear. It was a daring thing to attempt a selection with a flute accompaniment, but Miss Stewart sang an aria from the mad scene from "Lucia," accompanied on the flute by Charles Mole, and the effect was delightful. Her second number was a lullaby by Sullivan, and it was beautifully rendered. Continued applause brought the singer out twice to recognize the appreciation of the audience, but it was regretted that she could not be induced to sing just one encore.

The revised programme to which the selection from "Rosamunde" was added yesterday was certainly not too long when it is understood that there shall be no encores, and it would have positively suffered as to length had not that number been added. The annoyance of late comers was successfully avoided by the rule adopted by the management, requesting all who entered after the music began to wait at the door until the first number was completed. If the management could have strangled the villains in the audience who insisted upon marking the time with their feet, the external arrangements of the concert would have been complete.

To the energy and care of O. Elton Borden was much of the success of the concert due, and it is to be hoped that the financial appreciation of his efforts was large enough to warrant him in undertaking to arrange another engagement in the spring. The city cannot have too many such concerts.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert was—

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva."
Raff: Song, "Der Traumkönig and sein Lieb."
Foote: Suite for strings, No. 2, in D, op. 21.
Brahms; Songs, with pianoforte—
a. Remembrance,
b. The Little Dustman.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was the singer.

The concert was an especially enjoyable one from the absolutely superb performance of the Schumann overture and the Beethoven symphony. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Nikisch's peculiar treatment of certain classic compositions, and of the pretty evident wrongness of his point of view regarding them, it can be said emphatically that when he is right he is superlatively right. There are times when you find it impossible to agree with him, notwithstanding the fine energy and vigor he infuses into everything he touches; but when you can agree with him he carries you away with a force that is irresistible. It has been said that the orchestra, under his baton, has lost something of that perfection of finish, that absolute exactness of ensemble in playing, which distinguished it under Mr. Gericke, and this is probably true enough. But what the orchestra has lost in one way it das gained in another, and, looking at the matter considerately, and by the light of experience, one can say almost with certainty that the loss has been a necessary condition of the gain. As far as we can remember, all the great singers and players we have heard whose most salientcharistic wss energy of emotional expression, have been notable also for a certain shortcoming in point of mechanical perfectiofi. It seems as if no performer had yet brought technique to the point where he could be unconscious of it with complete safety. No matter how enormous a player's technique may be, so soon as the throw his whole self, his entire energy, into the emotional side of the music he is playing, to the forgetting of its mechanical side, he is immediately exposed to technical slips of all sorts. It is so with Rubinstein, whose technique, immense as it is, is still not great enough to save him from striking wrong notes by the handfull when he throws the reins upon the neck of his enthusiasm, and lets himself go. It is so with Giese, the 'cellist, who should surely be ranked as a great player, in contradistinction to what is generally understood by a good one. No amount of technique can be relied on to be up to every emergency by a player who dares everything. When emotional vigor goes beyond a certain pitch, technical perfection is pretty sure to be impaired. The only pertinent question for criticism to answer is, after striking a balance between the loss and gain, whether the game is worth the candle. In the cases of Rubinstein and Giese it seems to us pretty evident that the game is worth the candle, that the gain more than makes up for the loss; and we think this is equally true of our Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikish. Wholly apart from what differences in musical feeling, appreciation and artistic point of view there may be between Mr. Nikisch and his predecessor, the two men are different in no respect so much as in the character of their immediate personal relation to the orchestra. They are conspicuously fine examples of two diametrically opposite schools of conducting. In command over their men, in the power of getting what they want out of the orchestra, we should call them about equal; but in the way and spirit in which they go to work to gain their end, they are as differen as can be. Mr. Gericke was essentially a martinet; he insisted upon the music being played, to every smallest detail, exactly according to his own idea. The orchestra was, in his eyes, nothing more than a keyboard upon which he was to play; no man but himself was to take any initiative whatever; the performance was to be his, through and through, and nothing but his. His mental attitude was purely one of command. Mr. Nikisch, on the other hand, seems less to command than to invite every player in the orchestra to follow him in carrying out his general idea in the best way that the player individually can. He insists, to be sure, upon the main outline of his conception of the music; but beyond that, he leaves the players considerable latitude, and after he has made them grasp his idea, he lets them carry it out in their own way, trusting largely to their individual artistic sense. Thus it comes about that the players under him are not hampered by a continual sense of having to follow a certain fixed pattern with minute exactness, but are allowed that freedom of expression without which no player can ever do his very best. In other words, he exacts obedience, but he still allows the players under him to be themselves, content if every man does his own best. The gain in vigor and vitality of playing is immense, while the lapse from perfect precision, although undeniable, has been, upon the whole, very slight indeed. What might have happened if the orchestra had not already played for five years under Mr. Gericke, and if Mr. Nikisch had been called to assume the sceptre over a less carefully and thoroughly drilled set of men, it is now idle to speculate upon; it is quite enough that Mr. Nikisch actually has an orchestra that he can make do his bidding without a too tedious regard for harassing minutiæ.

As for the "Genoveva" and the Eighth Symphony, they were played most gloriously right; the effect was overwhelming. Never have we heard that wonderful Allegretto given in such perfect sympathy with the true character of the music; it is only in that moderate tempo that the grace, charm, humor and roguish fascination of the music can be done full justice to. Mr. Foote's suite—as far as one can judge of it at a single hearing—is a worthy successor to his first one. The minuet and gavotte are particularly charming, and the whole work impresses one by a certain solidity of style and workmanship. Perhaps one cannot quite escape the feeling that such a work, written in the old dance forms, and for string orchestra, has something of the character of an exercise, and that the composer had his own self-education to a certain extent in view. It is hard to believe that a composer today, and least of all Mr. Foote, sets to work to write music a century, or so, old wholly spontaneously, and for the simple sake of expressing what is in him. Such writing has inevitably something of the flavor of a self-imposed task; in this case, a task admirably performed. Miss Edmands sang Raff's "Traumkönig" very beautifully. The song itself seems rather flimsy both in sentiment and construction, but it is a pleasant sort of music to hear in a dreamy, half attentive way, and the orchestral coloring is delicious. The two charming songs by Brahms were capitally sung and admirably accompanied by Mr. Whelpley. The next programme is: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, in F; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser."

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 24, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave as his orchestral selections the eighth Beethoven symphony, a suite for strings, by Arthur Foote, and the "Genoveve" overture by Schumann, vocal selections being added by Miss Gertrude Edmands, contralto. Mr. Nikisch again suffered in his interpretation and performance of the Beethoven symphony with the models of later years in this particular here. His memory of these works appears to be at fault, if his performances of them are any standard to judge by, and a rigid following of accepted readings of the scores would materially benefit his performances of such standard works. The familiar movements of this masterly composition were given with a lack of finish and questionable taste, and it was difficult to explain the applause called out upon any artistic basis. The lovely allegretto lost much of its grace and beauty in the crude performance given it, and the final movement was equally unsatisfactory. Mr. Gericke's absence is much to be deplored when a Beethoven symphony is to be played at these concerts, and Mr. Nikisch will save many adverse criticisms by a more conservative following of accepted traditions in performing this class of compositions. The opus number of Mr. Foote's suite for strings No. 21, appears to indicate that he has other works still awaiting a hearing by Boston audiences, and this last composition is of so much merit that it is to be hoped his writings will find further place on these programmes during the season. Of the four movements of this suite, prelude, minuetto, air and, gavotte, there is much that can be said in praise, Mr. Foote's work again showing him to be a thoroughly conservative, well schooled musician, fertile in melodious thought, and with a genius for orchestral writing which gives still better promise for the future. The "air" is the most meritorious portion of this suite, being quite in the Bach style, though strictly original in its ideas. The opening portion of the minuetto is bright, piquant and graceful, and the gavotte is in good form and ingeniously scored. The strings of the orchestra show the effect of Mr. Nickisch's control during the few weeks he has had the orchestra, and the composition differs somewhat from his reading of it which was lacking in grace and elegance, and its performance did not have the faultless finish which this section of the band was wont to show in such works in former seasons. The Schumann overture was by far the most satisfying performance of the evening, and was heartily enjoyed. Miss Edmands made an unwise choice in selecting Raff's song, "The Dream King and His Love," for her principal number, as it does not fall easily within her voice, and the singing of the German warble was another error on the singer's part. In the Brahms songs, "Remembrance" and "The Little Dustman," however, Miss Edmands was heard at her best, and her thoroughly artistic delivery of these two charming vocal gems were heartily appreciated. The singer's voice is as pleasing as ever, and her vocal work showed her to be the same conscientious artist as ever. She was cordially greeted, and most enthusiastically applauded for her efforts.

REGISTER,
NEW HAVEN
NOVEMBER 25,

In the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given at the Hyperion commencing December 16, lovers of the best music have an opportunity to listen to the works of the great masters performed by a grand orchestra, which is ranked by competent authorities on a par with the three finest similar organizations in the world.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will take place at the Hyperion December 16, and of course the occasion will bring together about all the music loving people in the town. The Symphony concerts have long been looked upon as events in the musical season. The other concerts will be given January 13, February 10 and March 17.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH,.....CONDUCTOR.
Four Subscription Concerts
AT THE
HYPERION THEATER
Monday Evenings, Dec. 16th, January 13, February 10 and March 17.
Subscription now open at M. Steinert & Son's. Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of four Concerts, $5.00, will be sold to subscribers ONLY, Monday, Dec. 2d.
n19 10dlsu C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The course of Boston Symphony concerts will open at the Hyperion December 18, The other concerts in the course will take place January 13, February 10 and March 17.

Journal and Courier

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Monday, November 25, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A Biographical Sketch of Herr Arthur Nickisch—A Famous Young Kappellmeister—The Personnel of the Orchestra.

There is every indication that the series of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be largely attended. Assurance is given that nothing will be left undone to make these concerts notable events of the musical season and worthy the attention of every lover of classical music. The new feature of the concerts will be the appearance of Herr Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the orchestra. The following sketch of this famous young musician is given by Mr. Arthur Weld of Boston:

Herr Nickisch was born on October 12, 1855, in a small town called Szent-Miklos, in the principality of Lichtenstein. His father occupied the position of head steward and auditor to the prince and was himself an enthusiastic musical amateur. In earliest childhood the boy showed such extraordinary talent that his parents determined to educate him as a musician. He began his studies with the violin, and he mastered this instrument with such ease and so completely that at the age of eight years he appeared in public with most extraordinary success—in fact, the young prodigy received a genuine ovation. His first studies in harmony and organ playing were under the direction of the organist Prochazka, in the neighboring town of Buschtowitz; and in all branches the lad made such remarkable progress as to enable him to enter the Royal Conservatory in Vienna at the unusually early age of eleven.

At Vienna he worked harder than ever, and especially devoted himself to all the technical branches of composition. So great was his success that two years later, (being then only 13 years old) he sent a string sextet to an open competition and was awarded the first prize. He remained at the conservatory eight years, during which time he won many more prizes for his compositions as well as the first prize and silver medal for violin playing. One of his compositions, a cantata for solo, chorus and orchestra, was so successful as to be constantly repeated and, as a special honor and tribute to his abilities as a conductor-composer, on the occasion of his graduating from the conservatory he publicly conducted a symphony. He was immensely popular with his fellow students, among whom were Mottl and Faur, who especially recognized his extraordinary talent for conducting and as a parting gift from his class, he was presented with a magnificent and costly baton.

Immediately after his graduation he applied for a desk among the first violinists at the Royal Opera, and obtaining this honorable position without difficulty, he occupied it during four years, receiving in this way the best possible practical instruction in conducting. During this time he played through an enormous repertoire of operatic and concert music, and had constantly before him the splendid example of such conductors as Richter and Jahn. In 1878 he went with the celebrated manager, Angelo Neuman to Leipzig, and was installed as assistant conductor in the Old Opera House, where at that time Anton Seidl was officiating as chief conductor. He remained in this position a year, drilling the chorus and soloists and conducting the smaller operas and operettas; but Neumann's experience had shown him that he had found a real musical wonder and so he transferred Herr Nikisch to the New Opera House as head conductor, where he has been ever since. He made his debut in this position with one of the most magnificent performances of "Tannhauser" ever heard in Leipzig, and from that moment he has been universally acknowledged as one of the most gifted and important conductors in Europe.

Herr Nikisch has also during these ten years in Leipzig distinguished himself quite as much as a concert conductor as in the theater and he is particularly successful as a programme maker. Under his care and direction the Leipzig theater orchestra has gained a European fame which entitles it to an equal or even superior place to the Gewandhaus orchestra. A performance of the Ninth Symphony, in 1882, is said to have been the most magnificent ever given; while the superb manner in which he conducted the concerts of the last "Tonkuenstler-Versammlung," in 1883, brought him a profusion of orders and decorations from all over the country. He also conducted on many occasions in the Gewandhaus, as Reinecke's substitute, and has also given many remarkably successful concerts with his own theater orchestra. More especially noteworthy, however, is the manner in which he conducted the recent monster concerts of the Liszt society. With them he achieved a success which caused all the noted German critics to acknowledge Arthur Nikisch to be one of the most brilliant and talented living conductors, both in the theater and on the concert stage.

He has received countless offers to leave Leipzig. Frankfort, Vienna, Cassel, Carlsruhe and Mannheim have all vied with one another in unsuccessful attempts to induce him to leave his beloved Leipzig, but it was reserved for Boston, which may now be justly styled the most important art city in the New World, to have finally overcome his scruples and induce him to conquer new fields. The musical world of Leipzig is in genuine distress because it feels only too keenly that it will be impossible to replace him. He has earned a place in the great quartette of conductors—Richter, Levy, Mottl and Nikisch—and between these four geniuses and the second flight there is a wide gap. It remains only for American audiences to show their appreciation of the good fortune which has given them a man whose artistic footsteps can be followed without fear.

The personnel of the orchestra is substantially the same as that of the last two seasons. Mr. Franz Kneisel is retained as concertmeister and Mr. Anton Hekking has been added to the corps of 'cellists. Messrs. Mole and Sautet, whose brilliant playing on the flute and oboe is remembered with pleasure, are still members of the orchestra, and so is that prince of horn players, Xavier Reiter. To add to the enjoyment of those who attend the concerts, analytical programmes will be prepared similar to those which have been received with so much favor in Boston. A copy of these programmes will be mailed before each concert to every subscriber for season tickets.

FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD.

NOVEMBER 26, 1889

CHARMS OF MUSIC.

Gratifying Success of the Boston Symphony Concert.

A large audience heard the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening. The programme was made up of six numbers, four for the orchestra and two for Miss Rose Stewart, soprano, who assisted. Promptly at 8 o'clock, Arthur Nikisch stepped out of the wings and made his way among the 60 musicians to the conductor's stand. Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for warm applause. The fame which he had won as a leader of orchestras in Europe and in this country had preceded him to this city, and it was evident soon after the first strains of the overture had died away that he deserved the praise which had been showered upon him. The musicians were in excellent harmony, and the unisons were as clear and sympathetic as if all the instruments had been one and were performed by one artist. The Norwegian rhapsody and the first movement of the symphony were most generally commended, although it seems a shade of presumption to designate any one or two as the best.

Miss Stewart's perfect composure and the naturalness of her singing won for her many admirers on her previous engagements here. She has a sweet voice, not strong, but very clear. It was a daring thing to attempt a selection with a flute accompaniment, but Miss Stewart sang an aria from the mad scene from "Lucia," accompanied on the flute by Charles Mole, and the effect was delightful. Her second number was a lullaby by Sullivan, and it was beautifully rendered. Continued applause brought the singer out twice to recognize the appreciation of the audience, but it was regretted that she could not be induced to sing just one encore.

The revised programme to which the selection from "Rosamunde" was added yesterday was certainly not too long when it is understood that there shall be no encores, and it would have positively suffered as to length had not that number been added. The annoyance of late comers was successfully avoided by the rule adopted by the management, requesting all who entered after the music began to wait at the door until the first number was completed. If the management could have strangled the villains in the audience who insisted upon marking the time with their feet, the external arrangements of the concert would have been complete.

To the energy and care of O. Elton Borden was much of the success of the concert due, and it is to be hoped that the financial appreciation of his efforts was large enough to warrant him in undertaking to arrange another engagement in the spring. The city cannot have too many such concerts.

1889-90

THE

CRITERION COURSE

OF

MUSICAL AND LITERARY ENTERTAINMENTS

MANAGERS

CHARLES A. ELLIS BURDITT & NORTH

[30]

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening, was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams i a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volumn, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 B flatOpus 23.The work of Mole with the flute and the playing of the first violins in the andant was particularly fine.

Altogether the concert gave great satisfaction to all the audience.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro; the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

Daily News.

FALL RIVER, MASS.

TUESDAY, NOV. 26, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 28." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumental music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audien es were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture The close was given magni cently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and signi cance and the great atray of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in D minor and Beethoven's over ure, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of offerings.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 30, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last concert went off much as the rehearsal had promised, so far as the earlier numbers were concerned, Mr. Foote's suite moving a little more smoothly and Miss Edmands making a decided success with "The Little Dustman" song of Raff, which was better in style and distinctness of enunciation than either of the others; for the "Dream King," she received a hearty recall, which her personal favor and the natural beauty of her voice won rather than the interest of the song or her manner of rendering it. The symphony, Beethoven's Eighth, was a disappointment to whoever had expected from him so unusual, surprising and questionable a reading as that with which he set the town and the cities agog when he gave the Fifth a fortnight ago. But for a few trifling relaxations of time, here and there, he adhered to those same principles of reading which have come to be accepted as the best and the nearest to what Beethoven may be believed to have desired, and at the same time he infused wherever there was proper opportunity for it the personal independence and verve which makes one forgive him even when he feels that he is most astray in his views. In the second and third movements—the favorite allegretto scherzando and the tempo di minuetto—he caught the brightest and most expressive measure of time and the most charming accent, so that the delicate, cheery gayety of the one and the easy buoyancy of the other were presented to perfection. Mr. Nikisch thus clearly demonstrated that his departures from convention are not accidents or the effect of casual feeling, but that they proceed from conviction and are under his control. There was here and there in this performance, as there had been in the earlier numbers, some roughness of tone and some sudden over-earnest outbursts of single voices, which made one wish for an instant that the repressive and reproving hand of Mr. Gericke held the baton; but a moment later one was ready to condone these for the sake of the greater sincerity, the deeper warmth and the greater humanity of the playing.

The audience of this evening will have for once the chance to take their symphony as soon as they are settled, fresh and wide-awake in their seats, for the second number of the programme will be the third of Brahms, which is probably the most agreeable one of his writing so far as the average auditor is concerned, the first being assigned to the overture of "Der Freischütz." Of this symphony Mr. Nikisch gave yesterday afternoon a temperate and lucid reading, and yet managed to impart an especial richness of tonality to it all. Mr. Gericke was very successful, it will be remembered, with the symphonies of Brahms, his strong, cool intellectuality keeping the thoughts ever obvious, and his firm technical control insuring balance of parts and exact rhythmical distinction. Mr. Nikisch treated the work more romantically by enforcing more contrasts of color and by relaxing the time somewhat toward the close of the first movement and not taking it up at its destined speed when beginning the last, but his grasp upon the themes was sure and his exposition of them through the orchestra well marked, positive and coherent. The music of Brahms being essentially modern, although it does now and then smack of earlier styles, can well bear so much moderate elasticity of interpretation as Mr. Nikisch allowed himself in these points, and it is possibly an advantage for the unprofessional auditor to have the intricate polyphony of those movements presented with some concession; something of brio, of dash and of excitement may fade out of the general effect, but there is a gain in distinctness of enunciation and consequently in easy apprehension. The beautiful andante with its suggestion of the hymn in "Zampa" and the poco allegretto were delightful to listen to, such were their suavity of tone and their purity of phrasing. The overture was exquisitely read; those mysterious murmurings of the early part were scarcely more than whispered, the horn quartette was exceptionally smooth and placid, and the final allegro, so often hurried and hustled along into a presto, was kept so well in hand by Mr. Nikisch that all its graciousness and delicate beauty were preserved. The remaining numbers of the programme are Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture; these we could not hear yesterday, but it is safe to assume that as the one is unqualifiedly romantic and the other so widely dramatic and illustrative, Mr. Nikisch, following his moods, as is his wont, will make them vastly interesting and intensely effective.

The programme for next week stands thus arranged: Haydn, Symphony in C major (L'Ours); Brahms, Concerto for Violin in D, Op. 77 (first time in Boston); Schubert, Symphony in B minor (unfinished); Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House." Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1889.

LAST EVENING'S SYMPHONY.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F, "Les Preludes" by Liszt, and the overture to Tannhäuser, were the well-known works performed last evening at the Symphony concert. Mr. Nikisch is in his element with the music of Brahms, Liszt and Wagner, and their works were magnificently played.

1889-90

THE

CRITERION COURSE

OF

MUSICAL AND LITERARY ENTERTAINMENTS

MANAGERS

CHARLES A. ELLIS BURDITT & NORTH

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams i a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volumn, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 B flatOpus 23. The work of Mole with the flute and the playing of the first violins in the andant was particularly fine.

Altogether the concert gave great satisfaction to all the audience.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3.....Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes".....Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

Daily EVENING News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

TUESDAY, NOV. 26, 1889.

The Symphony Concert.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 23." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumentral music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audien es were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magni cently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and signi cance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in D minor and Beethoven's over ure, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of offerings.

The Beacon.

[30]

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 30, 1889

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last concert went off much as the rehearsal had promised, so far as the earlier numbers were concerned, Mr. Foote's suite moving a little more smoothly and Miss Edmands making a decided success with "The Little Dustman" song of Raff, which was better in style and distinctness of enunciation than either of the others; for the "Dream King," she received a hearty recall, which her personal favor and the natural beauty of her voice won rather than the interest of the song or her manner of rendering it. The symphony, Beethoven's Eighth, was a disappointment to whoever had expected from him so unusual, surprising and questionable a reading as that with which he set the town and the cities agog when he gave the Fifth a fortnight ago. But for a few trifling relaxations of time, here and there, he adhered to those same principles of reading which have come to be accepted as the best and the nearest to what Beethoven may be believed to have desired, and at the same time he infused wherever there was proper opportunity for it the personal independence and verve which makes one forgive him even when he feels that he is most astray in his views. In the second and third movements—the favorite allegretto scherzando and the tempo di minuetto—he caught the brightest and most expressive measure of time and the most charming accent, so that the delicate, cheery gayety of the one and the easy buoyancy of the other were presented to perfection. Mr. Nikisch thus clearly demonstrated that his departures from convention are not accidents or the effect of casual feeling, but that they proceed from conviction and are under his control. There was here and there in this performance, as there had been in the earlier numbers, some roughness of tone and some sudden over-earnest outbursts of single voices, which made one wish for an instant that the repressive and reproving hand of Mr. Gericke held the baton; but a moment later one was ready to condone these for the sake of the greater sincerity, the deeper warmth and the greater humanity of the playing.

The audience of this evening will have for once the chance to take their symphony as soon as they are settled, fresh and wide-awake in their seats, for the second number of the programme will be the third of Brahms, which is probably the most agreeable one of his writing so far as the average auditor is concerned, the first being assigned to the overture of "Der Freischütz." Of this symphony Mr. Nikisch gave yesterday afternoon a temperate and lucid reading, and yet managed to impart an especial richness of tonality to it all. Mr. Gericke was very successful, it will be remembered, with the symphonies of Brahms, his strong, cool intellectuality keeping the thoughts ever obvious, and his firm technical control insuring balance of parts and exact rhythmical distinction. Mr. Nikisch treated the work more romantically by enforcing more contrasts of color and by relaxing the time somewhat toward the close of the first movement and not taking it up at its destined speed when beginning the last, but his grasp upon the themes was sure and his exposition of them through the orchestra well marked, positive and coherent. The music of Brahms being essentially modern, although it does now and then smack of earlier styles, can well bear so much moderate elasticity of interpretation as Mr. Nikisch allowed himself in these points, and it is possibly an advantage for the unprofessional auditor to have the intricate polyphony of those movements presented with some concession; something of brio, of dash and of excitement may fade out of the general effect, but there is a gain in distinctness of enunciation and consequently in easy apprehension. The beautiful andante with its suggestion of the hymn in "Zampa" and the poco allegretto were delightful to listen to, such were their suavity of tone and their purity of phrasing. The overture was exquisitely read; those mysterious murmurings of the early part were scarcely more than whispered, the horn quartette was exceptionally smooth and placid, and the final allegro, so often hurried and hustled along into a presto, was kept so well in hand by Mr. Nikisch that all its graciousness and delicate beauty were preserved. The remaining numbers of the programme are Liszt's "Preludes" and the "Tannhäuser" overture; these we could not hear yesterday, but it is safe to assume that as the one is unqualifiedly romantic and the other so widely dramatic and illustrative, Mr. Nikisch, following his moods, as is his wont, will make them vastly interesting and intensely effective.

The programme for next week stands thus arranged: Haydn, Symphony in C major (L'Ours); Brahms, Concerto for Violin in D, Op. 77 (first time in Boston); Schubert, Symphony in B minor (unfinished); Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House." Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1889.

LAST EVENING'S SYMPHONY.

Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz," Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F, "Les Preludes" by Liszt, and the overture to Tannhäuser, were the well-known works performed last evening at the Symphony concert. Mr. Nikisch is in his element with the music of Brahms, Liszt and Wagner, and their works were magnificently played.

1889. MECHANICS HALL. 1890.

THE

CRITERION COURSE

OF

TEN PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENTS,

COMPRISING

FIVE GRAND CONCERTS, and the full course of

FIVE STODDARD LECTURES.

———.·. .·.———

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5,
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 10,
FRIDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 27,
THURSDAY EVENINGS, JANUARY 2, 9, 16,
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 21,
THURSDAY EVENINGS, JAN. 30, FEB. 6, 20.

———.·. .·.———

Course Tickets, each, including a Reserved Seat for the ten evenings, $3.00, $4.00, $5.00, according to location.

The Sale of Course Tickets will begin on Friday Morning, November 29, at Mechanics Hall Box Office, under the management of C. L. Gorham & Co. Remaining tickets will be sold at their store.

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:
Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams in a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volumn, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 [illegible] the work of Sitt with the [illegible] was a good selection.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:
Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet shipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

[illegible] Symphony Concerts.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 28." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumentral music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audience were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magnificently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in B minor and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of [illegible]

BOSTON, SA[illegible]

THE SY[illegible]

The last conc[illegible] hearsal had pro[illegible] numbers were [illegible] moving a little[illegible] Edmands makin[illegible] "The Little Dus[illegible] was better in st[illegible] ciation than ei[illegible] "Dream King," [illegible] which her pers[illegible] beauty of her vo[illegible] est of the song o[illegible] The symphony, [illegible] disappointment t[illegible] him so unusual, [illegible] a reading as that [illegible] and the cities ag[illegible] fortnight ago. B[illegible] tions of time, her[illegible] those same princi[illegible] come to be acc[illegible] nearest to what [illegible] to have desired, a[illegible] fused wherever th[illegible] for it the person[illegible] which makes one [illegible] feels that he is m[illegible] the second and th[illegible] allegretto scherzan[illegible] —he caught the b[illegible] measure of time a[illegible] cent, so that the d[illegible] one and the easy [illegible] presented to per[illegible] clearly demonstra[illegible] convention are no[illegible] casual feeling, but[illegible] viction and are un[illegible] here and there in[illegible] had been in the ea[illegible] ness of tone and [illegible] outbursts of singl[illegible] wish for an instan[illegible] proving hand of [illegible] but a moment late[illegible] these for the sake [illegible] deeper warmth an[illegible] the playing.

The audience of [illegible] once the chance to [illegible] as they are settl[illegible] their seats, for the[illegible] gramme will be th[illegible] probably the most [illegible] so far as the avera[illegible] first being assigned [illegible] Freischütz." Of t[illegible] gave yesterday af[illegible] lucid reading, and [illegible] especial richness o[illegible] Gericke was very a[illegible] bered, with the sy[illegible] strong, cool in[illegible] thoughts ever obvi[illegible] control insuring ba[illegible] rhythmical distinct[illegible] the work more [illegible] more contrasts of c[illegible] time somewhat tow[illegible] movement and not [illegible] speed when beg[illegible] his grasp upon [illegible] and his expositio[illegible] orchestra well m[illegible] herent. The mus[illegible] sentially modern, [illegible] and then smack o[illegible] bear so much [illegible] interpretation as M[illegible] self in these points[illegible] vantage for the unp[illegible] the intricate polyph[illegible] presented with som[illegible] of brio, of dash and[illegible] out of the general [illegible] in distinctness of en[illegible] ly in easy apprehe[illegible] dante with its sug[illegible] "Zampa" and the p[illegible] ful to listen to, su[illegible] tone and their purit[illegible] ture was exquisitely[illegible] murmurings of the [illegible] more than whispered[illegible] exceptionally smooth[illegible] allegro, so often hu[illegible] into a presto, was kep[illegible] Nikisch that all its [illegible] beauty were preserv[illegible] bers of the programm[illegible] and the "Tannhäus[illegible] could not hear yeste[illegible] sume that as the one [illegible] and the other so wid[illegible] tive, Mr. Nikisch, fo[illegible] his wont, will make [illegible] and intensely effectiv[illegible]

The programme f[illegible] arranged: Haydn, [illegible] (L'Ours); Brahms, [illegible] Op. 77 (first time in [illegible] phony in B minor [illegible] Overture, "Dedicati[illegible] loist, Mr. Franz Knei[illegible]

THE BOS[illegible]

BOSTON, SUNDA[illegible]

LAST EVENI[illegible]

Weber's overture [illegible] Brahm's Symphony [illegible] by Liszt, and the ove[illegible] the well-known work[illegible] at the Symphony c[illegible] his element with the[illegible] and Wagner, and th[illegible] cently played.

BELIEVING that the time has arrived for the establishment of a course of entertainments in Worcester, that shall combine the highest enjoyment with a rational and profitable use of the hours given to it, the undersigned have organized the Criterion Course of Public Entertainments. The list of attractions which they offer in pursuance of their design, is given in the pages of this prospectus. They propose to give a series of ten evenings, equally divided between music and literature. They have endeavored to present the worthiest and most noted representative attractions in each line, and hope for the approval and patronage of the Worcester public.

It is the intention of the management, should the present enterprise find public favor, to make this series the beginning of an annual course, and they base their expectations of success not only upon the high reputation of the artists and organizations represented, but also upon the public appreciation of the obvious fact, that only by the selection of eminent talent can they hope for the permanent establishment of the Criterion Course.

CHARLES A. ELLIS,
Manager of the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BURDITT & NORTH,
Managers of
THE STODDARD LECTURES.

LIST OF ARTISTS.

The management deem themselves fortunate in being able to announce the appearance of the following distinguished artists and organizations:

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.
FRANZ KNEISEL, Concert Meister.

MASTER OTTO HEGNER,
The Wonderful Youthful Piano Virtuoso, Accompanied by Madame L. PEMBERTON HINCKS,
AND
THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB,
By special arrangement with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau.

Mdlle. CLEMENTINE DEVERE, Soprano,
Mdlle. MARIE GROEBL, Contralto,
Mr. W. H. RIEGER, Tenor,
Sig. CLEMENTE BOLOGNA, Basso Cantante.

MR. JOHN L. STODDARD, in the full course of
THE STODDARD LECTURES.

Negotiations are also well advanced for a Brilliant Musical Attraction for the evening of February 6, which will be definitely announced in a few days.

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:
Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiasms in a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volume, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 B flat [illegible] The work of Mole with the flute was the playing of the [illegible] violins in the and it was particularly fine. [illegible] Boston have great [illegible] and the audience

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:
Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effective. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audience were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magnificently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in B minor and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of selections.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effective. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audience were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magnificently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in B minor and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of selections.

THE BOS

BOSTON, SUNDA

LAST EVENI

Weber's overture
Brahm's Symphony
by Liszt, and the ove
the well-known work
at the Symphony c
his element with th
and Wagner, and t
cently played.

THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 5,

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE COMPLETE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

It is not necessary to multiply words in description and commendation of this superb organization. Thanks to the liberality with which it was founded, and has always been supported by the eminent citizens to whom Boston is indebted for its establishment and maintenance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra long since became the foremost one in America, and now ranks on a par with the four most famous orchestras of Europe. Each year has added to its efficiency, and under the magnetic baton of its present conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch, who was tempted from high and honorable station in Leipsic, its concerts are recognized as among the great musical occasions of America.

A SECOND CONCERT BY THIS ORCHESTRA

ON

THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 20,

will form a worthy close to the CRITERION COURSE.

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 10.

The second concert of the CRITERION COURSE will introduce to the residents of Worcester, the wonderful Boy Piano Virtuoso, whose services are secured through exclusive arrangements with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel, and Grau.

MASTER OTTO HEGNER,

At rare intervals there appears a genius so gifted as to confound all human calculations. Such a one is Otto Hegner, who at the age of thirteen is recognized as one of the great pianists of the world, eliciting from the most cultivated critics of New York and Boston, the highest commendation not only of his wonderful precocity but for his positive and absolute ability measured by the severest standards. The sensation created in these cities was even surpassed at his concerts in London.

Master HEGNER will be assisted by the well-known and justly famed

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB,

AND

MRS. L. PEMBERTON HINCKS.

The high reputation of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club has been earned by years of professional work in the leading cities of the United States, from east to west, from north to south.

Mrs. HINCKS has accompanied Master Hegner in his concert tours, and has proved a welcome acquisition to the ranks of soprano vocalists. Her first success won among social friends in the cottages at Newport and Lenox has been repeated wherever she has appeared.

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:
Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams in a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volume, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia, is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No 2 [illegible] The work of Mons with the flute and the playing of the first violins in the andante was particularly fine. [illegible] concert was set [illegible] the audience.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:
Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

The Symphony Concert.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 28." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumentral music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audiences were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magnificently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in B minor and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of [illegible]

THE BOS

BOSTON, SUNDA

LAST EVENI

Weber's overture
Brahm's Symphony
by Liszt, and the ove
the well-known work
at the Symphony c his element with thi and Wagner, and t
cently played.

BOSTON SA

THE SYM

The last concer
hearsal had pron numbers were c moving a little Edmands making
"The Little Dust
was better in styl
ciation than eith
"Dream King," s which her perso beauty of her voic est of the song or
The symphony,
disappointment to
him so unusual, s
a reading as that
and the cities agog
fortnight ago. Bu
tions of time, here
those same princip come to be acce nearest to what B
to have desired, a fused wherever the
for it the persona which makes one f
feels that he is mo
the second and thi
allegretto scherzand
—he caught the br
measure of time an cent, so that the de
one and the easy b
presented to perf
clearly demonstrat convention are not casual feeling, but viction and are unc
here and there in had been in the ear
ness of tone and outbursts of single wish for an instant proving hand of M
but a moment later
these for the sake o
deeper warmth and
the playing.

The audience of t once the chance to t
as they are settle their seats, for the gramme will be the probably the most
so far as the averag
first being assigned Freischütz." Of th gave yesterday aft
lucid reading, and y
especial richness of Gericke was very s bered, with the sy strong, cool int
thoughts ever obvi
control insuring ba rhythmical distincti
the work more r
more contrasts of co
time somewhat towa
movement and not t
speed when beg
his grasp upon and his expositio orchestra well m
herent. The mus
sentially modern,
and then smack of
bear so much interpretation as M
self in these points,
vantage for the unpr
the intricate polyph presented with som
of brio, of dash and
out of the general e in distinctness of en
ly in easy apprehen
dante with its sugg
"Zampa" and the p ful to listen to, su tone and their purity
ture was exquisitely murmurings of the e
more than whispered
exceptionally smooth
allegro, so often hu
into a presto, was kep
Nikisch that all its beauty were preserv
bers of the programm
and the "Tannhäus
could not hear yeste
sume that as the one
and the other so wide tive, Mr. Nikisch, fo
his wont, will make and intensely effectiv

The programme fo
arranged: Haydn,
(L'Ours); Brahms, C
Op. 77 (first time in phony in B minor
Overture, "Dedicatio
loist, Mr. Franz Knei

FRIDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 27.

The third evening of the CRITERION COURSE will inaugurate the Eleventh Annual Series of

THE STODDARD LECTURES,

with Mr. JOHN L. STODDARD'S charming and finely illustrated lecture on

THE CASTLE-BORDERED RHINE.

The series will be continued on

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 9, 16.

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 21.

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 30.

The Subjects being:

NAPOLEON — FROM CORSICA TO THE THRONE.

NAPOLEON — FROM THE THRONE TO ST. HELENA.

BERLIN IN 1889.

THE SPLENDORS OF SWITZERLAND.

occupying the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth evenings.

It is scarcely necessary to say a word in commendation of the superbly illustrated and eloquently delivered lectures of

JOHN L. STODDARD.

They are recognized as the standard of bright, instructive entertainment, and Mr. Stoddard is unquestionably the most popular lecturer this country has ever known. The elegant brochure issued expressly for the patrons of the Stoddard Lectures accompanies these pages, and renders further comment or description unnecessary. Suffice it to say that not in the largest auditoriums of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, or any other cities has it been found possible to accommodate the throngs which have this year pressed for admittance.

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 2.

It is with great pleasure that the management announce for the Fourth in their series, the gifted Prima Donna Soprano

SIGNORINA CLEMENTINE DE VERE,

one of the most famous vocalists now before the public, and whose success at the festival will be vividly remembered, in a

GRAND ITALIAN OPERATIC CONCERT, assisted by the following coterie of artists:

MDLLE. MARIE GROEBL,

Prima Donna Contralto, who made a notable success with Campanini, in his celebrated concert tour of 1887-8.

MR. W. H. REIGER,

one of America's distinguished Tenors.

SIGNOR CLEMENTE BOLOGNA,

The Artistic Italian Basso Cantante.

No music more surely reaches the popular heart than the choice gems from the best Italian Operas.

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS.,

EVENING, NOVEMBER 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiasm in a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volumn, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 B flat Opus 27. The work of Mole with the flute and the playing of the first violins in the [illegible] was particularly fine.

[illegible] for the concert even [illegible] to it the audience.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of the noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

The Symphony Concerts.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semi-circle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvelous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 28." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumentral music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audience were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magnificently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the 'Pilgrim's Chorus' made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in D minor and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of

THE BOS

BOSTON, SUNDA

LAST EVENI

Weber's overture
Brahm's Symphony
by Liszt, and the ov
the well-known wor
at the Symphony
his element with th
and Wagner, and t
cently played.

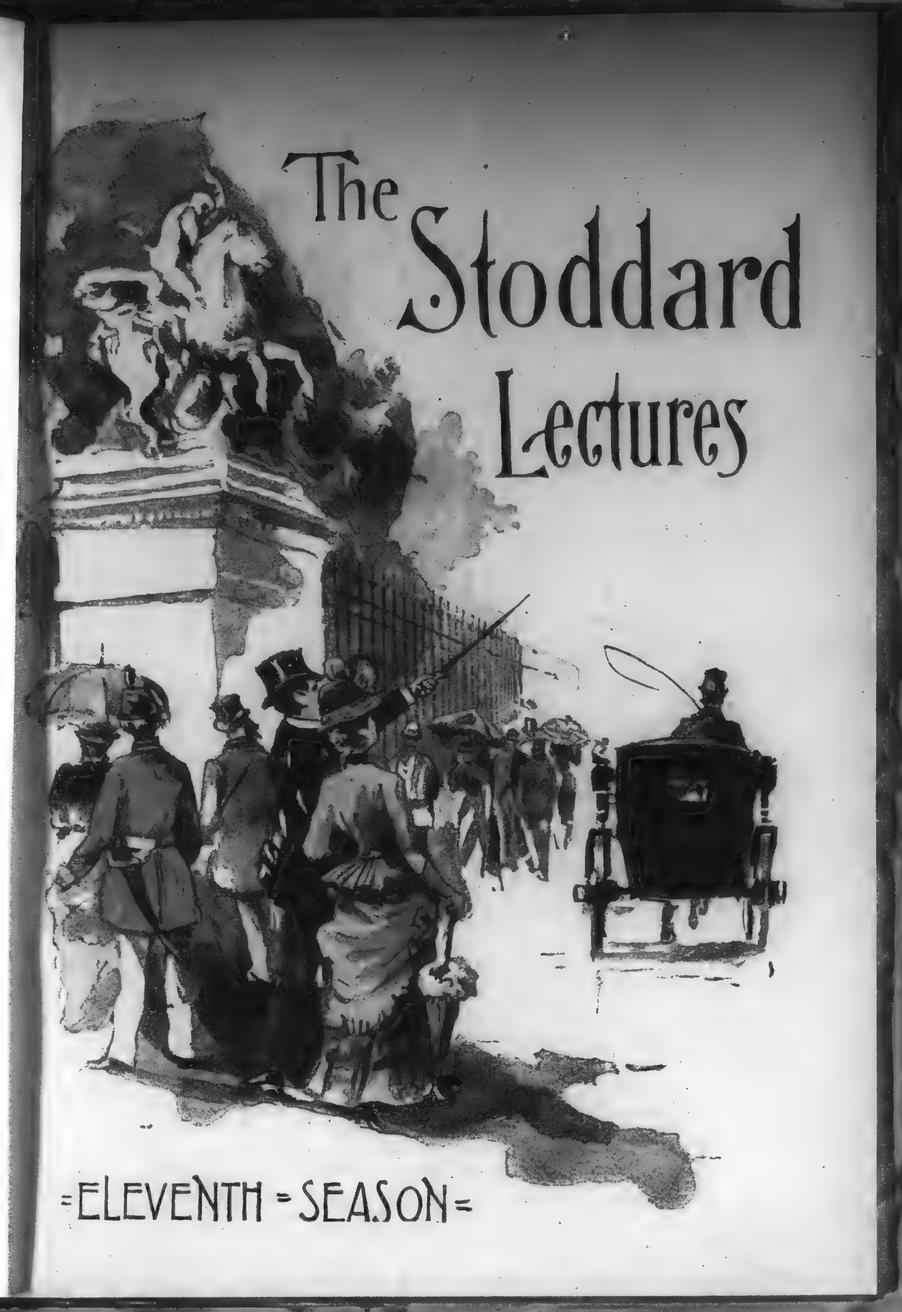
THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 6.

For the Ninth Entertainment of the CRITERION COURSE, the management is under negotiation to present a

BRILLIANT AND SUPERIOR ATTRACTION,

which it is not able, at the time this book goes to press, to announce positively.

Suffice it to say that when definite arrangements are completed, the public of Worcester will recognize the high character of the attraction, and will not question the wisdom of the management in fully completing the engagement before positively announcing it.



THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams in a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volume, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The Symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 in B flat, Op. 43. The work of Mons. with the [illegible] of the flute [illegible] was [illegible] great [illegible]

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

The Symphony Concert.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 43." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumental music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audience were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magnificently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in B minor and Beethoven's overture "Dedication of the House," complete the list of

THE BOS

BOSTON, SUNDA

LAST EVENIN

Weber's overture
Brahm's Symphony N
by Liszt, and the over the well-known work
at the Symphony co
his element with the
and Wagner, and th
cently played.

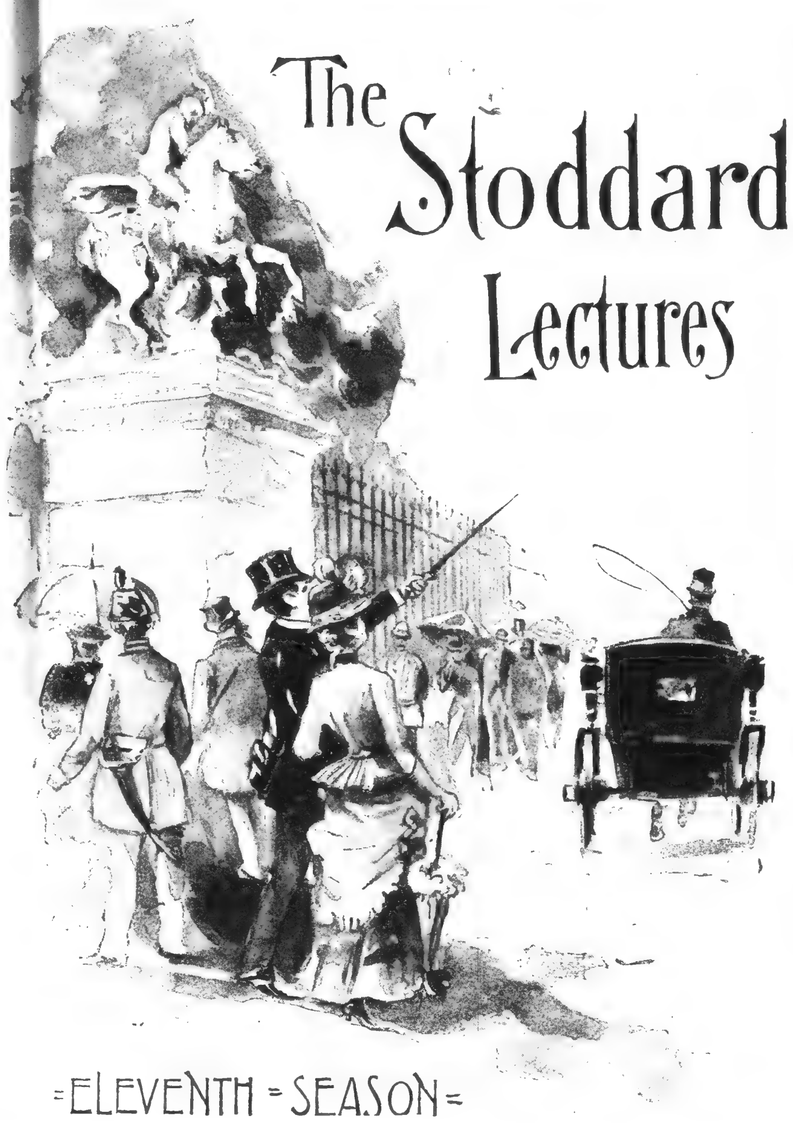
THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 6.

For the Ninth Entertainment of the CRITERION COURSE, the management is under negotiation to present a

BRILLIANT AND SUPERIOR ATTRACTION,

which it is not able, at the time this book goes to press, to announce positively.

Suffice it to say that when definite arrangements are completed, the public of Worcester will recognize the high character of the attraction, and will not question the wisdom of the management in fully completing the engagement before positively announcing it.



The Stoddard Lectures

=ELEVENTH=SEASON=

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS.,

EVENING, NOVEMBER 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams i a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volumn, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 B flatOpus 23. The work of Mole with the flute and the playing of the first violins in the andant was particularly fine.

Altogether the concert gave great satisfaction to all the audience.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3 ..... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measures! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

Daily Evening News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

TUESDAY, NOV. 26, 1889.

The Symphony Concerts.

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 23." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumentral music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audien es were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given magni cently—we have never heard the accompaniment to the "Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and signi cance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in D minor and Beethoven's over ure, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of offerings.

The

BOSTON, SA

THE SYM

The last concer hearsal had pro
numbers were c
moving a little Edmands makin
"The Little Dust
was better in styl
ciation than eith
"Dream King," s which her perso beauty of her voi
est of the song or
The symphony, disappointment t
him so unusual, s
a reading as that and the cities ago
fortnight ago. Bu
tions of time, here
those same princi
come to be acce nearest to what l
to have desired, a fused wherever th for it the person which makes one feels that he is m
the second and thi
allegretto scherzand
—he caught the br measure of time a cent, so that the de
one and the easy b
presented to per clearly demonstrat
convention are not casual feeling, but viction and are und
here and there in had been in the ea
ness of tone and outbursts of single wish for an instant proving hand of M
but a moment later
these for the sake
deeper warmth and
the playing.

The audience of once the chance to
as they are settle their seats, for the gramme will be the probably the most
so far as the averag
first being assigned Freischütz." Of th
gave yesterday aft
lucid reading, and y
especial richness of Gericke was very su bered, with the sym strong, cool int
thoughts ever obvi control insuring bal
rhythmical distincti
the work more r
more contrasts of co
time somewhat towa
movement and not t
speed when beg his grasp upon and his expositio
orchestra well m
herent. The mus
sentially modern,
and then smack of bear so much interpretation as M
self in these points,
vantage for the unpr
the intricate polypho presented with som
of brio, of dash and
out of the general e in distinctness of en
ly in easy apprehen
dante with its sugg
"Zampa" and the po
ful to listen to, suc
tone and their purity
ture was exquisitely murmurings of the e
more than whispered
exceptionally smooth
allegro, so often hu
into a presto, was kep
Nikisch that all its g beauty were preserve
bers of the programm
and the "Tannhäus
could not hear yeste
sume that as the one
and the other so wide
tive, Mr. Nikisch, fo
his wont, will make and intensely effective

The programme fo
arranged: Haydn,
(L'Ours); Brahms, C
Op. 77 (first time in
phony in B minor Overture, "Dedicatio
loist, Mr. Franz Kneis

THE BOS

BOSTON, SUNDAY

LAST EVENIN

Weber's overture
Brahm's Symphony N
by Liszt, and the over the well-known works
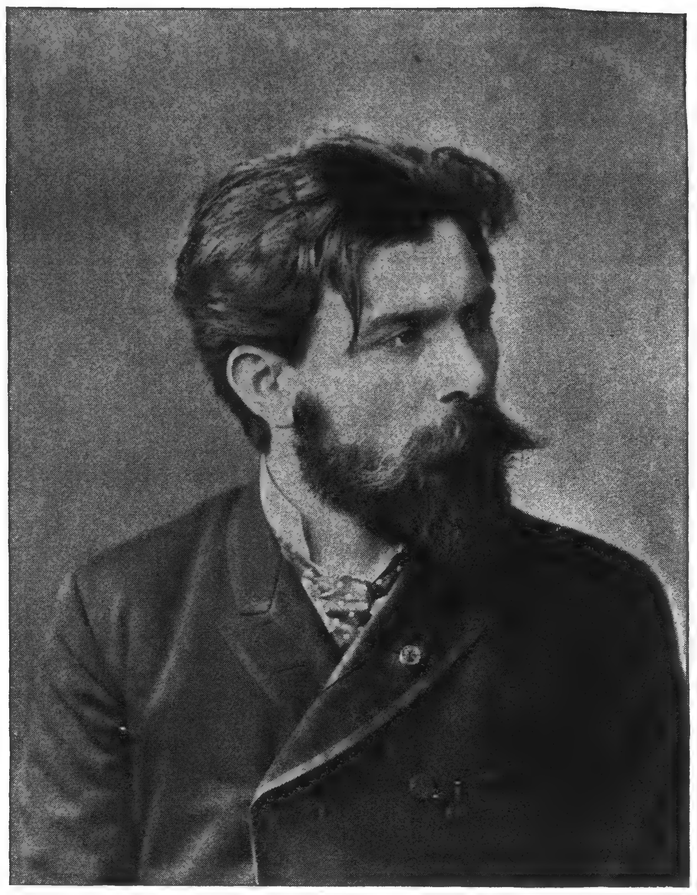
at the Symphony co
his element with the
and Wagner, and the
cently played.



ARTHUR NIKISCH.

L. BARTA & CO. PRINTERS, BOSTON.

THE DAILY GLOBE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., EVENING, NOVEMBER 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Last Evening at the Academy.

The Symphony concert last evening was a rare musical feast for this city and O. Elton Borden, through whose efforts the services of the Symphony company were secured, is to be congratulated on the very successful arrangement and result of the concert.

The following was the programme:

Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendellsohn
Aria, Mad Scene from "Lucia," Donizetti
(Flute Obligato by Mons. Chas. Mole.)
Miss Rose Stewart.
Entr'acte from Ballet Music to Rosamunde," Schubert.
Norwegian Rhapsody, Svendsen
Lullaby, A. Sullivan.
Miss Rose Stewart.
Symphony, No. 2, Volkmann.
Allegro Vivace, Allegretto, Andantino, Allegro, Allegro Vivace, Piu Mosso, Presto.

Herr Nikisch came heralded by report of his fascinating methods, by the great personal influence he wields over his orchestra and by the very radical interpretations he has given to works whose rendition is fixed by usage. His entrance was the signal for applause but the impression he made last evening is rather hard to distinctly define. But it is an assured fact that few conductors have handled the Symphony performance with such facility and lack of laboriousness as Nikisch did. The programme was lacking in the richer and more sublime features, and illustrated moreperfectly the lighter movements. Nikisch's interpretation of the daintiest passages was perfection itself and in the approaches to grandeur his complete control of the orchestra was very marked. The most satisfactory selection was Svendsen's "Rhapsody."

Rhapsodies never fail to arouse enthusiams i a Fall River audience. In this, the wildness of the Hungarian composition was replaced by stronger, more even movements, with a light flute introduction to the violin crescendos that was extremely beautiful.

Miss Stewart simply captured the audience. Her voice is not and never can be strong and heavy in volumn, but in execution and sweetness nothing can approach nearer the ideal. It is like a beautiful flute in the hands of a genuine artist. The mad scene from Lucia is not calculated to evoke the most sympathetic tones but it gave Miss Stewart an opportunity for fine execution that she improved. In the passage with Mons. Mole's flute obligato the notes as sung by Miss Stewart could hardly be distinguished from the notes of the flute. In Sullivan's "Lullaby" all the dainty sweetness of her voice had full sway, and it was like an echo from dreamland. In spite of continued recalls Miss Stewart declined to reward her admirers with more than the numbers on the programme.

The symphony was Volkmann's No. 2 B flatOpus 23. The work of Mole with the flute and the playing of the first violins in the andant was particularly fine.

Altogether the concert gave great satisfaction to all the audience.

Daily Evening News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

TUESDAY, NOV. 26, 1889.

The Symphony Concerts

Among her most valued institutions, cultured Boston proudly gives the Symphony Orchestra a prominent position. This is a compliment to great worth, for the orchestra which has been in existence for nine years, has elevated the standard of orchestral playing to the point where it is now the leading organization of the kind in the music circles of America, and ranks with the best of European orchestras. The 80 men, who play under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the eminent Hungarian artist and leader, have been selected with great care from the best orchestras of both continents, and in the character of their work and the unity of their movements, they have reached the highest level of their art.

The 24 concerts given by the orchestra in Boston during the winter season keep the members busy with rehearsals and their regular concerts; but occasionally a portion of the number are able to make a short trip for concert purposes, and the community that receives them is indeed fortunate. Fall River had this privilege last evening, and the splendid audience which assembled in the Academy was appreciative and enthusiastic in the enjoyment of a rich musical feast.

There were 50 musicians in the semicircle when Mr. Nikisch assumed his position, last evening, and the first selection, "The Overture to Fingal's Cave," by Mendelssohn, was given with delightful harmony, precision and pure tone. There was nothing boisterous about it, and therein was its charm. Mr. Nikisch, who has a marvellous musical memory and knows many of the great scores by heart, conducted without the score before him and was able to impart his own artistic individuality to the performance. There were four orchestral numbers on the programme, which included the "Entr' Acte from ballet music to Rosamunde," by Schubert; a "Norwegian Rhapsody," by Svendsen, and Volkmann's "Symphony No. 2, in B flat, from Opus 23." It was a quartette of selections in which themes of great intellectuality prevailed, yet there was much in them to catch the popular ear and enthuse the large company. Nothing finer in the way of instrumentral music has ever been heard here. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Rose Stewart, who was heard in Fall River for the first time since her studies abroad and her more recent recovery from prolonged illness. Her voice, though light, is very sweet, and its wide range and Miss Stewart's wonderful abilities in execution were more admired than ever. Her tones were pure and pleasing and her numbers: "The Mad Scene from Lucia," and the less difficult "Lullaby Song," by Sullivan, were rendered with such fidelity to detail and with so much of intelligent expression that she was recalled twice at the close of each selection.

The concert was brief in its duration, and at its close the orchestra returned to Boston by special train.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the eighth Symphony concert on Saturday night was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3.....Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes".....Liszt
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner

It will be noticed that this programme gave Mr. Nikisch an admirable opportunity for the display of his peculiar talent for dramatic conducting, and it is needless to observe that he took advantage of his opportunity to the utmost. Indeed, in some respects the concert of Saturday evening was the most successful of the series thus far, and the audience were more liberal than usual with their applause. The "Freischütz" overture was performed with splendid fire and vigor. The mellow horns in introduction (the third and fourth horns particularly well played); the passionate clarinet passage in the allegro: the rushing scales for the violins—all played with the most evident enjoyment by the orchestra. It seemed that the beginning of the allegro was somewhat slow, but not enough so to injure its vitality. The "Tannhäuser" overture, of all the works thus far performed this season, is the best one for the display of orchestral virtuosity, and its performance under Mr. Nikisch was a tone picture of the utmost vividness. One seemed to see the slow procession of pilgrims winding through the valley, the whirling orgies of the Venusberg, the heroic figure of Tannhäuser chanting the praise of the goddess before his very eyes. The violas quite distinguished themselves with their figure which begins the allegro, and the brass rang out most nobly in the final climax. Just here a striking effect was produced by emphasizing a few notes in the horn parts, which, though unimportant in themselves, came out with great effect.

One could have wished for a little more appetite for music than it is possible to have after a symphonic poem by Liszt, especially when it is to be served as well as this overture was, but German programmes, like German dinners, take an unlimited digestion for granted. Liszt's "Preludes" sounds less like a pianoforte piece scored for a band than any of his other symphonic and unsymphonic poems. It was quite apparent that the conductor had not studied it with Mr. Ad Neuendorf as suggested by a morning contemporary. However, the piece did not seem to lose by this neglect and a more brilliant performance could hardly have been desired. One of the three flutes was slightly out of tune and the first trumpet slipped up (or down) on one of his little toots in the finale. Sometimes we have imagined that these accidents are getting to be more frequent than formerly.

There were many high premiums paid for seats vacant on Saturday evening, which may be accounted for in one word. That word is Brahms. The Bostonese will talk Brahms—attend symphony lessons on Brahms—patronize Brahms—select a laurel wreath of appropriate size for Brahms without even waiting for him to die—but they will not listen to Brahms if they can help it, unless, indeed, it be the Hungarian dances, which are not Brahms at all but only Brahms cooking, as one may say. The usual exodus of cultured shell-like ears when a Brahms symphony is last on the programme was frustrated in this instance by placing it at the beginning. It is safe to say that if Mr. Nikisch gives us many more Brahms performances like that of Saturday we shall begin to like Brahms, in spirit and in truth, as well as to pretend to. We have surely never had the meaning of this noble and beautiful work made so clear to us before. Many spots which have always seemed harsh and discordant were not only toned down, but invested with a new meaning and interest. Even the spasmodic finale went with great smoothness, and what sublime serenity is in those closing measnres! Mr. Nikisch received a deserved ovation at the close of the symphony. If he will now give us the Brahms in C minor he may look out for another one.

Boston Sunday Globe.

TWENTY-FOUR PAGES.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Weber, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Represented in Mr. Nikisch's Programme.

An unexpected introductory to the eighth Symphony concert was the "Freischuetz" overture. Very likely the director had in mind the forthcoming production of Weber's famous opera here, for the first time in many seasons, when he prefaced this overture to the programme. It was at all events very welcome. There was something of roughness in the opening, but this defect was soon forgotten in an interpretation that, as a whole, proved delightfully smooth, flowing and effecting. The Brahms symphony (No. 3, in F) enlisted the most earnest work of conductor and orchestra alike. It is not too much to say that Mr Nikisch's interpretation decidedly surpassed those that have preceded it here. In the poco allegretto and the allegro movements, particularly delightful effects were gained. In sharp contrast to this academic and somewhat heavy work came Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Preludes," which was given with such brilliancy, fervor and power that the audien es were stirred to unwonted enthusiasm. The overture to "Tannhauser" rounded out fittingly one of the best of Mr. Nikisch's programmes. It would be difficult to surpass in orchestral effect the interpretation of this familiar but always impressive overture. The close was given manfully—we have never heard the accompaniment to the 'Pilgrim's Chorus" made of so much value and significance and the great array of players seemed to catch perfectly and interpret quite as perfectly the master's thought as presented by their magnetic leader.

Haydn's symphony in C major is to open the programme next Saturday. Mr. Kneisel will play, for the first time in Boston, the Brahms concerto for violin in D, opus 77. Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in D minor and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," complete the list of offerings.

Th

BOSTON, SA

THE SYM

The last concer hearsal had prom
numbers were c
moving a little Edmands making
"The Little Dust
was better in style
ciation than eith
"Dream King," sh which her person beauty of her voice
est of the song or
The symphony,
disappointment to him so unusual, s
a reading as that
and the cities agog
fortnight ago. Bu
tions of time, her those same princi
come to be acc nearest to what to have desired, a fused wherever the
for it the persona
which makes one f
feels that he is mos
the second and thi
allegretto scherzand
—he caught the br
measure of time an cent, so that the d one and the easy b presented to perfe
clearly demonstrate convention are not casual feeling, but t
viction and are und here and there in t
had been in the ea
ness of tone and outbursts of sing wish for an instant proving hand of M
but a moment later
these for the sake o
deeper warmth and
the playing.

The audience of once the chance to
as they are setti their seats, for th
gramme will be the
probably the most
so far as the averag
first being assigned Freischütz." Of th gave yesterday afte lucid reading, and especial richness o Gericke was very bered, with the sy strong, cool in thoughts ever obvi
control insuring ba rhythmical distincti
the work more more contrasts of time somewhat to movement and not speed when be his grasp upon and his exposit orchestra well herent. The mus
sentially modern,
and then smack o
bear so much interpretation as self in these point vantage for the un
the intricate poly presented with s of brio, of dash a out of the general in distinctness of e ly in easy appreh dante with its su
"Zampa" and the ful to listen to, s tone and their pu
ture was exquisit murmurings of th more than whispe exceptionally smo allegro, so often into a presto, was Nikisch that all it beauty were prese
bers of the progra and the "Tannh could not hear sume that as the
and the other so tive, Mr. Nikisch his wont, will ma and intensely effec

The programm
arranged: Haydn
(L'Ours); Brahms
Op. 77 (first time i phony in B mino Overture, "Dedic
loist, Mr. Franz K

THE B

8OSTON, SU

LAST E

Weber's ov
Brahm's Sympl
by Liszt, and th
the well-known at the Sympho his element wit and Wagner,
cently played.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann.....Overture, "Genoveva"
Raff.....Song, "The Dream King and his Love"
A. Foote.....Suite for String Orchestra, in D major, No. 2, Op. 21 (First time.)
Songs with Piano.
Brahms.....{"Remembrance" "The Little Dustman"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8

They err who ascribe the complete failure of Schumann's opera to its weak libretto. As much fault can be found with the music as with the text, for Schumann, genius as he was, had no "specific dramatic talent, no knowledge of what the stage demands." He himself declared that every measure of "Genoveva" was dramatic; and so we have an opera where there is too much music, where from an effort to make every note tell, there is a wearisome detail and no broad effects or overwhelming moments. He who writes music for the stage can not spend his days in cutting cameos; let him rather catch the secret of the fresco painter. Schumann could see nothing but evil in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" and upon it and its composer he made a virulent and unjust attack. And by this criticism, he showed that he was ignorant of the very fundamental principles of dramatic-music; so, too, Mendelssohn characterized the music of Auber's "Muette de Portici" as "coarse, without feeling, and miserably scored." Not every great composer is born with versatility of talent. Mendelssohn and Schumann together could not have written one scene from the "Muette" or "Fra Diavolo," or one act of the "Huguenots"; nor could Auber have thought of the "Fingal's Cave," nor Meyerbeer composed the "Genoveva" overture.

When this opera of Schumann was first given in Leipsic in 1850 it was given only three times, and attempts to re-animate the dead body have been in vain; even as a cantata it has met with no success except possibly in England, where the people have been trained to a high pitch of musical endurance, having been fed on "Elijah" and "St. Paul" from their youth up. There are ultra "Schumannites" bold enough to loudly assert that "Genoveva" is a masterpiece of which the world is not worthy; Léonce Mesnard finds beauties on each and every page. Hear him. "When the heroine is led into the desert where she is to be abandoned, Schumann knew that the orchestra should not portray a gloomy and contemplative repose, but that crushing fatigue which accompanies moral distress": words such as escape from the lips of the victims of Wagner-hysteria when the spasms are upon them and they know not what they say. As a matter of fact the dramatic number of the opera is the overture, which is certainly a masterpiece. It is coherent and beautiful even in the wildest moments; and without being fantastic, the instrumentation is rich and expressive. It was played extremely well.

Mr. Foote's suite, which was given for the first time, is made up of a Prelude, Minuetto, Air, and Gavotte. It is carefully written; it is at times, particularly in the Air, ingeniously scored; it shows knowledge and work. It suffers from endless repetitions of uninteresting statements; it lacks melody; it is dry. The Prelude is a pale reflection of Bach; in the Minuetto there are a few agreeable passages and a pleasing pizzicato effect, and the trio is rambling, and melodically weak. The Air is perhaps the best number of the work, though it is too long spun out; the Gavotte closes with a few chords which are not imposing (though Mr. Nikisch endeavored to make them so); and whether they are imposing or not, they are out of place. The suite was played with great care by the orchestra and it was very warmly applauded. It is a question, however, whether it did not suffer from the exaggeration of Mr. Nikisch, who led the Air as though it were "program music," a portraiture of some "tempest-tossed soul," etc. Now, in a suite of this nature, where the numbers are "absolute music," the first thing demanded in its performance is a quiet, beautiful, refined simplicity. If too stormy crescendos and other overwrought effects are introduced by a conductor, the hearer is led to believe that the composition is intrinsically weak.

The performance of the eighth Symphony has been loudly praised; I regret that I cannot join in the "noisy squeals of joy." For years there has been a great diversity of opinion as to the proper speed of the second and third movements. It was the custom to regard the allegretto as an andante and the third movement as a scherzo, although this last movement is plainly a minuet and not a scherzo. The second movement is an "allegretto scherzando," and opens with chords "plaqués" given to wood wind instruments pianissimo, against which the violins and 'cellos and basses converse in whispers. These chords were not played softly, and the movement was so slow that there was a sense of "dragging" (the one thing to be avoided), and when it came to the broken answers of the wind to the strings this sensation became well nigh intolerable; nor were the dynamic effects worthy of the reputation of the orchestra. Nor would one have thought that Beethoven had written scherzando at the beginning. In 1884 Hans von Bülow, who was then at the head of the Meiningen orchestra gave three concerts in Munich, and among the numbers was this same symphony. His orchestra though admirably trained was man for man inferior to Mr. Higginson's. The delicacy, the grace, the verve, with which this famous allegretto was played made a profound impression upon all who heard it; and this impression was strengthened by the slow pace and heavy swing of the movement which followed. If the minuet be taken, as it generally is, too fast, the horns and clarinet scramble awkwardly through the trio which then becomes a burlesque. Mr. Nikisch did not sin in this respect, yet he might have taken the minuet a shade slower.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was unfortunate in her selections. The song by Raff is long and uninteresting, though there are a few charming instrumental effects. Furthermore, it is utterly unsuited to her voice. The first of the songs by Brahms is a dreary thing; the second is pretty, and Miss Edmands sang it simply and therefore with effect. Miss Edmands, as many of our singers, seems to suffer from the mania of wishing to confine herself to the songs of German composers; and alas, many of the modern German song writers seem to have a prejudice against the human voice, and against the alto voice in particular. So we find that many of their songs are really piano pieces, where the voice is treated as an orchestral instrument, with this difference, however; if the part were written for a clarinet or a 'cello due attention would be paid to the range and capabilities of the instrument.

No one for a moment disputes the pre-eminence of the great German composers in orchestral compositions; but it does not follow that because upon the roll of musicians, certain German names lead all the rest, there is, therefore, nothing worthy of consideration in the writings of the French, Italians, and Russians. It is reported that later in the season the programs will be more catholic. It is to be hoped that this report is true. At present it looks as though German were the musical language of Boston, and there seems to be an all-pervading idea that music was born in Germany, and has no abiding place in other lands. It is, therefore, a matter of surprise to find the symphony programs printed in English and the words "Mr." and "Frau," used instead of "Herr" and "Frau."

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, DEC. 1, 1889.

Musical Notes.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, a week ago last night, opened with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which was accorded as brilliant, as beautifully colored and as impressive a reading as it has ever received here. It was given with just and appropriate seriousness from beginning to end, and without a trace of that affected sentimentality which has prevailed so largely in the interpretations at this season's symphony concerts thus far. The novelty of the programme was a Suite in D-major, op. 21, for strings, by Mr. Arthur Foote. This work will add nothing to the composer's reputation. It forcibly indicates mere perfunctory music; music not written because the composer had anything new to say, but written apparently because he felt that it was necessary to say something, no matter what. It is skilfully put together, except that the middle parts in the instrumentation are weak, the space between the first violins and the basses, as far as the effect produced is concerned, being thin and undecided, often suggesting the top and bottom crusts of a pie without any filling between. For the rest, Mr. Foote was evidently attempting to work in the Bach vein, and was seemingly so absorbed in it that little bits of Bach pure and simple were appropriated by him, no doubt unconsciously. It is not easy to imitate Bach without plagiarizing him, for he has exhausted the whole field in which he worked, and has reaped and gathered its products so thoroughly that he has left nothing for the gleaner. In both the prelude and the air there are reminiscences of the old master so strong as to amount to actual reproduction. The latter movement, which, by the way, is the best portion of the suite, is full of memories of the air from the Suite in D. The minuet has scarcely the minuet character. It has some effective pizzicato effects which are interesting when first heard, but which are so pronounced that they lose in effect when they are repeated. The gavotte with which the work ends is the least praiseworthy movement of all, and does not seem to have been subjected to the careful thought the composer bestowed upon the rest of his suite. It is wanting in originality, and save in the opening bars, in the gavotte character, also, while the "musette" is no musette at all. Mr Foote has not done himself justice in this work, in which the effects of spontaniety and inspiration are quite lacking, and in which, moreover, he has said nothing that was worth the saying at the cost of so much labor. It was spiritedly but somewhat roughly played, and was vigorously applauded, the composer being called forward with great enthusiasm at the close of the performance. The symphony was Beethoven's eighth. In its reading it was a great advance over any Beethoven interpretation that Mr. Nikisch has as yet vouchsafed. There was a complete absence of that sentimentalizing to which such strong objection has been made, and no attempt was made to modernize the work. This is an improvement that merits frank recognition, and it affords us genuine pleasure to make it. It is true that we did not feel that the allegretto scherzando was given with that grace and lightness most favorable to the production of the best effect. It was taken somewhat slowly and heavily, and the "scherzando" indication at the head of the movement was not observed; but at the same time there was no affectation of a new reading. The reading of the minuet was also somewhat over vigorous, and in the duet between the horn and clarinet in the trio, the former instrument was too demonstrative, almost stifling the latter, but here again the general intention of the reading as a whole, was praiseworthy. The finale was given with admirable spirit and clearness. The one prominent fault in the performance was the roughness of style maintained by the orchestra, and this was especially to be regretted in a work in which delicacy and finish in playing are so imperatively demanded. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Edmands, who sang Raff's somewhat dreary "The Dream King and his Love," with the orchestra and two not too interesting songs by Brahms, with the piano. Miss Edmands sang the former with beautiful expressive ness, fine tone color, and marked artistic grace of style, and the latter with a feeling that did full justice to their sentiment, but her finished singing, sure and pleasing as it was, scarcely made her selections interesting. She was, however, warmly and deservedly applauded and was recalled after each effort.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with a remarkably fine performance of the "Der Freyschütz" overture. It was beautifully colored from beginning to end, and was played with great brilliancy and solidity. The opening movement was taken somewhat slower than usual, but if it did not gain anything by the change, it lost nothing. It was followed by a strong and careful performance of Brahms's symphony No. 3, in F. The reading differed in many essentials from any that it had previously obtained here; but it did not make the work any more spontaneous in effect. The lovely third movement was charmingly given. The work, as a whole, however, does not become less oppressive in its dryness, upon closer acquaintance, and though as high a manifestation of the purely classical in musical art as the present age can produce, it has many dull moments, and like most of its composer's music, fails to reach the heart, even when it most gratifies the understanding. A masterly reading of Liszt's "Les Preludes" came next, and it may be ranked among Mr. Nikisch's best successes thus far. The whole concluded with a stirring rendering of Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture in which the characteristics of the conductor's style found an admirable field for their display. Not a point was missed and taken altogether, we cannot recall a more dramatic or more effective reading of the work than was given on this occasion. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C-major, Haydn; (first time); Concerto for violin by Brahms (first time); Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," overture. The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL.

MONDAY, - - - - December 2, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Orpheus club closed a contract on Saturday with the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for a concert during the season, which will be one of the regular series. The reputation of this band as the finest of the country is undisputed and under its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, who took Mr. Gericke's place, it is charming thousands of people in Boston on every Saturday evening. The expense of this undertaking is enormous, involving an outlay of more than $1500, and the club should have two hundred more subscribers to insure them against loss. It is an opportunity which can only come once in each year and certainly no one who knows of this wounderful organization can afford to let it pass. The first concert takes place at the Board of Trade auditorium on December 17, when the club will be assisted by the Quintet club of Boston and Miss Annie Carpenter prima donna.

Subscriptions for the series should be sent in at once either to Mr. W. D. McKinney, secretary, or they can be left at T. H. Schneider's music store on South High street.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night – Sarasate-D'Albert.

The modern school was in the ascendant Saturday in Boston, for we had a piano concert devoted to it in the afternoon, and an orchestral concert of the same order in the evening. That both occasions drew forth large audiences may be set down as proof that the old musical conservatism of Boston has vanished. The programme began with the overture to "Freischütz," which commenced with the melodramatic pauses which seem to be characteristic of our new conductor. The horn quartette (the most characteristic passage that has ever been written for this instrument) could have been more clearly given, although there were no absolute breaks to condone. The remainder of the work was given with much dramatic effect. The concert ended with another overture, the "Tannhauser," which was given with true Wagnerian breadth, although the Venus music could have had a more sensuous softness; but the theme of the love song was performed with appropriate verve, and the great diminuendo with which the seductive music vanishes and is replaced by the Pilgrim Chorus, was read with masterly effect. The grand finale was very impressive, although the violins in the famous accompanying figure were at times a trifle ahead of the brasses.

Brahms' third symphony, spite of its tendency to melancholy, is the sweetest of the four, and its gentle themes were generally given with proper balance, spite of the fact that the development of the first movement was a little fiery—for Brahms. The horn and oboe passages in the intermezzo were especially noticeable for their refinement and surety. The antiphonal effects on the brass in the finale also call for a special word, for they could not have been better brought out. This symphony is one that is not suited to close a programme with because of its quiet and tranquil ending, and these phrases, con Sordine, were perfectly given. But the triumph of the concert, the orchestra, and the conductor, was in the "Preludes" by Liszt. This is a work abounding in contrasts; martial effects, pastoral touches, gusts of stormiest passion, and the most tender yearning, are here in juxtaposition. In each and all of these Mr. Nikisch was grandly successful, and his broad ritardandos, his lofty sweeps of tone, his letting loose all of the power of the orchestra in the final apotheosis of the finest of Liszt's themes, made a performance which has not yet been paralleled in Boston in this work. It was by all odds the very best thing he has done in this city. Nor must I omit to chronicle the points of excellence in the orchestral instruments—the harp was played by Mr. Schuecker in a masterly fashion, the trumpets and trombones were as martial and firm as the occasion demanded, the chromatic runs were done with splendid ensemble, the horn was smooth as oil, the great surges of tone with which the work ends were technically perfect, and altogether it would be impossible to give too much praise to so magnificent a performance.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is to be presumed that a conductor of such eminence as Mr. Arthur Nikisch has some well settled theory as to the making of programmes, and it is to be hoped that some one will give an anxious public a key to the system which is followed in preparing these for the Symphony concerts. Last evening selections were chosen and arranged as follows:

Overture—"Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3.....Brahms
Symphonic poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt
Overture—"Tannhauser".....Wagner

Comment further than this is unnecessary. Mr. Nikisch is certainly an adept in the reading of operatic overtures, and he gave a very fair performance of that to "Freischutz" and a magnificent interpretation of the "Tannhauser"; the latter composition really showing the ability of the new conductor in this line to admirable advantage. The grand climaxes were given with splendid effect, and the audience was worked up to a fine pitch of excitement and sent away from the hall full of the spirit of this great composition. The playing of the Liszt poem was less satisfactory, but the composition is in itself well calculated to call out the enthusiasm of an audience, and the playing of the finale was sufficiently inspiring to justify the hearty applause it called out. Mr. Nikisch is evidently not at home in the performance of either the older or more modern symphonic compositions, and his reading of the Brahms work was a far from being a satisfactory effort. Coming after such performances of the Brahms in F as these audiences have enjoyed in former seasons, last evening's interpretation appeared tame indeed, for in nothing but the more dramatic portion of the final allegro did Mr. Nikisch approach the character of the work as it has been shown in earlier performances here. Boston can supply several conductors capable of doing far better work in this class of compositions than the larger portion of that done by Mr. Nikisch for the Symphony concert patrons. The habits indulged in by Mr. Nikisch on account of the absence of any desk or other means of support in front of his stand have given rise to much comment among the attendants upon these concerts. What would be thought of a man who in polite society would stand around with his hands resting on his hips, with his arms akimbo? Can any one recall a conductor who supports his left hand in this position three-quarters of the time he is in the presence of a cultivated audience of 2500 or more persons? In dramatic delineation the above attitude is identical with the posture of the fisherman, peasant girl and common laborer. Herbert Kelcey would find his occupation gone if he indulged in such a vulgarity before the audience. Of course, it would be an impossibility to witness such a display in any well regulated dramatic company, except in the characters instanced above. Next week the programme is as follows: Haydn, symphony in C major (L'Ours); Brahms, concerto for violin in D, op. 77; Schubert, symphony in B minor (unfinished); Beethoven, overture, "Dedication of the House." The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

[31]

The Symphony Concert.

It was a fortunate thing, as far as the auditors were concerned, that Mr. Nikisch did not open the concert of Saturday evening with the symphony, as was at first announced. For some reason the audience is never seated at eight o'clock, despite the rule observed by Mr. Gericke, and as faithfully carried out by Mr. Nikisch, of beginning promptly. It seemed as if there were more late comers than usual Saturday evening. When the overture, "Der Freischutz," by Weber, began there were many vacant seats, and the absentees missed a fine rendering of this familiar overture. We discover new beauties in every familiar selection, as given by Mr. Nikisch, and this overture was no exception. Clearness and expressiveness were the features of the rendition, and the conductor found the audience quick to appreciate it.

The Brahms Symphony was a very beautiful selection in its melody, its harmony and its working out. The andante movement appeared to us to be rendered delightfully, and the finale allegro roused the audience to much enthusiasm. The auditors were not wearied by the performance, so that when the grand composition of Liszt was delivered its beauty could be fully appreciated. And it was appreciated, for its rendition was well nigh perfection. The closing number was the "Tannhauser" overture, and here Mr. Nikisch fairly electrified the audience, sending it home in the best of humor. The changes were given very clearly, the tempo was unusually distinct and marked, and the brasses were not subdued. It was given with all the precision which marked Mr. Seidl's orchestra and the delicacy which was the characteristic of Mr. Gericke.

The arrangement of the programme seemed very satisfactory and pleasing to the audience. It would hardly be possible to make a programme to the satisfaction of everybody, and Mr. Nikisch's experience ought to be of more weight than that of the carpers who have already begun to get in their work. It is much easier to find fault than to suggest an improvement. In fact, improvements suggested by the perpetual fault-finder are not usually in the line of success with the general public. The symphony came at an opportune time when it could be enjoyed, and the numbers following were capable of giving pleasure as well as instruction, and the concert was out at an early hour. All these things are to be commended. Mr. Kneisel is to be the soloist at the next concert, giving a concerto by Brahms, new to Boston, and the orchestral selections will be another symphony by Haydn—the opening number—Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House."

The first of the "Young Peoples' Populars" by the Symphony Orchestra came off on Wednesday afternoon, and, as may be surmised, under the circumstances, drew a hall full of listeners. The idea of giving these concerts such a title is extremely absurd—childish even. It is an attempt to mislead, based solely upon the ground that a lighter grade of music is performed than at the regulars. Still the compositions are worthy of classification as being among the best known; even if not in the ultra technical form which seems to constitute the standard of classicists. Again they were interpreted by the same orchestra, and directed by the identical conductor—the Nikisch—as at the other concerts. One thing may be sure, that is, the real musical element here will be better represented at these auxiliary concerts than elsewhere. This class is hungry for music, having been ruthlessly debarred from participating at the regular concerts. Another point is that such music as that appended in the list below is always "popular" with old as well as young. Let us have more of it. This was the program:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Delila".....Saint-Saens
Songs with piano.....Schumann and Rhineberger
Concerto for flute, themes from opera "Oberon".....Demerssemen
a. "Siegfried idyll".....Wagner
b. "Invitation to dance".....Weber-Belioz
Overture "Rienzi".....Wagner
Soloists, Mme. Alves and M. Mole.

The recent Symphony concerts have presented some novelties in a line that is rather promotive of dullness. Mr. Nikisch appears to follow his predecessor religiously in that regard. I am growing to feel that he is wedded to idol worship, his ideals are so provokingly in what is termed the ultra classic rut. To be sure he did give Mr. Bird a hearing, and promised something from Mr. Foote later, but these do not compensate for the deluge of dryness otherwise. Is there to be no opportunity to recognize progress, or chance to feed our mentality upon anything but obstruse husks? Nous Verrons. The last program is appended:

Overture—"Anacreon,".....Cherubini
Concerto for 'cello.....Eckert
Leo Schulz.
Rhapsodie—"Norvegiene,".....Svendsen
"Kol Nidrei,".....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

The 'cello soloist is one who joined the orchestra as a "second first"—if that title is not ambiguous. He came with Mr. Nikisch, and is a splendid performer in every respect, save in indulging freely with vibrato, which seems to have grown into a mania with this class of performers of late.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann.....Overture, "Genoveva"
Raff.....Song, "The Dream King and his Love"
A. Foote.....Suite for String Orchestra, in D major, No. 2, Op. 21 (First time.)
Songs with Piano.
Brahms.....{"Remembrance" "The Little Dustman"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8

They err who ascribe the complete failure of Schumann's opera to its weak libretto. As much fault can be found with the music as with the text, for Schumann, genius as he was, had no "specific dramatic talent, no knowledge of what the stage demands." He himself declared that every measure of "Genoveva" was dramatic; and so we have an opera where there is too much music, where from an effort to make every note tell, there is a wearisome detail and no broad effects or overwhelming moments. He who writes music for the stage can not spend his days in cutting cameos; let him rather catch the secret of the fresco painter. Schumann could see nothing but evil in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" and upon it and its composer he made a virulent and unjust attack. And by this criticism, he showed that he was ignorant of the very fundamental principles of dramatic-music; so, too, Mendelssohn characterized the music of Auber's "Muette de Portici" as "coarse, without feeling, and miserably scored." Not every great composer is born with versatility of talent. Mendelssohn and Schumann together could not have written one scene from the "Muette" or "Fra Diavolo," or one act of the "Huguenots"; nor could Auber have thought of the "Fingal's Cave," nor Meyerbeer composed the "Genoveva" overture.

When this opera of Schumann was first given in Leipsic in 1850 it was given only three times, and attempts to re-animate the dead body have been in vain; even as a cantata it has met with no success except possibly in England, where the people have been trained to a high pitch of musical endurance, having been fed on "Elijah" and "St. Paul" from their youth up. There are ultra "Schumannites" bold enough to loudly assert that "Genoveva" is a masterpiece of which the world is not worthy; Léonce Mesnard finds beauties on each and every page. Hear him. "When the heroine is led into the desert where she is to be abandoned, Schumann knew that the orchestra should not portray a gloomy and contemplative repose, but that crushing fatigue which accompanies moral distress"; words such as escape from the lips of the victims of Wagner-hysteria when the spasms are upon them and they know not what they say. As a matter of fact the dramatic number of the opera is the overture, which is certainly a masterpiece. It is coherent and beautiful even in the wildest moments; and without being fantastic, the instrumentation is rich and expressive. It was played extremely well.

Mr. Foote's suite, which was given for the first time, is made up of a Prelude, Minuetto, Air, and Gavotte. It is carefully written; it is at times, particularly in the Air, ingeniously scored; it shows knowledge and work. It suffers from endless repetitions of uninteresting statements; it lacks melody; it is dry. The Prelude is a pale reflection of Bach; in the Minuetto there are a few agreeable passages and a pleasing pizzicato effect, and the trio is rambling, and melodically weak. The Air is perhaps the best number of the work, though it is too long spun out; the Gavotte closes with a few chords which are not imposing (though Mr. Nikisch endeavored to make them so); and whether they are imposing or not, they are out of place. The suite was played with great care by the orchestra and it was very warmly applauded. It is a question, however, whether it did not suffer from the exaggeration of Mr. Nikisch, who led the Air as though it were "program music," a portraiture of some "tempest-tossed soul," etc. Now, in a suite of this nature, where the numbers are "absolute music," the first thing demanded in its performance is a quiet, beautiful, refined simplicity. If too stormy crescendos and other overwrought effects are introduced by a conductor, the hearer is led to believe that the composition is intrinsically weak.

The performance of the eighth Symphony has been loudly praised; I regret that I cannot join in the "noisy squeals of joy." For years there has been a great diversity of opinion as to the proper speed of the second and third movements. It was the custom to regard the allegretto as an andante and the third movement as a scherzo, although this last movement is plainly a minuet and not a scherzo. The second movement is an "allegretto scherzando," and opens with chords "plaqués" given to wood wind instruments pianissimo, against which the violins and 'cellos and basses converse in whispers. These chords were not played softly, and the movement was so slow that there was a sense of "dragging" (the one thing to be avoided), and when it came to the broken answers of the wind to the strings this sensation became well nigh intolerable; nor were the dynamic effects worthy of the reputation of the orchestra. Nor would one have thought that Beethoven had written scherzando at the beginning. In 1884 Haus von Bülow, who was then at the head of the Meiningen orchestra gave three concerts in Munich, and among the numbers was this same symphony. His orchestra though admirably trained was man for man inferior to Mr. Higginson's. The delicacy, the grace, the verve, with which this famous allegretto was played made a profound impression upon all who heard it; and this impression was strengthened by the slow pace and heavy swing of the movement which followed. If the minuet be taken, as it generally is, too fast, the horns and clarinet scramble awkwardly through the trio which then becomes a burlesque. Mr. Nikisch did not sin in this respect, yet he might have taken the minuet a shade slower.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was unfortunate in her selections. The song by Raff is long and uninteresting, though there are a few charming instrumental effects. Furthermore, it is utterly unsuited to her voice. The first of the songs by Brahms is a dreary thing; the second is pretty, and Miss Edmands sang it simply and therefore with effect. Miss Edmands, as many of our singers, seems to suffer from the mania of wishing to confine herself to the songs of German composers; and alas, many of the modern German song writers seem to have a prejudice against the human voice, and against the alto voice in particular. So we find that many of their songs are really piano pieces, where the voice is treated as an orchestral instrument, with this difference, however; if the part were written for a clarinet or a 'cello due attention would be paid to the range and capabilities of the instrument.

No one for a moment disputes the pre-eminence of the great German composers in orchestral compositions; but it does not follow that because upon the roll of musicians, certain German names lead all the rest, there is, therefore, nothing worthy of consideration in the writings of the French, Italians, and Russians. It is reported that later in the season the programs will be more catholic. It is to be hoped that this report is true. At present it looks as though German were the musical language of Boston, and there seems to be an all-pervading idea that music was born in Germany, and has no abiding place in other lands. It is, therefore, a matter of surprise to find the symphony programs printed in English and the words "Mr." and "Frau," used instead of "Herr" and "Frau."

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, DEC. 1, 1889.

Musical Notes.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, a week ago last night, opened with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which was accorded as brilliant, as beautifully colored and as impressive a reading as it has ever received here. It was given with just and appropriate seriousness from beginning to end, and without a trace of that affected sentimentality which has prevailed so largely in the interpretations at this season's symphony concerts thus far. The novelty of the programme was a Suite in D-major, op. 21, for strings, by Mr. Arthur Foote. This work will add nothing to the composer's reputation. It forcibly indicates mere perfunctory music; music not written because the composer had anything new to say, but written apparently because he felt that it was necessary to say something, no matter what. It is skilfully put together, except that the middle parts in the instrumentation are weak, the space between the first violins and the basses, as far as the effect produced is concerned, being thin and undecided, often suggesting the top and bottom crusts of a pie without any filling between. For the rest, Mr. Foote was evidently attempting to work in the Bach vein, and was seemingly so absorbed in it that little bits of Bach pure and simple were appropriated by him, no doubt unconsciously. It is not easy to imitate Bach without plagiarizing him, for he has exhausted the whole field in which he worked, and has reaped and gathered its products so thoroughly that he has left nothing for the gleaner. In both the prelude and the air there are reminiscences of the old master so strong as to amount to actual reproduction. The latter movement, which, by the way, is the best portion of the suite, is full of memories of the air from the Suite in D. The minuet has scarcely the minuet character. It has some effective pizzicato effects which are interesting when first heard, but which are so pronounced that they lose in effect when they are repeated. The gavotte with which the work ends is the least praiseworthy movement of all, and does not seem to have been subjected to the careful thought the composer bestowed upon the rest of his suite. It is wanting in originality, and save in the opening bars, in the gavotte character, also, while the "musette" is no musette at all. Mr Foote has not done himself justice in this work, in which the effects of spontaneity and inspiration are quite lacking, and in which, moreover, he has said nothing that was worth the saying at the cost of so much labor. It was spiritedly but somewhat roughly played, and was vigorously applauded, the composer being called forward with great enthusiasm at the close of the performance. The symphony was Beethoven's eighth. In its reading it was a great advance over any Beethoven interpretation that Mr. Nikisch has as yet vouchsafed. There was a complete absence of that sentimentalizing to which such strong objection has been made, and no attempt was made to modernize the work. This is an improvement that merits frank recognition, and it affords us genuine pleasure to make it. It is true that we did not feel that the allegretto scherzando was given with that grace and lightness most favorable to the production of the best effect. It was taken somewhat slowly and heavily, and the "scherzando" indication at the head of the movement was not observed; but at the same time there was no affectation of a new reading. The reading of the minuet was also somewhat over-vigorous, and in the duet between the horn and clarinet in the trio, the former instrument was too demonstrative, almost stifling the latter, but here again the general intention of the reading as a whole, was praiseworthy. The finale was given with admirable spirit and clearness. The one prominent fault in the performance was the roughness of style maintained by the orchestra, and this was especially to be regretted in a work in which delicacy and finish in playing are so imperatively demanded. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Edmands, who sang Raff's somewhat dreary "The Dream King and his Love," with the orchestra and two not too interesting songs by Brahms, with the piano. Miss Edmands sang the former with beautiful expressive use, fine tone color, and marked artistic grace of style, and the latter with a feeling that did full justice to their sentiment, but her finished singing, able and pleasing as it was, scarcely made her selections interesting. She was, however, warmly and deservedly applauded and was recalled after each effort.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with a remarkably fine performance of the "Der Freyschütz" overture. It was beautifully colored from beginning to end, and was played with great brilliancy and solidity. The opening movement was taken somewhat slower than usual, but if it did not gain anything by the change, it lost nothing. It was followed by a strong and careful performance of Brahms's symphony No. 3, in F. The reading differed in many essentials from any that it had previously obtained here; but it did not make the work any more spontaneous in effect. The lovely third movement was charmingly given. The work, as a whole, however, does not become less oppressive in its dryness, upon closer acquaintance, and though as high a manifestation of the purely classical in musical art as the present age can produce, it has many dull moments, and like most of its composer's music, fails to reach the heart, even when it most gratifies the understanding. A masterly reading of Liszt's "Les Preludes" came next, and it may be ranked among Mr. Nikisch's best successes thus far. The whole concluded with a stirring rendering of Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture in which the characteristics of the conductor's style found an admirable field for their display. Not a point was missed and taken altogether, we cannot recall a more dramatic or more effective reading of the work than was given on this occasion. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C-major, Haydn; (first time); Concerto for violin by Brahms (first time); Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," overture. The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL.

MONDAY, - - - - December 2, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Orpheus club closed a contract on Saturday with the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for a concert during the season, which will be one of the regular series. The reputation of this band as the finest of the country is undisputed and under its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, who took Mr. Gericke's place, it is charming thousands of people in Boston on every Saturday evening. The expense of this undertaking is enormous, involving an outlay of more than $1500, and the club should have two hundred more subscribers to insure them against loss. It is an opportunity which can only come once in each year and certainly no one who knows of this wounderful organization can afford to let it pass. The first concert takes place at the Board of Trade auditorium on December 17, when the club will be assisted by the Quintet club of Boston and Miss Annie Carpenter prima donna.

Subscriptions for the series should be sent in at once either to Mr. W. D. McKinney, secretary, or they can be left at T. H. Schneider's music store on South High street.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1812.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night – Sarasate-D'Albert.

The modern school was in the ascendant Saturday in Boston, for we had a piano concert devoted to it in the afternoon, and an orchestral concert of the same order in the evening. That both occasions drew forth large audiences may be set down as proof that the old musical conservatism of Boston has vanished. The programme began with the overture to "Freischütz," which commenced with the melodramatic pauses which seem to be characteristic of our new conductor. The horn quartette (the most characteristic passage that has ever been written for this instrument) could have been more clearly given, although there were no absolute breaks to condone. The remainder of the work was given with much dramatic effect. The concert ended with another overture, the "Tannhauser," which was given with true Wagnerian breadth, although the Venus music could have had a more sensuous softness; but the theme of the love song was performed with appropriate verve, and the great diminuendo with which the seductive music vanishes and is replaced by the Pilgrim Chorus, was read with masterly effect. The grand finale was very impressive, although the violins in the famous accompanying figure were at times a trifle ahead of the brasses.

Brahms' third symphony, spite of its tendency to melancholy, is the sweetest of the four, and its gentle themes were generally given with proper balance, spite of the fact that the development of the first movement was a little fiery—for Brahms. The horn and oboe passages in the intermezzo were especially noticeable for their refinement and surety. The antiphonal effects on the brass in the finale also call for a special word, for they could not have been better brought out. This symphony is one that is not suited to close a programme with because of its quiet and tranquil ending, and these phrases, con Sordine, were perfectly given. But the triumph of the concert, the orchestra, and the conductor, was in the "Preludes" by Liszt. This is a work abounding in contrasts; martial effects, pastoral touches, gusts of stormiest passion, and the most tender yearning, are here in juxtaposition. In each and all of these Mr. Nikisch was grandly successful, and his broad ritardandos, his lofty sweeps of tone, his letting loose all of the power of the orchestra in the final apotheosis of the finest of Liszt's themes, made a performance which has not yet been paralleled in Boston in this work. It was by all odds the very best thing he has done in this city. Nor must I omit to chronicle the points of excellence in the orchestral instruments—the harp was played by Mr. Schuecker in a masterly fashion, the trumpets and trombones were as martial and firm as the occasion demanded, the chromatic runs were done with splendid ensemble, the horn was smooth as oil, the great surges of tone with which the work ends were technically perfect, and altogether it would be impossible to give too much praise to so magnificent a performance.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is to be presumed that a conductor of such eminence as M. Arthur Nikisch has some well settled theory as to the making of programmes, and it is to be hoped that some one will give an anxious public a key to the system which is followed in preparing these for the Symphony concerts. Last evening selections, were chosen and arranged as follows:

Overture—"Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3.....Brahms
Symphonic poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt
Overture—"Tannhauser".....Wagner

Comment further than this is unnecessary. Mr. Nikisch is certainly an adept in the reading of operatic overtures, and he gave a very fair performance of that to "Freischutz" and a magnificent interpretation of the "Tannhauser"; the latter composition really showing the ability of the new conductor in this line to admirable advantage. The grand climaxes were given with splendid effect, and the audience was worked up to a fine pitch of excitement and sent away from the hall full of the spirit of this great composition. The playing of the Liszt poem was less satisfactory, but the composition is in itself well calculated to call out the enthusiasm of an audience, and the playing of the finale was sufficiently inspiring to justify the hearty applause it called out. Mr. Nikisch is evidently not at home in the performance of either the older or more modern symphonic compositions, and his reading of the Brahms work was a far from being a satisfactory effort. Coming after such performances of the Brahms in F as these audiences have enjoyed in former seasons, last evening's interpretation appeared tame indeed, for in nothing but the more dramatic portion of the final allegro did Mr. Nikisch approach the character of the work as it has been shown in earlier performances here. Boston can supply several conductors capable of doing far better work in this class of compositions than the larger portion of that done by Mr. Nikisch for the Symphony concert patrons. The habits indulged in by Mr. Nikisch on account of the absence of any desk or other means of support in front of his stand have given rise to much comment among the attendants upon these concerts. What would be thought of a man who in polite society would stand around with his hands resting on his hips, with his arms akimbo? Can any one recall a conductor who supports his left hand in this position three-quarters of the time he is in the presence of a cultivated audience of 2500 or more persons? In dramatic delineation the above attitude is identical with the posture of the fisherman, peasant girl and common laborer. Herbert Kelcey would find his occupation gone if he indulged in such a vulgarity before the audience. Of course, it would be an impossibility to witness such a display in any well regulated dramatic company, except in the characters instanced above. Next week the programme is as follows: Haydn, symphony in C major (L'Ours); Brahms, concerto for violin in D, op. 77; Schubert, symphony in B minor (unfinished); Beethoven, overture, "Dedication of the House." The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889.

[31]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was a fortunate thing, as far as the auditors were concerned, that Mr. Nikisch did not open the concert of Saturday evening with the symphony, as was at first announced. For some reason the audience is never seated at eight o'clock, despite the rule observed by Mr. Gericke, and as faithfully carried out by Mr. Nikisch, of beginning promptly. It seemed as if there were more late comers than usual Saturday evening. When the overture, "Der Freischutz," by Weber, began there were many vacant seats, and the absentees missed a fine rendering of this familiar overture. We discover new beauties in every familiar selection, as given by Mr. Nikisch, and this overture was no exception. Clearness and expressiveness were the features of the rendition, and the conductor found the audience quick to appreciate it.

The Brahms Symphony was a very beautiful selection in its melody, its harmony and its working out. The andante movement appeared to us to be rendered delightfully, and the finale allegro roused the audience to much enthusiasm. The auditors were not wearied by the performance, so that when the grand composition of Liszt was delivered its beauty could be fully appreciated. And it was appreciated, for its rendition was well nigh perfection. The closing number was the "Tannhauser" overture, and here Mr. Nikisch fairly electrified the audience, sending it home in the best of humor. The changes were given very clearly, the tempo was unusually distinct and marked, and the brasses were not subdued. It was given with all the precision which marked Mr. Seidl's orchestra and the delicacy which was the characteristic of Mr. Gericke.

The arrangement of the programme seemed very satisfactory and pleasing to the audience. It would hardly be possible to make a programme to the satisfaction of everybody, and Mr. Nikisch's experience ought to be of more weight than that of the carpers who have already begun to get in their work. It is much easier to find fault than to suggest an improvement. In fact, improvements suggested by the perpetual fault-finder are not usually in the line of success with the general public. The symphony came at an opportune time when it could be enjoyed, and the numbers following were capable of giving pleasure as well as instruction, and the concert was out at an early hour. All these things are to be commended. Mr. Kneisel is to be the soloist at the next concert, giving a concerto by Brahms, new to Boston, and the orchestral selections will be another symphony by Haydn—the opening number—Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House."

The first of the "Young Peoples' Populars" by the Symphony Orchestra came off on Wednesday afternoon, and, as may be surmised, under the circumstances, drew a hall full of listeners. The idea of giving these concerts such a title is extremely absurd—childish even. It is an attempt to mislead, based solely upon the ground that a lighter grade of music is performed than at the regulars. Still the compositions are worthy of classification as being among the best known; even if not in the ultra technical form which seems to constitute the standard of classicists. Again they were interpreted by the same orchestra, and directed by the identical conductor—the Nikisch—as at the other concerts. One thing may be sure, that is, the real musical element here will be better represented at these auxiliary concerts than elsewhere. This class is hungry for music, having been ruthlessly debarred from participating at the regular concerts. Another point is that such music as that appended in the list below is always "popular" with old as well as young. Let us have more of it. This was the program:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Delila".....Saint-Saens
Songs with piano.....Schumann and Rhineberger
Concerto for flute, themes from opera "Oberon".....Demerssemen
a. "Siegfried idyll".....Wagner
b. "Invitation to dance".....Weber-Belioz
Overture "Rienzi".....Wagner
Soloists, Mme. Alves and M. Mole.

The recent Symphony concerts have presented some novelties in a line that is rather promotive of dullness. Mr. Nikisch appears to follow his predecessor religiously in that regard. I am growing to feel that he is wedded to idol worship, his ideals are so provokingly in what is termed the ultra classic rut. To be sure he did give Mr. Bird a hearing, and promised something from Mr. Foote later, but these do not compensate for the deluge of dryness otherwise. Is there to be no opportunity to recognize progress, or chance to feed our mentality upon anything but obstruse husks? Nous Verrons. The last program is appended:

Overture—"Anacreon,".....Cherubini
Concerto for 'cello.....Eckert
Leo Schulz.
Rhapsodie—"Norvegiene,".....Svendsen
"Kol Nidrei,".....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

The 'cello soloist is one who joined the orchestra as a "second first"—if that title is not ambiguous. He came with Mr. Nikisch, and is a splendid performer in every respect, save in indulging freely with vibrato, which seems to have grown into a mania with this class of performers of late.

HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30,

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann.....Overture, "Genoveva"
Raff.....Song, "The Dream King and his Love"
A. Foote.....Suite for String Orchestra, in D major, No. 2, Op. 21 (First time.)
Songs with Piano.
Brahms.....{"Remembrance" "The Little Dustman"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8

They err who ascribe the complete failure of Schumann's opera to its weak libretto. As much fault can be found with the music as with the text, for Schumann, genius as he was, had no "specific dramatic talent, no knowledge of what the stage demands." He himself declared that every measure of "Genoveva" was dramatic; and so we have an opera where there is too much music, where from an effort to make every note tell, there is a wearisome detail and no broad effects or overwhelming moments. He who writes music for the stage can not spend his days in cutting cameos; let him rather catch the secret of the fresco painter. Schumann could see nothing but evil in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" and upon it and its composer he made a virulent and unjust attack. And by this criticism, he showed that he was ignorant of the very fundamental principles of dramatic-music; so, too, Mendelssohn characterized the music of Auber's "Muette de Portici" as "coarse, without feeling, and miserably scored." Not every great composer is born with versatility of talent. Mendelssohn and Schumann together could not have written one scene from the "Muette" or "Fra Diavolo," or one act of the "Huguenots"; nor could Auber have thought of the "Fingal's Cave," nor Meyerbeer composed the "Genoveva" overture.

When this opera of Schumann was first given in Leipsic in 1850 it was given only three times, and attempts to re-animate the dead body have been in vain; even as a cantata it has met with no success except possibly in England, where the people have been trained to a high pitch of musical endurance, having been fed on "Elijah" and "St. Paul" from their youth up. There are ultra "Schumannites" bold enough to loudly assert that "Genoveva" is a masterpiece of which the world is not worthy; Léonce Mesnard finds beauties on each and every page. Hear him. "When the heroine is led into the desert where she is to be abandoned, Schumann knew that the orchestra should not portray a gloomy and contemplative repose, but that crushing fatigue which accompanies moral distress": words such as escape from the lips of the victims of Wagner-hysteria when the spasms are upon them and they know not what they say. As a matter of fact the dramatic number of the opera is the overture, which is certainly a masterpiece. It is coherent and beautiful even in the wildest moments; and without being fantastic, the instrumentation is rich and expressive. It was played extremely well.

Mr. Foote's suite, which was given for the first time, is made up of a Prelude, Minuetto, Air, and Gavotte. It is carefully written; it is at times, particularly in the Air, ingeniously scored; it shows knowledge and work. It suffers from endless repetitions of uninteresting statements; it lacks melody; it is dry. The Prelude is a pale reflection of Bach; in the Minuetto there are a few agreeable passages and a pleasing pizzicato effect, and the trio is rambling, and melodically weak. The Air is perhaps the best number of the work, though it is too long spun out; the Gavotte closes with a few chords which are not imposing (though Mr. Nikisch endeavored to make them so); and whether they are imposing or not, they are out of place. The suite was played with great care by the orchestra and it was very warmly applauded. It is a question, however, whether it did not suffer from the exaggeration of Mr. Nikisch, who led the Air as though it were "program music," a portraiture of some "tempest-tossed soul," etc. Now, in a suite of this nature, where the numbers are "absolute music," the first thing demanded in its performance is a quiet, beautiful, refined simplicity. If too stormy crescendos and other overwrought effects are introduced by a conductor, the hearer is led to believe that the composition is intrinsically weak.

The performance of the eighth Symphony has been loudly praised; I regret that I cannot join in the "noisy squeals of joy." For years there has been a great diversity of opinion as to the proper speed of the second and third movements. It was the custom to regard the allegretto as an andante and the third movement as a scherzo, although this last movement is plainly a minuet and not a scherzo. The second movement is an "allegretto scherzando," and opens with chords "plaqués" given to wood wind instruments pianissimo, against which the violins and 'cellos and basses converse in whispers. These chords were not played softly, and the movement was so slow that there was a sense of "dragging" (the one thing to be avoided), and when it came to the broken answers of the wind to the strings this sensation became well nigh intolerable; nor were the dynamic effects worthy of the reputation of the orchestra. Nor would one have thought that Beethoven had written scherzando at the beginning. In 1884 Hans von Bülow, who was then at the head of the Meiningen orchestra gave three concerts in Munich, and among the numbers was this same symphony. His orchestra though admirably trained was man for man inferior to Mr. Higginson's. The delicacy, the grace, the verve, with which this famous allegretto was played made a profound impression upon all who heard it; and this impression was strengthened by the slow pace and heavy swing of the movement which followed. If the minuet be taken, as it generally is, too fast, the horns and clarinet scramble awkwardly through the trio which then becomes a burlesque. Mr. Nikisch did not sin in this respect, yet he might have taken the minuet a shade slower.

Miss Gertrude Edmands was unfortunate in her selections. The song by Raff is long and uninteresting, though there are a few charming instrumental effects. Furthermore, it is utterly unsuited to her voice. The first of the songs by Brahms is a dreary thing; the second is pretty, and Miss Edmands sang it simply and therefore with effect. Miss Edmands, as many of our singers, seems to suffer from the mania of wishing to confine herself to the songs of German composers; and alas, many of the modern German song writers seem to have a prejudice against the human voice, and against the alto voice in particular. So we find that many of their songs are really piano pieces, where the voice is treated as an orchestral instrument, with this difference, however; if the part were written for a clarinet or a 'cello due attention would be paid to the range and capabilities of the instrument.

No one for a moment disputes the pre-eminence of the great German composers in orchestral compositions; but it does not follow that because upon the roll of musicians, certain German names lead all the rest, there is, therefore, nothing worthy of consideration in the writings of the French, Italians, and Russians. It is reported that later in the season the programs will be more catholic. It is to be hoped that this report is true. At present it looks as though German were the musical language of Boston, and there seems to be an all-pervading idea that music was born in Germany, and has no abiding place in other lands. It is, therefore, a matter of surprise to find the symphony programs printed in English and the words "Mr." and "Mrs." used instead of "Herr" and "Frau."

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, DEC. 1, 1889.

Musical Notes.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, a week ago last night, opened with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which was accorded as brilliant, as beautifully colored and as impressive a reading as it has ever received here. It was given with just and appropriate seriousness from beginning to end, and without a trace of that affected sentimentality which has prevailed so largely in the interpretations at this season's symphony concerts thus far. The novelty of the programme was a Suite in D-major, op. 21, for strings, by Mr. Arthur Foote. This work will add nothing to the composer's reputation. It forcibly indicates mere perfunctory music; music not written because the composer had anything new to say, but written apparently because he felt that it was necessary to say something, no matter what. It is skilfully put together, except that the middle parts in the instrumentation are weak, the space between the first violins and the basses, as far as the effect produced is concerned, being thin and undecided, often suggesting the top and bottom crusts of a pie without any filling between. For the rest, Mr. Foote was evidently attempting to work in the Bach vein, and was seemingly so absorbed in it that little bits of Bach pure and simple were appropriated by him, no doubt unconsciously. It is not easy to imitate Bach without plagiarizing him, for he has exhausted the whole field in which he worked, and has reaped and gathered its products so thoroughly that he has left nothing for the gleaner. In both the prelude and the air there are reminiscences of the old master so strong as to amount to actual reproduction. The latter movement, which, by the way, is the best portion of the suite, is full of memories of the air from the Suite in D. The minuet has scarcely the minuet character. It has some effective pizzicato effects which are interesting when first heard, but which are so pronounced that they lose in effect when they are repeated. The gavotte with which the work ends is the least praiseworthy movement of all, and does not seem to have been subjected to the careful thought the composer bestowed upon the rest of his suite. It is wanting in originality, and save in the opening bars, in the gavotte character, also, while the "musette" is no musette at all. Mr Foote has not done himself justice in this work, in which the effects of spontaneity and inspiration are quite lacking, and in which, moreover, he has said nothing that was worth the saying at the cost of so much labor. It was spiritedly but somewhat roughly played, and was vigorously applauded, the composer being called forward with great enthusiasm at the close of the performance. The symphony was Beethoven's eighth. In its reading it was a great advance over any Beethoven interpretation that Mr. Nikisch has as yet vouchsafed. There was a complete absence of that sentimentalizing to which such strong objection has been made, and no attempt was made to modernize the work. This is an improvement that merits frank recognition, and it affords us genuine pleasure to make it. It is true that we did not feel that the allegretto scherzando was given with that grace and lightness most favorable to the production of the best effect. It was taken somewhat slowly and heavily, and the "scherzando" indication at the head of the movement was not observed; but at the same time there was no affectation of a new reading. The reading of the minuet was also somewhat over-vigorous, and in the duet between the horn and clarinet in the trio, the former instrument was too demonstrative, almost stifling the latter, but here again the general intention of the reading as a whole, was praiseworthy. The finale was given with admirable spirit and clearness. The one prominent fault in the performance was the roughness of style maintained by the orchestra, and this was especially to be regretted in a work in which delicacy and finish in playing are so imperatively demanded. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Edmands, who sang Raff's somewhat dreary "The Dream King and his Love," with the orchestra and two not too interesting songs by Brahms, with the piano. Miss Edmands sang the former with beautiful expressive use of tone color, and marked artistic grace of style, and the latter with a feeling that did full justice to their sentiment, but her finished singing, able and pleasing as it was, scarcely made her selections interesting. She was, however, warmly and deservedly applauded and was recalled after each effort.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with a remarkably fine performance of the "Der Freyschütz" overture. It was beautifully colored from beginning to end and was played with great brilliancy and solidity. The opening movement was taken somewhat slower than usual, but if it did not gain anything by the change, it lost nothing. It was followed by a strong and careful performance of Brahms's symphony No. 3, in F. The reading differed in many essentials from any that it had previously obtained here; but it did not make the work any more spontaneous in effect. The lovely third movement was charmingly given. The work, as a whole, however, does not become less oppressive in its dryness, upon closer acquaintance, and though as high a manifestation of the purely classical in musical art as the present age can produce, it has many dull moments, and like most of its composer's music, fails to reach the heart, even when it most gratifies the understanding. A masterly reading of Liszt's "Les Preludes" came next, and it may be ranked among Mr. Nikisch's best successes thus far. The whole concluded with a stirring rendering of Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture in which the characteristics of the conductor's style found an admirable field for their display. Not a point was missed and taken altogether, we cannot recall a more dramatic or more effective reading of the work than was given on this occasion. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C-major, Haydn; (first time); Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," overture. The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL.

MONDAY, - - - - December 2, 1889.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Orpheus club closed a contract on Saturday with the famous Boston Symphony orchestra for a concert during the season, which will be one of the regular series. The reputation of this band as the finest of the country is undisputed and under its new conductor, Mr. Nikisch, who took Mr. Gericke's place, it is charming thousands of people in Boston on every Saturday evening. The expense of this undertaking is enormous, involving an outlay of more than $1500, and the club should have two hundred more subscribers to insure them against loss. It is an opportunity which can only come once in each year and certainly no one who knows of this wounderful organization can afford to let it pass. The first concert takes place at the Board of Trade auditorium on December 17, when the club will be assisted by the Quintet club of Boston and Miss Annie Carpenter prima donna.

Subscriptions for the series should be sent in at once either to Mr. W. D. McKinney, secretary, or they can be left at T. H. Schneider's music store on South High street.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Night – Sarasate-D'Albert.

The modern school was in the ascendant Saturday in Boston, for we had a piano concert devoted to it in the afternoon, and an orchestral concert of the same order in the evening. That both occasions drew forth large audiences may be set down as proof that the old musical conservatism of Boston has vanished. The programme began with the overture to "Freischütz," which commenced with the melodramatic pauses which seem to be characteristic of our new conductor. The horn quartette (the most characteristic passage that has ever been written for this instrument) could have been more clearly given, although there were no absolute breaks to condone. The remainder of the work was given with much dramatic effect. The concert ended with another overture, the "Tannhauser," which was given with true Wagnerian breadth, although the Venus music could have had a more sensuous softness; but the theme of the love song was performed with appropriate verve, and the great diminuendo with which the seductive music vanishes and is replaced by the Pilgrim Chorus, was read with masterly effect. The grand finale was very impressive, although the violins in the famous accompanying figure were at times a trifle ahead of the brasses.

Brahms' third symphony, spite of its tendency to melancholy, is the sweetest of the four, and its gentle themes were generally given with proper balance, spite of the fact that the development of the first movement was a little fiery—for Brahms. The horn and oboe passages in the intermezzo were especially noticeable for their refinement and surety. The antiphonal effects on the brass in the finale also call for a special word, for they could not have been better brought out. This symphony is one that is not suited to close a programme with because of its quiet and tranquil ending, and these phrases, con Sordine, were perfectly given. But the triumph of the concert, the orchestra, and the conductor, was in the "Preludes" by Liszt. This is a work abounding in contrasts; martial effects, pastoral touches, gusts of stormiest passion, and the most tender yearning, are here in juxtaposition. In each and all of these Mr. Nikisch was grandly successful, and his broad ritardandos, his lofty sweeps of tone, his letting loose all of the power of the orchestra in the final apotheosis of the finest of Liszt's themes, made a performance which has not yet been paralleled in Boston in this work. It was by all odds the very best thing he has done in this city. Nor must I omit to chronicle the points of excellence in the orchestral instruments—the harp was played by Mr. Schuecker in a masterly fashion, the trumpets and trombones were as martial and firm as the occasion demanded, the chromatic runs were done with splendid ensemble, the horn was smooth as oil, the great surges of tone with which the work ends were technically perfect, and altogether it would be impossible to give too much praise to so magnificent a performance.

SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, DECEMBER 1, 1889.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It is to be presumed that a conductor of such eminence as Mr. Arthur Nikisch has some well settled theory as to the making of programmes, and it is to be hoped that some one will give an anxious public a key to the system which is followed in preparing these for the Symphony concerts. Last evening selections were chosen and arranged as follows:

Overture—"Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphony in F, No. 3.....Brahms
Symphonic poem—"Les Preludes".....Liszt
Overture—"Tannhauser".....Wagner

Comment further than this is unnecessary. Mr. Nikisch is certainly an adept in the reading of operatic overtures, and he gave a very fair performance of that to "Freischutz" and a magnificent interpretation of the "Tannhauser"; the latter composition really showing the ability of the new conductor in this line to admirable advantage. The grand climaxes were given with splendid effect, and the audience was worked up to a fine pitch of excitement and sent away from the hall full of the spirit of this great composition. The playing of the Liszt poem was less satisfactory, but the composition is in itself well calculated to call out the enthusiasm of an audience, and the playing of the finale was sufficiently inspiring to justify the hearty applause it called out. Mr. Nikisch is evidently not at home in the performance of either the older or more modern symphonic compositions, and his reading of the Brahms work was a far from being a satisfactory effort. Coming after such performances of the Brahms in F as these audiences have enjoyed in former seasons, last evening's interpretation appeared tame indeed, for in nothing but the more dramatic portion of the final allegro did Mr. Nikisch approach the character of the work as it has been shown in earlier performances here. Boston can supply several conductors capable of doing far better work in this class of compositions than the larger portion of that done by Mr. Nikisch for the Symphony concert patrons. The habits indulged in by Mr. Nikisch on account of the absence of any desk or other means of support in front of his stand have given rise to much comment among the attendants upon these concerts. What would be thought of a man who in polite society would stand around with his hands resting on his hips, with his arms akimbo? Can any one recall a conductor who supports his left hand in this position three-quarters of the time he is in the presence of a cultivated audience of 2500 or more persons? In dramatic delineation the above attitude is identical with the posture of the fisherman, peasant girl and common laborer. Herbert Kelcey would find his occupation gone if he indulged in such a vulgarity before the audience. Of course, it would be an impossibility to witness such a display in any well regulated dramatic company, except in the characters instanced above. Next week the programme is as follows: Haydn, symphony in C major (L'Ours); Brahms, concerto for violin in D, op. 77; Schubert, symphony in B minor (unfinished); Beethoven, overture, "Dedication of the House." The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Journal.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1889.

[31]

The Symphony Concert.

It was a fortunate thing, as far as the auditors were concerned, that Mr. Nikisch did not open the concert of Saturday evening with the symphony, as was at first announced. For some reason the audience is never seated at eight o'clock, despite the rule observed by Mr. Gericke, and as faithfully carried out by Mr. Nikisch, of beginning promptly. It seemed as if there were more late comers than usual Saturday evening. When the overture, "Der Freischutz," by Weber, began there were many vacant seats, and the absentees missed a fine rendering of this familiar overture. We discover new beauties in every familiar selection, as given by Mr. Nikisch, and this overture was no exception. Clearness and expressiveness were the features of the rendition, and the conductor found the audience quick to appreciate it.

The Brahms Symphony was a very beautiful selection in its melody, its harmony and its working out. The andante movement appeared to us to be rendered delightfully, and the finale allegro roused the audience to much enthusiasm. The auditors were not wearied by the performance, so that when the grand composition of Liszt was delivered its beauty could be fully appreciated. And it was appreciated, for its rendition was well nigh perfection. The closing number was the "Tannhauser" overture, and here Mr. Nikisch fairly electrified the audience, sending it home in the best of humor. The changes were given very clearly, the tempo was unusually distinct and marked, and the brasses were not subdued. It was given with all the precision which marked Mr. Seidl's orchestra and the delicacy which was the characteristic of Mr. Gericke.

The arrangement of the programme seemed very satisfactory and pleasing to the audience. It would hardly be possible to make a programme to the satisfaction of everybody, and Mr. Nikisch's experience ought to be of more weight than that of the carpers who have already begun to get in their work. It is much easier to find fault than to suggest an improvement. In fact, improvements suggested by the perpetual faultfinder are not usually in the line of success with the general public. The symphony came at an opportune time when it could be enjoyed, and the numbers following were capable of giving pleasure as well as instruction, and the concert was out at an early hour. All these things are to be commended. Mr. Kneisel is to be the soloist at the next concert, giving a concerto by Brahms, new to Boston, and the orchestral selections will be another symphony by Haydn—the opening number—Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House."

The first of the "Young Peoples' Populars" by the Symphony Orchestra came off on Wednesday afternoon, and, as may be surmised, under the circumstances, drew a hall full of listeners. The idea of giving these concerts such a title is extremely absurd—childish even. It is an attempt to mislead, based solely upon the ground that a lighter grade of music is performed than at the regulars. Still the compositions are worthy of classification as being among the best known; even if not in the ultra technical form which seems to constitute the standard of classicists. Again they were interpreted by the same orchestra, and directed by the identical conductor—the Nikisch—as at the other concerts. One thing may be sure, that is, the real musical element here will be better represented at these auxiliary concerts than elsewhere. This class is hungry for music, having been ruthlessly debarred from participating at the regular concerts. Another point is that such music as that appended in the list below is always "popular" with old as well as young. Let us have more of it. This was the program:

Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Aria, "Sampson and Delila".....Saint-Saens
Songs with piano.....Schumann and Rhineberger
Concerto for flute, themes from opera "Oberon".....Demerssemen
a. "Siegfried idyll".....Wagner
b. "Invitation to dance".....Weber-Belioz
Overture "Rienzi".....Wagner
Soloists, Mme. Alves and M. Mole.

The recent Symphony concerts have presented some novelties in a line that is rather promotive of dullness. Mr. Nikisch appears to follow his predecessor religiously in that regard. I am growing to feel that he is wedded to idol worship, his ideals are so provokingly in what is termed the ultra classic rut. To be sure he did give Mr. Bird a hearing, and promised something from Mr. Foote later, but these do not compensate for the deluge of dryness otherwise. Is there to be no opportunity to recognize progress, or chance to feed our mentality upon anything but obstruse husks? Nous Verrons.

The last program is appended:

Overture—"Anacreon,".....Cherubini
Concerto for 'cello.....Eckert
Leo Schulz.
Rhapsodie—"Norvegiene,".....Svendsen
"Kol Nidrei,".....Bruch
Symphony in F.....Goetz

The 'cello soloist is one who joined the orchestra as a "second first"—if that title is not ambiguous. He came with Mr. Nikisch, and is a splendid performer in every respect, save in indulging freely with vibrato, which seems to have grown into a mania with this class of performers of late.

Boston Evening Transcript.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1889.

WHO MR. NIKISCH IS,

AND HIS PROBABLE KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRADITIONS FOR THE RENDERING OF THE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONIES.

Under the title "That Fifth Symphony," the Boston Herald of Nov. 18, 1889, printed a long article, "sounding an alarm" to rouse the good Bostonians from their careless tranquillity, and warning them of a dreadful danger, namely, the imminent decadence of genuine style and consecrated tradition in the domain of classical music, brought about by the pernicious influence of Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston symphony concerts.

We have prayerfully read this long essay; the woe and wailing of its author have touched our heart deeply. But perhaps not everything is yet lost; perhaps—but let us take the matter seriously—let us save what is still to be saved.

Before proceeding further, it seems to us of importance to get at a clear idea of the following preliminary questions:

a. What is tradition?

b. Does such a thing as tradition exist?

c. On whom does it devolve to vindicate the integrity of this criterion?

Regarding the first and second points, the greatest and wisest men of all climes and regions have cudgelled their brains in vain, and have come to the conclusion that problems, the factors of which consist solely of relative and incommensurable quantities, are not susceptible of apodictical solution. Just as little, for instance, as the conception "beautiful" is definable in an absolute sense, will it be possible to maintain what tradition is in the concrete, or in other words, that such really exists. The striking example recently addressed by a witty young littérateur, that at the present day, but a few years after Wagner's death, there is no Wagnerian tradition, proves most conclusively that this idea can only be taken in an abstract sense. But granting that a well-defined tradition did exist, then it remains for us, coming to the third preliminary question, to determine who is to be considered the Paladin of such a treasure?

We need not seek far, the Paladin is found—it is the author of the Herald essay.

Who is he?

We do not know. No compendium, no lesson yields light concerning him, and so, with the best intentions in the world, we are not in a position to say whether he is called to constitute himself an arbiter of art matters and to lay down art æsthetic dogmas.

But far be it from us in any manner to cast aspersion on this volunteer. He is surely an honorable man, and probably not celebrated, simply because, like the violet, he prefers to bloom in secret. We will, therefore, let him bloom on for a while, and put ourselves to the task of investigating how matters stand with Nikisch's "name and manner."

Concerning the latter, fortunately, numerous lexicons, periodicals and biographical descriptions give us abundant information. We have not the remotest intention of intoning a panegyric on Nikisch; if his biographers are men of truth, he is in no wise in need of such, and if he were, it appears that others, professional gentlemen of world-wide celebrity, would be ready to undertake this task with pleasure. We will confine ourselves to giving a brief summary of his development, based upon elements of fact, and believe ourselves justified in the assumption that this will suffice for any unprejudiced person to form a correct judgment of this artist.

Brought to the Vienna Conservatory in earliest boyhood, Nikisch, meteorlike, at once excited the marvel of everybody. While other youthful prodigies usually do not, in later years, justify the hopes founded upon them, in his case the precious germ blossomed in most luxurious splendor, and after the expiration of his period of study—in itself an exuberant round of successes—teachers, public and critics were of the undivided opinion that here was a phenomenal capacity. Men upon whom the mantle of Beethoven tradition, if ever such existed, had fallen in the directest possible manner, were the masters, friends, patrons and counsellors of young Nikisch, and these men never tired of unbosoming themselves in expressions of praise, of joy and of admiration over the lovely fruits which the seed of these were teaching and rich experience continued to mature in the genial young votary of art. His profound comprehension of the old masters, his keen judgment of new works, the refined and at the same time original but never eccentric conception of his execution—it was all these dazzling qualities that necessarily evoked unanimous praise and approval. And the only one of its kind, so far as we know, is the characteristic tribute, that all the students of a musical university should unite to distinguish an illustrious colleague, at his parting, by the presentation of a silver bâton, thus honoring him and themselves.

With his entrance to man's estate begin a continuous [illegible] of new progress, honors and [illegible] at the theatre, in the concert hall, in private circles or at brilliant musical festivals—thousands acclaim him with enthusiastic applause; the principal cities of central Europe dispute his possession; the greatest contemporary artists pay him the tribute due to undisputed mastery and authority. Bülow, Rubinstein, Joachim, Brahms, Herbeck, Dessoff, Wieniawski, and numerous other knights of the intellect declare him to be a musician by the grace of God, and Liszt, at the occasion of a banquet brings to Nikisch, the conductor, the following toast: "I drink to the elect of the elect!"

Finally Nickisch comes to America. As was not to be otherwise expected, he conquers all hearts by storm But the general enthusiasm is yet to be intensified in an unforeseen way. While he was able to fascinate by his first performances, it remained for him to let the scintillant brilliancy of his genial individuality irradiate in full measure with the "Fifth." As if liberated from bondage, the delighted hearers uttered shouts of rejoicing; enraptured, and plainly incapable of giving an adequate spontaneous expression of their emotion and gratitude, they wave their handkerchiefs at him, while the orchestra—an unprecedented occurrence—brings its new leader a homage inspired by the purest enthusiasm.

So that is what we know, to date, about Nikisch. Nikisch is, therefore, to say the least, celebrated. But let us return to the Herald writer, whom we left standing in his hidden retreat.

Now, why does he grieve and wail so heartrendingly? According to his opinion, Nikisch has committed on the "Fifth" the hideous crime of a heretical "mutilation," and the public, and all those that so far forget themselves as to do him homage and rapturously applaud him, ought incontinently to put on sackcloth and ashes, and spend the rest of their lives in deepest contrition of soul for such impious aberration. If by any chance this gentleman were really right, it would primarily demonstrate that from 5000 to 6000 people belonging to the best circles of the city were weak of mind, that Liszt and his congeners have pronounced inexcusably false judgments concerning Nikisch, and that those who have made so incompetent a person as Nikisch the conductor of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, must be visited with eternal condemnation; in short, it would appear that all together don't understand anything whatever—excepting the essayist in question.

We will not be presumptuous enough to dispute with such an authority about tempo, rhythm, metronomics and kindred matters, because we are not immodest enough to believe that he will, under any circumstances, grant us the right to do so. But it may, perhaps, interest him to learn what the great masters themselves thought about these things, and we will, therefore, take the liberty to communicate to him a number of these opinions. He will, we hope, permit that something in that regard be said by Beethoven himself, who—as may be read in "Schindler's Biography of Beethoven"—expresses himself as follows:

"We can hardly have any more tempi ordinari, because one must govern one's self according to the ideas of an untrammelled conception.

"As the poet frames his monologue or dialogue within a determined rhythm, while the declaimer, for the sake of a certain comprehension of the sense, interjects cesuras, or points of repose, even at places where the poet could not indicate them by punctuation, even so is this manner of declamation applicable to music, and is only modified by the number of those engaged in the performance of a work.

"The denominations of the tempi are a relic of the times of musical barbarism; for, to take only a single instance, what can be more senseless than allegro, which means, once for all, merrily; and how far are we often from this conception of the tempo, so that the piece itself says the contrary of the denomination! * * * As regards these four principal denominations, Allegro, Andante, Adagio, Presto, which are far from having the truth or correctness of the four principal winds, we are willing to put them at the end. It is different with the words denoting the character of the piece; these we cannot give up, since the tempo is in reality more its body, but these of themselves have relation to the spirit of the piece."

"No metronome whatever! He who has correct sensibility does not need it, and to him who has it not the metronome will be of no use anyway; he will run away with the whole orchestra, just the same."

With these remarks of Beethoven's, those of all other masters coincide to a nicety. In case the Herald writer should doubt the truth of this assertion, let us advance a few more examples. Thus, Weber ("Regarding the Treatment of the Tempi and their Metronomic Terminology") says to Präger:

"The time [the tempo] should not be a tyrannically impeding or driving mill-hammer, but should be to the musical piece what the pulse-movement is to the life of man. There exists no slow tempo in which places do not occur that require a more rapid motion, in order to prevent a sense of dragging. There exists no presto that does not likewise require a contrasting quiet execution of certain places, in order not to be deprived of the means of expression by undue haste. * * * For all this we have in music no means of indication. It rests solely in the sympathetic human breast, and if it is not to be found there, then neither the metronome, which only prevents gross errors, nor any device of terminology will do any good."

In an analogous sense Schumann speaks words equally worth taking to heart (Collected Works, book i.): "You know how little patience I have with the disputes about tempo taking, and how it is the inner measure of emotion alone that decides for me. Thus the rapid allegro of an unemotional person always sounds more indolent to me than the slower one of a sanguine person. With the orchestra the massing of tone is also to be considered—the more massive and dense elements can give the part, as well as the whole, greater emphasis and significance; with smaller and more delicate masses, on the contrary, it is necessary to help out the lack of resonance by means of hastening tempos."

When Schumann says in another place (Collected Works, book v.), "Perhaps only genius sufficiently understands genius," the question arises, "Perhaps the Herald writer is a greater genius than Nikisch!" but we will permit ourselves to doubt that a little.

That Mr. Nikisch's critic should think so little of the judgment of others, be they professional musicians or not, is perhaps intended to prove courage, but nevertheless excites surprise. In this respect, also, the masters have thought differently.

"It is particularly the prerogative of great artists to judge boldly," writes Papa Haydn in 1800 to the Parisian musicians.

Weber writes to his wife, "One ought to respect the public as a mass. Experience has taught that the consolidated judgment of the public is almost always just."

Like an elucidation of the foregoing sounds what Moritz Hauptmann says, "It is mankind who judges art, not only those educated in art; the fact that a musical work must be performed to others shows that it must please man, not this man or that man, but the normal human being—that is the touchstone."

We really fear we may tire, otherwise we would bring to bear a long series of such excerpts. But the Herald's essayist must allow himself to be taught a little more concerning the question as to whom the right of criticism pertains, and how it ought to be exercised—not by us, of course, but by authorities of the first water. Therefore, attention:

"The mania of wanting to speak about things they do not understand is but a too common failing of people." [Gluck dedication of period 1770, from the Italian.]

"How seldom one finds in a critic sensibility, knowledge, honesty and courage in adequate measure, four qualities which must unavoidably exist to a sufficient degree in every critic. It is, therefore, very deplorable for the domain of music that criticism, otherwise very useful, is often the business of intellects that are not endowed with all these qualities." [Phil. Em. Bach. Autobiography. Kohl's "Letters of Musicians."]

"Nothing is more repulsive to me than the disparagement of the nature or the talent of a person; that only disturbs and disgusts, and does no good; one should not put a measure to one's length; for then all working and striving is in vain; therefore one ought to keep silent about it—this thing is also the responsibility of God." [Mendelssohn Letters.]

"Criticism will always come hindmost, if it does not emanate from productive heads." [Schumann's Collected Works.]

"Great it is to appreciate genius, and favor its free upsoaring." [Liszt.]

"One should not apply the measure of traditional, though commendable culture to an exceptionally endowed individuality. The subjugation by artistic genius is the only kind one may submit to with a thankful heart." [Ferd. Hiller, "Aus dem Tonleben."]

"Criticism is also a kind of work of art. But it can never be beautiful, when its final impression is that of a negation." [Joachim Raff, "The Wagner Question."]

Now, such a spirit, that ever denies, fortunately brings no danger into the house, for it is, as Mephistopheles complains about himself, a part of the potency that ever designs evil and ever produces good—against its will, of course. Truth will in the end remain victorious, for a' that. Since the world stands, there have always been individuals who aimed to become celebrated by negative [illegible]

Herostratus, who set fire to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus. Nowadays, people do not burn temples of Diana, but they make their début in the rôle of the priest Laocoön, who warns Troy against the wooden horse; they try to discover how to square the circle, although that has long been demonstrated impossible; or they assume the part of the mailed guardians of the symphonic-dramatic boundary line.

It is surely a fine thing to exercise true criticism regarding art, regarding æsthetics. However, it is but a step from the sublime to the ridiculous. Between Laocoön and Laocoön there is a great difference; si duo faciunt idem, non est idem. The ancient Trojan, whose intentions at least were good, and who happened to be right besides, was nevertheless destined to become a victim of the two frightful serpents. How terrible will, then, be the fate of a pseudo-Laocoön! Reptiles even more dreadful threaten him; it is scorn and ridicule that throttle him. And, verily, we would have passed by the apparition of this modern Don Quixote, together with his ghosts, if he did not represent an entire class of people, which threatens to smuggle itself into the ranks of art criticism, to bring this profession into discredit, and to mislead inexperienced readers. It is, as we have said, very fortunate that these criticasters and pamphleteers are incapable of doing any permanent harm. For, what doth the moon, when it is bayed? It quietly shines on, and rejoices mankind with its soft light. And what does a great conductor do when he is insulted? He quietly conducts on, and does not tire of eliciting the pulsating enthusiasm and grateful admiration of the contemporary world by the dazzling light of his artistic genius.

UNUS PRO MULTIS.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, [illegible]

BOSTON [illegible]

The programme [illegible] symphony concert was:

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F, Op. 30.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Another purely orchestral programme that drew a large house and was hugely enjoyed. Of Mr. Nikisch's wonderfully slow tempo in the opening Adagio of the "Freischütz" overture it may be said that it is very doubtful whether either Weber, or any composer of his day, ever conceived of the possibility of any movement whatever being taken as slow as that. But, be this as it may, the effect of this tempo was, to our ears, to destroy all the naïveté and sylvan grace of the music, and to give it an impressiveness which, like that in a good deal of Victor Hugo's poetry, seemed to have no little self-consciousness behind it. But as soon as the Molto vivace began, the conductor showed himself in complete accord with the composer, and, from this point to the end, the overture went grandly. Seldom have those great C major chords before the peroration blazed forth in such magnificent splendor; and just here Mr. Nikisch followed a suggestion of Wagner's with incomparably fine effect, letting the closing theme (Agathe's song of thanksgiving) set in piano after this great outburst, and then work up gradually to its fortissimo climax. Here is an effect of shading which is conspicuously fine, and in so far legitimate as a very specious argument in its favor may be found in the score.

Brahms's great F major symphony was admirably played. Here, again, Mr. Nikisch indulged himself in some marked modifications of tempo which are not indicated in the score, and which we are by no means sure the composer would countenance; but their effect was far finer here than in works of an older period, for, with all Brahms's determined adherence to classic musical forms, and his persistence in looking upon music as nothing but music, almost all that he writes is essentially modern in spirit. He has the modern strenuousness, the modern unrest, the modern intensity of expression, and an occasional quasi-dramatic touch in the rendering does his music far less harm than it would that of an older composer. But whatever may be thought of such fluctuations in tempo, Mr. Nikisch would now and then give the music a touch of another sort, which revealed its true meaning in a masterly way. Let us take one especially fine instance: The way in which he made the basses, third trombone and double-bassoon emphasize their part in the third, fourth and fifth measures of the first movement showed at once to the ear what we had before been able to learn only by the eye in reading the score, namely, that this bass is something more than a mere foundation to the harmony, and is really of thematic import, a repetition in the bass of the phrase just given out by the wind instruments in the first two measures. And the ear, being thus strongly impressed with the fact that this bass is really a theme, finds a wholly different significance in the terrible cross-relation between the A-natural in the violins in the third measure, and the A-flat in the bass in the fourth. Instead of this passage seeming like a merely hideous piece of harmony, as it used to, the ear now recognizes the cross-relation as the necessary result of Brahms's setting forth two strongly opposed themes simultaneously; one in F major in the violins, the other in F minor in the bass. Here we have a good example of a dictum—which, like other sweeping generalizations, is, to be sure, open to exceptions—that, in Music it is only the incomprehensible that is really ugly. Mr. Nikisch's proceeding here is also an example of the old adage: "Tender-handed stroke a nettle." Mr. Gericke used apparently to try to tone down this cross-relation by making the bass as inconspicuous as possible, but did not in the least succeed in curing it of its deformity by so doing; Mr. Nikisch goes to work boldly, and plays the cross-relation for all it is worth, and, instead of ugly, it sounds magnificently terrible. As the violins launch forth so joyously on their theme, the stern bass steps in in a twinkling, as who should say—

"O, you are well tuned now!
But I'll set down the pegs that make this music
As honest as I am."

And throughout the performance of the Symphony similar instances of fine musical intelligence were to be noted. Liszt's "Les Préludes" was superbly played, and fairly carried off the honors of the evening in the way of applause. Admirable, also, in vigor and energy, was the performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture, albeit the tempo of the pilgrims' chorus was, perhaps, a shade too slow—a rare fault, for it is often taken too fast. At the last return of this theme, on the three trombones and three trumpets in unison, Mr. Nikisch introduced an effect which we had never heard before, and which, whether legitimate or not, was immensely impressive; he egged on the four horns to play in such an almost superhuman fortissimo that the middle parts stood out nearly as distinctly as the melody, and one heard this passage, for the first time, in full harmony. There was one feature in the concert, however, which should not be allowed to pass by unnoted. Although there were, perhaps, more fine points to be admired in the interpretation of the several numbers on the programme than at any previous concert this season, and the orchestra played with even more warmth, fire and effectiveness than usual, it must be admitted that the playing was, in general, technically rougher, and the ensemble of the orchestra farther from perfection than we have heard it for a great while. The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in C, "l'Ours"; Brahms, violin concerto in D; Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Beethoven, overture "Zur Weihe des Hauses." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 4, 1889.

The statement that a portion of the New York concert dates of the Boston Symphony orchestra had been cancelled, though made on what should have been good authority, proves to be incorrect. The orchestra will give four concerts in Steinway Hall on the evenings of Dec. 17, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, as originally announced.

[32]

Boston Evening Transcript.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1889.

WHO MR. NIKISCH IS,

AND HIS PROBABLE KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRADITIONS FOR THE RENDERING OF THE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONIES.

Under the title "That Fifth Symphony," the Boston Herald of Nov. 18, 1889, printed a long article, "sounding an alarm" to rouse the good Bostonians from their careless tranquillity, and warning them of a dreadful danger, namely, the imminent decadence of genuine style and consecrated tradition in the domain of classical music, brought about by the pernicious influence of Arthur Nikisch, the new conductor of the Boston symphony concerts.

We have prayerfully read this long essay; the woe and wailing of its author have touched our heart deeply. But perhaps not everything is yet lost; perhaps—but let us take the matter seriously—let us save what is still to be saved.

Before proceeding further, it seems to us of importance to get at a clear idea of the following preliminary questions:

a. What is tradition?

b. Does such a thing as tradition exist?

c. On whom does it devolve to vindicate the integrity of this criterion?

Regarding the first and second points, the greatest and wisest men of all climes and regions have cudgelled their brains in vain, and have come to the conclusion that problems, the factors of which consist solely of relative and incommensurable quantities, are not susceptible of apodictical solution. Just as little, for instance, as the conception "beautiful" is definable in an absolute sense, will it be possible to maintain what tradition is in the concrete, or in other words, that such really exists. The striking example recently addressed by a witty young littérateur, that at the present day, but a few years after Wagner's death, there is no Wagnerian tradition, proves most conclusively that this idea can only be taken in an abstract sense. But granting that a well-defined tradition did exist, then it remains for us, coming to the third preliminary question, to determine who is to be considered the Paladin of such a treasure?

We need not seek far, the Paladin is found—it is the author of the Herald essay.

Who is he?

We do not know. No compendium, no lesson yields light concerning him, and so, with the best intentions in the world, we are not in a position to say whether he is called to constitute himself an arbiter of art matters and to lay down art æsthetic dogmas.

But far be it from us in any manner to cast aspersion on this volunteer. He is surely an honorable man, and probably not celebrated, simply because, like the violet, he prefers to bloom in secret. We will, therefore, let him bloom on for a while, and put ourselves to the task of investigating how matters stand with Nikisch's "name and manner."

Concerning the latter, fortunately, numerous lexicons, periodicals and biographical descriptions give us abundant information. We have not the remotest intention of intoning a panegyric on Nikisch; if his biographers are men of truth, he is in no wise in need of such, and if he were, it appears that others, professional gentlemen of world-wide celebrity, would be ready to undertake this task with pleasure. We will confine ourselves to giving a brief summary of his development, based upon elements of fact, and believe ourselves justified in the assumption that this will suffice for any unprejudiced person to form a correct judgment of this artist.

Brought to the Vienna Conservatory in earliest boyhood, Nikisch, meteorlike, at once excited the marvel of everybody. While other youthful prodigies usually do not, in later years, justify the hopes founded upon them, in his case the precious germ blossomed in most luxurious splendor, and after the expiration of his period of study—in itself an exuberant round of successes—teachers, public and critics were of the undivided opinion that here was a phenomenal capacity. Men upon whom the mantle of Beethoven tradition, if ever such existed, had fallen in the directest possible manner, were the masters, friends, patrons and counsellors of young Nikisch, and these men never tired of unbosoming themselves in expressions of praise, of joy and of admiration over the lovely fruits which the seed of these were teaching and rich experience continued to mature in the genial young votary of art. His profound comprehension of the old masters, his keen judgment of new works, the refined and at the same time original but never eccentric conception of his execution—it was all these dazzling qualities that necessarily evoked unanimous praise and approval. And the only one of its kind, so far as we know, is the characteristic tribute, that all the students of a musical university should unite to distinguish an illustrious colleague, at his parting, by the presentation of a silver baton, thus honoring him and themselves.

With his entrance to man's estate begins a continuous chain of new progress, honors and triumphs. Be it at the theatre, in the concert hall, in private circles or at brilliant musical festivals—thousands acclaim him with enthusiastic applause; the principal cities of central Europe dispute his possession; the greatest contemporary artists pay him the tribute due to undisputed mastery and authority. Bülow, Rubinstein, Joachim, Brahms, Herbeck, Dessoff, Wieniawski, and numerous other knights of the intellect declare him to be a musician by the grace of God, and Liszt, at the occasion of a banquet brings to Nikisch, the conductor, the following toast: "I drink to the elect of the elect!"

Finally Nikisch comes to America. As was not to be otherwise expected, he conquers all hearts by storm But the general enthusiasm is yet to be intensified in an unforeseen way. While he was able to fascinate by his first performances, it remained for him to let the scintillant brilliancy of his genial individuality irradiate in full measure with the "Fifth." As if liberated from bondage, the delighted hearers uttered shouts of rejoicing; enraptured, and plainly incapable of giving an adequate spontaneous expression of their emotion and gratitude, they wave their handkerchiefs at him, while the orchestra—an unprecedented occurrence—brings its new leader a homage inspired by the purest enthusiasm.

So that is what we know, to date, about Nikisch. Nikisch is, therefore, to say the least, celebrated. But let us return to the Herald writer, whom we left standing in his hidden retreat.

Now, why does he grieve and wail so heartrendingly? According to his opinion, Nikisch has committed on the "Fifth" the hideous crime of a heretical "mutilation," and the public, and all those that so far forget themselves as to do him homage and rapturously applaud him, ought incontinently to put on sackcloth and ashes, and spend the rest of their lives in deepest contrition of soul for such impious aberration. If by any chance this gentleman were really right, it would primarily demonstrate that from 5000 to 6000 people belonging to the best circles of the city were weak of mind, that Liszt and his congeners have pronounced inexcusably false judgments concerning Nikisch, and that those who have made so incompetent a person as Nikisch the conductor of the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, must be visited with eternal condemnation; in short, it would appear that all together don't understand anything whatever—excepting the essayist in question.

We will not be presumptuous enough to dispute with such an authority about tempo, rhythm, metronomics and kindred matters, because we are not immodest enough to believe that he will, under any circumstances, grant us the right to do so. But it may, perhaps, interest him to learn what the great masters themselves thought about these things, and we will, therefore, take the liberty to communicate to him a number of these opinions. He will, we hope, permit that something in that regard be said by Beethoven himself, who—as may be read in "Schindler's Biography of Beethoven"—expresses himself as follows:

"We can hardly have any more tempi ordinari, because one must govern one's self according to the ideas of an untrammelled conception.

"As the poet frames his monologue or dialogue within a determined rhythm, while the declaimer, for the sake of a certain comprehension of the sense, interjects cesuras, or points of repose, even at places where the poet could not indicate them by punctuation, even so is this manner of declamation applicable to music, and is only modified by the number of those engaged in the performance of a work.

"The denominations of the tempi are a relic of the times of musical barbarism; for, to take only a single instance, what can be more senseless than allegro, which means, once for all, merrily; and how far are we often from this conception of the tempo, so that the piece itself says the contrary of the denomination! * * * As regards these four principal denominations, Allegro, Andante, Adagio, Presto, which are far from having the truth or correctness of the four principal winds, we are willing to put them at the end. It is different with the words denoting the character of the piece; these we cannot give up, since the tempo is in reality more its body, but these of themselves have relation to the spirit of the piece."

"No metronome whatever! He who has correct sensibility does not need it, and to him who has it not the metronome will be of no use anyway; he will run away with the whole orchestra, just the same."

With these remarks of Beethoven's, those of all other masters coincide to a nicety. In case the Herald writer should doubt the truth of this assertion, let us advance a few more examples. Thus, Weber ("Regarding the Treatment of the Tempi and their Metronomic Terminology") says to Präger:

"The time [the tempo] should not be a tyrannically impeding or driving mill-hammer, but should be to the musical piece what the pulse-movement is to the life of man. There exists no slow tempo in which places do not occur that require a more rapid motion, in order to prevent a sense of dragging. There exists no presto that does not likewise require a contrasting quiet execution of certain places, in order not to be deprived of the means of expression by undue haste. * * * For all this we have in music no means of indication. It rests solely in the sympathetic human breast, and if it is not to be found there, then neither the metronome, which only prevents gross errors, nor any device of terminology will do any good."

In an analagous sense Schumann speaks words equally worth taking to heart (Collected Works, book i.): "You know how little patience I have with the disputes about tempo taking, and how it is the inner measure of emotion alone that decides for me. Thus the rapid allegro of an unemotional person always sounds more indolent to me than the slower one of a sanguine person. With the orchestra the massing of tone is also to be considered—the more massive and dense elements can give the part, as well as the whole, greater emphasis and significance; with smaller and more delicate masses, on the contrary, it is necessary to help out the lack of resonance by means of hastening tempos."

When Schumann says in another place (Collected Works, book v.), "Perhaps only genius sufficiently understands genius," the question arises, "Perhaps the Herald writer is a greater genius than Nikisch!" but we will permit ourselves to doubt that a little.

That Mr. Nikisch's critic should think so little of the judgment of others, be they professional musicians or not, is perhaps intended to prove courage, but nevertheless excites surprise. In this respect, also, the masters have thought differently.

"It is particularly the prerogative of great artists to judge boldly," writes Papa Haydn in 1800 to the Parisian musicians.

Weber writes to his wife, "One ought to respect the public as a mass. Experience has taught that the consolidated judgment of the public is almost always just."

Like an elucidation of the foregoing sounds what Moritz Hauptmann says, "It is mankind who judges art, not only those educated in art; the fact that a musical work must be performed to others shows that it must please man, not this man or that man, but the normal human being—that is the touchstone."

We really fear we may tire, otherwise we would bring to bear a long series of such excerpts. But the Herald's essayist must allow himself to be taught a little more concerning the question as to whom the right of criticism pertains, and how it ought to be exercised—not by us, of course, but by authorities of the first water. Therefore, attention:

"The mania of wanting to speak about things they do not understand is but a too common failing of people." [Gluck dedication of period 1770, from the Italian.]

"How seldom one finds in a critic sensibility, knowledge, honesty and courage in adequate measure, four qualities which must unavoidably exist to a sufficient degree in every critic. It is, therefore, very deplorable for the domain of music that criticism, otherwise very useful, is often the business of intellects that are not endowed with all these qualities." [Phil. Em. Bach. Autobiography. Kohl's "Letters of Musicians."]

"Nothing is more repulsive to me than the disparagement of the nature or the talent of a person; that only disturbs and disgusts, and does no good; one should not put a measure to one's length; for then all working and striving is in vain; therefore one ought to keep silent about it—this thing is also the responsibility of God." [Mendelssohn Letters.]

"Criticism will always come hindmost, if it does not emanate from productive heads." [Schumann's Collected Works.]

"Great it is to appreciate genius, and favor its free upsoaring." [Liszt.]

"One should not apply the measure of a traditional, though commendable culture to an exceptionally endowed individuality. The subjugation by artistic genius is the only kind one may submit to with a thankful heart." [Ferd. Hiller, "Aus dem Tonleben."]

"Criticism is also a kind of work of art. But it can never be beautiful, when its final impression is that of a negation." [Joachim Raff, "The Wagner Question."]

Now, such a spirit, that ever denies, fortunately brings no danger into the house, for it is, as Mephistopheles complains about himself, a part of the potency that ever designs evil and ever produces good—against its will, of course. Truth will in the end remain victorious, for a' that. Since the world stands, there have always been individuals who aimed to become celebrated by negative [illegible] like Herostratus, who set fire to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus. Nowadays, people do not burn temples of Diana, but they make their début in the rôle of the priest Laocoön, who warns Troy against the wooden horse; they try to discover how to square the circle, although that has long been demonstrated impossible; or they assume the part of the mailed guardians of the symphonic-dramatic boundary line.

It is surely a fine thing to exercise true criticism regarding art, regarding æsthetics. However, it is but a step from the sublime to the ridiculous. Between Laocoön and Laocoön there is a great difference; si duo faciunt idem, non est idem. The ancient Trojan, whose intentions at least were good, and who happened to be right besides, was nevertheless destined to become a victim of the two frightful serpents. How terrible will, then, be the fate of a pseudo-Laocoön! Reptiles even more dreadful threaten him; it is scorn and ridicule that throttle him. And, verily, we would have passed by the apparition of this modern Don Quixote, together with his ghosts, if he did not represent an entire class of people, which threatens to smuggle itself into the ranks of art criticism, to bring this profession into discredit, and to mislead inexperienced readers. It is, as we have said, very fortunate that these criticasters and pamphleteers are incapable of doing any permanent harm. For, what doth the moon, when it is bayed? It quietly shines on, and rejoices mankind with its soft light. And what does a great conductor do when he is insulted? He quietly conducts on, and does not tire of eliciting the pulsating enthusiasm and grateful admiration of the contemporary world by the dazzling light of his artistic genius.

UNUS PRO MULTIS.

Boston Evening Transcript.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1889.

[32]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was:

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F, Op. 30.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes."
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Another purely orchestral programme that drew a large house and was hugely enjoyed. Of Mr. Nikisch's wonderfully slow tempo in the opening Adagio of the "Freischütz" overture it may be said that it is very doubtful whether either Weber, or any composer of his day, ever conceived of the possibility of any movement whatever being taken as slow as that. But, be this as it may, the effect of this tempo was, to our ears, to destroy all the naïveté and sylvan grace of the music, and to give it an impressiveness which, like that in a good deal of Victor Hugo's poetry, seemed to have no little self-consciousness behind it. But as soon as the Molto vivace began, the conductor showed himself in complete accord with the composer, and, from this point to the end, the overture went grandly. Seldom have those great C major chords before the peroration blazed forth in such magnificent splendor; and just here Mr. Nikisch followed a suggestion of Wagner's with incomparably fine effect, letting the closing theme (Agathe's song of thanksgiving) set in piano after this great outburst, and then work up gradually to its fortissimo climax. Here is an effect of shading which is conspicuously fine, and in so far legitimate as a very specious argument in its favor may be found in the score.

Brahms's great F major symphony was admirably played. Here, again, Mr. Nikisch indulged himself in some marked modifications of tempo which are not indicated in the score, and which we are by no means sure the composer would countenance; but their effect was far finer here than in works of an older period, for, with all Brahms's determined adherence to classic musical forms, and his persistence in looking upon music as nothing but music, almost all that he writes is essentially modern in spirit. He has the modern strenuousness, the modern unrest, the modern intensity of expression, and an occasional quasi-dramatic touch in the rendering does his music far less harm than it would that of an older composer. But whatever may be thought of such fluctuations in tempo, Mr. Nikisch would now and then give the music a touch of another sort, which revealed its true meaning in a masterly way. Let us take one especially fine instance: The way in which he made the basses, third trombone and double-bassoon emphasize their part in the third, fourth and fifth measures of the first movement showed at once to the ear what we had before been able to learn only by the eye in reading the score, namely, that this bass is something more than a mere foundation to the harmony, and is really of thematic import, a repetition in the bass of the phrase just given out by the wind instruments in the first two measures. And the ear, being thus strongly impressed with the fact that this bass is really a theme, finds a wholly different significance in the terrible cross-relation between the A-natural in the violins in the third measure, and the A-flat in the bass in the fourth. Instead of this passage seeming like a merely hideous piece of harmony, as it used to, the ear now recognizes the cross-relation as the necessary result of Brahms's setting forth two strongly opposed themes simultaneously; one in F major in the violins, the other in F minor in the bass. Here we have a good example of a dictum—which, like other sweeping generalizations, is, to be sure, open to exceptions—that, in Music it is only the incomprehensible that is really ugly. Mr. Nikisch's proceeding here is also an example of the old adage: "Tender-handed stroke a nettle." Mr. Gericke used apparently to try to tone down this cross-relation by making the bass as inconspicuous as possible, but did not in the least succeed in curing it of its deformity by so doing; Mr. Nikisch goes to work boldly, and plays the cross-relation for all it is worth, and, instead of ugly, it sounds magnificently terrible. As the violins launch forth so joyously on their theme, the stern bass steps in in a twinkling, as who should say—

"O, you are well tuned now!
But I'll set down the pegs that make this music
As honest as I am."

And throughout the performance of the symphony similar instances of fine musical intelligence were to be noted. Liszt's "Les Préludes" was superbly played, and fairly carried off the honors of the evening in the way of applause. Admirable, also, in vigor and energy, was the performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture, albeit the tempo of the pilgrims' chorus was, perhaps, a shade too slow—a rare fault, for it is often taken too fast. At the last return of this theme, on the three trombones and three trumpets in unison, Mr. Nikisch introduced an effect which we had never heard before, and which, whether legitimate or not, was immensely impressive; he egged on the four horns to play in such an almost superhuman fortissimo that the middle parts stood out nearly as distinctly as the melody, and one heard this passage, for the first time, in full harmony. There was one feature in the concert, however, which should not be allowed to pass by unnoted. Although there were, perhaps, more fine points to be admired in the interpretation of the several numbers on the programme than at any previous concert this season, and the orchestra played with even more warmth, fire and effectiveness than usual, it must be admitted that the playing was, in general, technically rougher, and the ensemble of the orchestra farther from perfection than we have heard it for a great while. The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in C, "l'Ours"; Brahms, violin concerto in D; Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Beethoven, overture "Zur Weihe des Hauses." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

BOSTON HERALD.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 4, 1889.

The statement that a portion of the New York concert dates of the Boston Symphony orchestra had been cancelled, though made on what should have been good authority, proves to be incorrect. The orchestra will give four concerts in Steinway Hall on the evenings of Dec. 17, Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, as originally announced.

...an Daily Traveller.

...SDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1889.

...e Ninth Symphony Concert.—A Romantic Programme.

...e programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

...ber. Overture, "Der Freischütz."
...ms. Symphony in F, No. 3.
...t. Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."
...agner. Overture, "Tannhäuser."

Brahms, although born into the romantic period of music, can hardly be called a romanticist, but the other composers represented by this programme are the high priests of the epoch. Weber and Wagner are also reformers, while Liszt, whose final place in the Walhalla of composers is as yet undetermined, is at least an innovator, who converses brilliantly, though his vocabulary is meagre. No other quartet of musicians of the present decade can be named who have exerted equal influence with these. The germ of dramatic unity which "Der Freischütz" contains, developed through the genius of Wagner, a new and wonderful art; Brahms links us to the classic names of the great past, and in a manner decorous and noble, while Liszt, as pianist, composer and litterateur, exercises a distinct individuality which, through his disciples, is felt in two hemispheres.

In the interpretation of this programme, Mr. Nikisch's emotional qualities stood out conspicuously. The lovely coloring of the "Freischütz" overture, the brilliant vehemence of the "Preludes" and the poetic contrasts of the glowing "Tannhäuser" music were all expressed most beautifully. The playing of the symphony was somewhat unequal. In the "working out" portions of the first movement one was called upon to admire Brahms's impressive treatment, his absolutely sure touch, but the symphony as a whole, notwithstanding moments of beauty in the middle movements, does not gain in warmth or inspiration. The playing of the orchestra was more robust and brilliant than ever; the spirit of dramatic expression which now possesses it is of infinitely more value than the ability to run parallel to a mettonome for hours on a stretch. As to precision and finish of detail, the performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture was superb in these respects.

At the next concert an unfamiliar symphony by Hayden, entitled "The Bear," will be heard; also, Schubert's unfinished symphony, and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play, for the first time in Boston, Brahms's violin concerto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1889.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The enthusiastic and sympathetic audience which greeted the Kneisel Quartet on their second appearance of this season evinced the enviable position which this organization holds in the hearts of the music-loving people of this city. The programme opened with a sonata for violin and piano by our own American composer and pianist, Mr. Arthur Foote, who himself rendered the piano part in a manner equal to Mr. Kneisel's artistic work upon the violin. The composition itself shows that Mr. Foote knows how to handle themes in a refined and delicate way without becoming weak and effeminate, as a man of lesser talent might do.

It opens with an allegro in G minor, in which the sonata form is elaborately worked out. The second movement, a dreamy, poetic little piece in the form of a Siciliano, is interrupted strikingly by a most quaint and original intermezzo as brisk, breezy and bright as an October day. The following movement, the adagio, gives each instrument an opportunity of doing bits of interesting solo work, on the whole, quiet and serious in character. In the allegro assai, in G minor, Mr. Foote, instead of following the usual rondo form, has returned to something on the plan of the ordinary first movement — the opening theme full of animation and the second broad and melodious, in fine contrast to the first. The working out gave the audience a fine opportunity to realize the technical ability of the two artists, and the coda returning to the theme of the adagio brings the whole to an end quietly. The unaffected simplicity of Miss Rose Stewart in singing her three beautiful German songs was the more refreshing because of its departure from the stereotyped concert airs of most concert singers. The three selections were "Andie Tauben" by Brahms, in which Miss Stewart sung an English translation, a sweet little lullaby by Moszkowski, "Schlag Bubchen Schlag," and "Die Loreley" by Liszt, and gave evidence of the versatility of the young artist in the thrilling tenderness of the second, and pathos and dramatic power of the third.

The final number on the programme was the Schubert Quartetto in D minor, played by the strings without assistance. This and its companion piece in G major are among the greatest of Schubert's works and pre-eminent among his 20 quartettes, romantic and full of the most charming melodies. They are too well known to need full description beyond calling attention to the air with variations in the andante, which is the same as that given to "Death" in Schubert's song, "Der Tod und das Madlun," and also to the fine treatment of the theme in the Pusto for the four instruments in unison and the abandonment of the unison alternately for full chords in F and B flat major at the end of each section of the theme.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1889

THE SECOND KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT. The second concert of this series in Chickering Hall last evening was very well attended, the programme being as follows:

Sonata for violin and piano. G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote Allegro appassionato, G minor.—Alla siciliano, D major; Intermezzo, F major.—Adagio molto, E flat major.—Allegro assai, G minor. (First time. MS.)
Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote.

Songs with piano—
a. "An die Tauben".....Brahms
b. "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf"...Moszkowski
c. "Die Loreley".....Liszt
Miss Stewart.

Quartet in D minor.....Schubert

Mr. Foote's violin sonata is beyond question his best work as yet. It is a thoroughly admirable composition. The first movement especially is finely conceived and carried out; the themes are striking and melodious, and the essentially modern contrapuntal treatment is of the most finished nature. In fact the movement is so thoughtful and of so high a conception that the audience failed to thoroughly grasp and understand its beauty at a first hearing. The alla siciliano is very lovely in its melody and arrangement, but it is unfortunately too strongly reminiscent of Bach. The little intermezzo, which acts a species of trio to the siciliano, is delightful. The slow movement is based on a noble melodious phrase, and its quiet dignity is admirably sustained throughout, while the last movement is stirring and brilliant. In short the whole work is of the highest character and reflects the greatest credit on its composer. Its chief fault, perhaps, is that there is rather too much of it.

Miss Stewart accompanied herself—this is, perhaps, a mistake for a lady; and certainly she gave way to the great temptation of a singer who accompanies herself, that is, she drowned her own voice; she also had the piano half open for some unknown reason. Her voice is pleasant and sympathetic in the lower and middle register, but her high notes are metallic and uncertain in intonation. Her method and general style of singing are also admirable, but she does not seem at home in the school of the "Deutsche Lied," and above all things, she would do wisely to give up playing her own accompaniments.

The beautiful Schubert quartet was most exquisitely played by the Kneisel Quartet. This organization is one of the most admirable of its kind in this country or any other. Its four members are, individually, artists of unusually high attainments, and their ensemble is almost perfect. Their object is to give the work in question a completely artistic interpretation, and no one of them ever asserts himself in the least. In short, it is a true quartet ensemble, and not a group of four virtuosi, each of whom is trying to be heard alone. Mr. Kneisel is immensely patient and painstaking in his rehearsals, and he deserves the greatest credit for the perfection which he and his colleagues have attained.

ARTHUR WELD.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC. 3.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

A New Sonata by Arthur Foote Performed at Chickering Hall.

The opening number of the Kneisel quartet concert last evening was especially interesting from the fact that it had never before been performed in public, and that the composer played the piano part. It was a sonata for violin and piano in G minor (op. 20), by Arthur Foote, and was written by that gentleman last summer. The movements are: Allegro appassionato, G minor; alla siciliano, D major; intermezzo, F major; adagio molto, E flat major; allegro assai, G minor. The second movement is particularly taking, and was finely played. It is a fortunate thing for a composer to have a new piece so finely rendered and make such a favorable impression as did the sonata. Mr. Kneisel's playing in this number proves that he maintains his rank as the first violinist of Boston. Mr. Foote's playing was very satisfactory and added to his fame as a pianist. The selection played by the quartet was the string quartet in D minor by Schubert. This artist composed many string quartets, but the one in D minor and its companion in G major, op. 161, are undoubtedly the greatest of them all. This was the second performance of this composition at the Kneisel concerts, and it is unnecessary to state that the artists gave a splendid interpretation of the music. The andante con moto movement, an air with variations, the theme being the same as the part of Death in Schubert's song, "Der Tod und das Madchen," is specially interesting. The scherzo is very melodious, as is also the trio. The audience was very enthusiastic at the finish of the second movement, and the artists bowed their acknowledgments of the compliment of recall. The quartet had the assistance of Miss Rose Stewart, who sang "An Die Tauben" by Brahms, "Schlaf Buebchen Schlaf" by Moszkowski and "Die Loreley" by Liszt. Miss Stewart was very pleasing in the second song, which is sympathetic and beautiful, and as she played her own accompaniments her voice made an excellent impression.

Boston Evening Transcript.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1889.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

For the second concert of the series by the Kneisel Quartet, in Chickering Hall, Monday night, the following was the programme:

Sonata for violin and pianoforte, in G minor, op. 20.....Arthur Foote
Songs with pianoforte—
"An die Tauben".....Brahms
"Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf".....Moszowski
"Die Loreley".....Schubert
Quartet in D minor.....Liszt

Miss Rose Stewart was the singer, Mr. Arthur Foote the pianist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist.

Mr. Foote's new sonata, performed for the first time, proved interesting and pleasing, worthy of his reputation as a serious and ambitious musician, and indicative of progress. With the exception of the last movement, which sounded patchy, it is spontaneous and flowing, reminding one of Schumann in the breadth of phrase and general melodic treatment of the Adagio, and of older masters elsewhere. For the rest, its workmanship is good, its themes agreeable and bright, and it is of a discreet and reasonable length. It was extremely well received, and all its good points immediately felt and rppreciated, the charming Siciliano being applauded with special heartiness.

Miss Stewart's clear, fresh voice was a pleasure to hear; but it must be said that she made a serious error in undertaking to play her own accompaniments. Brilliant as was this display of musical accomplishments, the effect was anything but satisfactory to the audience, many of whom could see nothing of the singer behind the instrument save the ornament in her hair above and her dress skirt below. Furthermore, by this divided attention she was unable to do herself full justice as a singer, as was particularly apparent in the last sorg of the group. The Schubert Quartet was superbly played.

The third concert will be given on Monday night, Dec. 30.

Boston Daily Traveller.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1889.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

At this concert, given in Chickering Hall last night, the following programme was performed: Arthur Foote—Sonata for violin and piano, G minor, op. 20; allegro appassionato, G minor; Alla Siciliano, D major; intermezzo, F major; Adagio molto, E flat major—Allegro assai, G minor (first time, MS.), Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Foote. Songs with piano—Brahms, a, "An die Tauben"; Moszkowski, b, "Schlaf Bübchen Schlaf"; Liszt, c, "Die Loreley," Miss Stewart. Schubert — Quartet in D minor.

A first hearing of the Sonata creates a variety of impressions. The opening movement is disappointing. The themes and their development appear labored, and the appassionato element does not possess that warmth, fire and sustained energy which should characterize a movement so named. Its ending also strikes one as being unreasonable in its abruptness.

The "Siciliano," on the contrary, is charming, and is the most taking portion, at least, of the entire work. There is a half-melancholy melody for the violin combined with an elaborate, obligato sort of accompaniment, the effect of which is both musical and fascinating. The intermezzo offers a striking contrast, with its crisp, staccato chords, and quickened tempo; and the return to the melody brings to an end probably as graceful a bit of writing as Mr. Foote has yet given to the public. The adagio, too, has moments of attractiveness; but its seeming lack of spontaneity stands in the way of its creating a really serious impression. The same may also be said of the last movement. Its quiet ending with the theme of the adagio has an interesting, Brahms-like effect, although a brilliant close would possibly be more in harmony with the general tenor of the work. As a whole, the sonata appears to embody a series of disconnected ideas, rather than the expression of one distinct and dominating thought. Nevertheless, it is more than likely that it would improve decidedly on further acquaintance, especially as Mr. Foote was not at his best as pianist, and as Mr. Kneisel failed to display in his part of the performance his usual strong sense of artistic proportion.

Miss Stewart, who, we believe, has not been heard in public for some time, undertook the difficult task of singing in public while playing her own accompaniment. This is a feat that a singer is seldom able to accomplish successfully, and, after her attempt last evening, Miss Stewart can hardly be ranked among the chosen few. In juxtaposition with her beautiful, sympathetic voice and her highly artistic method, she brought a clear and accurate, but unsympathetic, touch; which grew harder during her singing, besides being too heavy. This was more noticeable in the first two songs than in the "Loreloy," which was played with considerable taste, and displayed no mean technical proficiency. Her singing gave much pleasure, and left us with a strong desire to hear again the same beautiful songs.

Of the performance of the Schubert Quartet little is to be said except in praise. What a comfort it would be if all grateful listeners to such music could be sure that Schubert had always been able to listen to similar performances of his works!

If there were moments last evening when greater warmth of expression could have been wished for, they were not frequent; and the enthusiasm with which this work, as well as the other numbers, was received was most gratifying.

The next concert is announced for Dec. 30.

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 7, 1889.

Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings.

As Nikisch continues to broaden his programs as he is now doing there will be little room left for complaint by the end of the season. Already we have listened to Grieg, Svendsen, Goetz, Glinka, Bruch, Eckert, and two native composers have been honored with places. Last of these was Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, in D-major, No. 3, op. 21. The Minuet is as beautiful as if it had been voyaged across the ocean fifty years ago. At the close the composer was compelled to bow his modest acknowledgments from his seat in the stage corner of the right balcony. As the program sketch of his new work is highly interesting, it is here inserted.

As is usually the case with modern suites, the old custom of adhering to one key for all the movements has not been followed, so that they stand in these contrasted keys: prelude (allegro comodo), in D-major, 4-4 time; minuetto, in B-flat major, 3-4 time; air (adagio), in G-major, 3-4 time; and gavotte, in D-major again, 2-2 time. A certain unity is, however, gained by transforming the theme of the prelude into a new theme for the gavotte. The prelude is naturally of simple structure, without even a second theme; but, so far as development and change of keys go, it follows strictly the usual sonata form—that is, beginning in D-major, the first section ends in the dominant (A-major), and is then repeated. After this, the usual working-out section follows, and fragments of the theme are employed in various keys and with different instruments, bringing us back, after a pedal on the dominant (A), to the theme again in B-major fortissimo, the first violins taking it in octaves, and finally working upward with a stringendo and crescendo to the very top of their range (high D) as the climax. They then quite suddenly go down hill again with a diminuendo, and rise again pianissimo to the high D.

The minuet calls for no special description, except that the trio is made up of, first, a solo for 'cello (with accompaniment of muted strings), and, after a short violin solo, of a little duet between the two, after which the main part is naturally repeated.

The third movement is practically an air for first violins solo, with accompaniment, although in the middle of it the voices move in freer and more interesting part-writing.

The gavotte, as said above, is based on the theme of the prelude, slightly changed. In the trio (musette) the old bagpipe effect, which is really an essential part of the dance, is obtained by accented fifths in the lower instruments; while the second violins keep up an animated accompaniment in eighth notes, also largely in empty fifths, on open strings."

The suite was written last summer and this is its first performance.

The singer was Gertrude Edmands. First she gave Raff's song, The Dream King and his Love, and then Remembrance, by Brahms,—both in German, and both finely; but it was a delightful change when she wound up with English, in another Brahm's number, The Little Dustman, a lovely cradle-song. She never sang anything with better effect, and the words (which differed by a whole stanza from the translation on the program) were as distinct as the tone was expressive.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony raised a din of criticism. One objector wrote a column to the Herald, denouncing Nikisch's view, in such language as one applies to a blood-and-thunder melodramatic style of rendering Shakespeare. He even went so far as to declare that musicians who joined the applause will be ashamed of it in their saner moments. On the other hand, a musician who has heard the noble Fifth hundreds of times, says that this presentation excelled every other in his experience.

The new wine of music can not be put into old bottles. Beethoven was himself an innovator, denounced by musicians of his day; and in our day, who dare assume a knowledge of Beethoven's precise wishes? As well insist that Mansfield is wrong, because his Richard differs from Tom Keene's, or Salvini, because his Othello is unlike Booth's, as to demand that a young leader, of the romantic school, shall take a certain view of a Beethoven symphony, because leaders generally have done so. Macbeth and Lear were acted in current costumes, and boys played women's parts, till the English world came into better light.

Remembering these censures over the Fifth, we waited with some special interest to see what Nikisch would do with the Eighth. Well, the performance was thoroughly enjoyable. After all, is not that the test? Never before did it seem so brief, or its odd transitions more abrupt.

The overture was Schumann's Genoveva.

For the Eighth Concert there are these three numbers: Symphony No. 3, in F, by Brahms,—opening the program, instead of closing it; Liszt's Symphonic Poem, Preludes; the Tannhauser Overture.

Boston Daily Traveller.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1889.

The Ninth Symphony Concert.

A Romantic Programme.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert was:

Weber. Overture, "Der Freischütz."
Brahms. Symphony in F, No. 3.
Liszt. Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."
Wagner. Overture, "Tannhäuser."

Brahms, although born into the romantic period of music, can hardly be called a romancer, but the other composers represented by this programme are the high priests of the epoch. Weber and Wagner are also reformers, while Liszt, whose final place in the Walhalla of composers is as yet undetermined, is at least an innovator, who converses brilliantly, though his vocabulary is meagre. No other quartet of musicians of the present decade can be named who have exerted equal influence with these. The germ of dramatic unity which "Der Freischütz" contains, developed through the genius of Wagner, a new and wonderful art; Brahms links us to the classic names of the great past, and in a manner decorous and noble, while Liszt, as pianist, composer and litterateur, exercises a distinct individuality which, through his disciples, is felt in two hemispheres.

In the interpretation of this programme, Mr. Nikisch's emotional qualities stood out conspicuously. The lovely coloring of the "Freischütz" overture, the brilliant vehemence of the "Preludes" and the poetic contrasts of the glowing "Tannhäuser" music were all expressed most beautifully. The playing of the symphony was somewhat unequal. In the "working out" portions of the first movement one was called upon to admire Brahms's impressive treatment, his absolutely sure touch, but the symphony as a whole, notwithstanding moments of beauty in the middle movements, does not gain in warmth or inspiration. The playing of the orchestra was more robust and brilliant than ever; the spirit of dramatic expression which now possesses it is of infinitely more value than the ability to run parallel to a mettonome for hours on a stretch. As to precision and finish of detail, the performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture was superb in these respects.

At the next concert an unfamiliar symphony by Hayden, entitled "The Bear," will be heard; also, Schubert's unfinished symphony, and Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play, for the first time in Boston, Brahms's violin concerto.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1889.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The enthusiastic and sympathetic audience which greeted the Kneisel Quartet on their second appearance of this season evinced the enviable position which this organization holds in the hearts of the music-loving people of this city. The programme opened with a sonata for violin and piano by our own American composer and pianist, Mr. Arthur Foote, who himself rendered the piano part in a manner equal to Mr. Kneisel's artistic work upon the violin. The composition itself shows that Mr. Foote knows how to handle themes in a refined and delicate way without becoming weak and effeminate, as a man of lesser talent might do.

It opens with an allegro in G minor, in which the sonata form is elaborately worked out. The second movement, a dreamy, poetic little piece in the form of a Siciliano, is interrupted strikingly by a most quaint and original intermezzo as brisk, breezy and bright as an October day. The following movement, the adagio, gives each instrument an opportunity of doing bits of interesting solo work, on the whole, quiet and serious in character. In the allegro assai, in G minor, Mr. Foote, instead of following the usual rondo form, has returned to something on the plan of the ordinary first movement — the opening theme full of animation and the second broad and melodious, in fine contrast to the first. The working out gave the audience a fine opportunity to realize the technical ability of the two artists, and the coda returning to the theme of the adagio brings the whole to an end quietly. The unaffected simplicity of Miss Rose Stewart in singing her three beautiful German songs was the more refreshing because of its departure from the stereotyped concert airs of most concert singers. The three selections were "Andie Tauben" by Brahms, in which Miss Stewart sung an English translation, a sweet little lullaby by Moszkowski, "Schlag Bubchen Schlag," and "Die Loreley" by Liszt, and gave evidence of the versatility of the young artist in the thrilling tenderness of the second, and pathos and dramatic power of the third.

The final number on the programme was the Schubert Quartette in D minor, played by the strings without assistance. This and its companion piece in G major are among the greatest of Schubert's works and pre-eminent among his 20 quartettes, romantic and full of the most charming melodies. They are too well known to need full description beyond calling attention to the air with variations in the andante, which is the same as that given to "Death" in Schubert's song, "Der Tod und das Madlun," and also to the fine treatment of the theme in the Pusto for the four instruments in unison and the abandonment of the unison alternately for full chords in F and B flat major at the end of each section of the theme.

Boston Post.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1889

THE SECOND KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

The second concert of this series in Chickering Hall last evening was very well attended, the programme being as follows:

